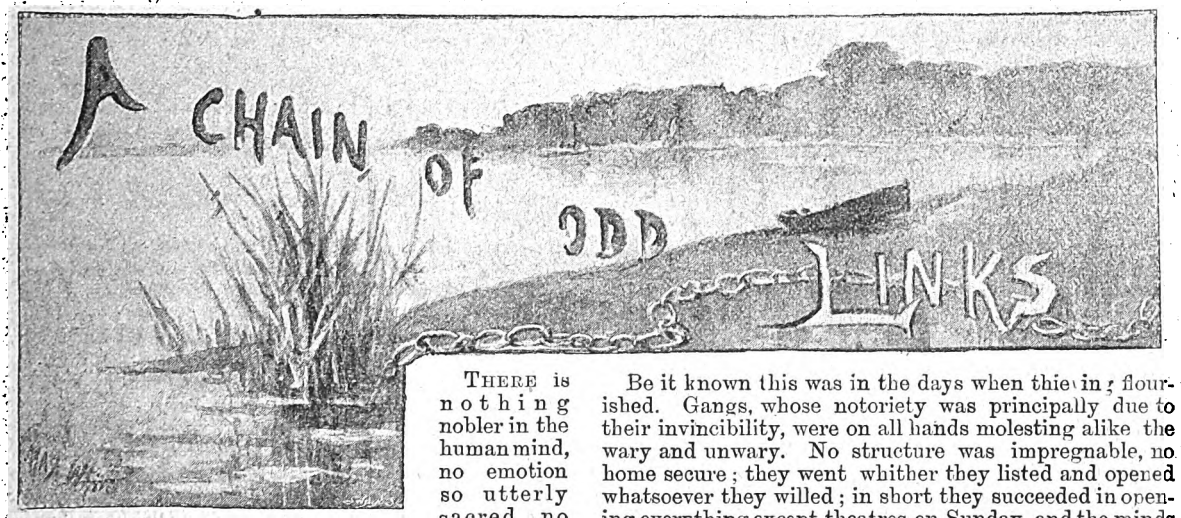
SHORT STORIES.

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 392.] For the Week ending July 4th, 1896. [ONE PENNY.



THERE is nothing nobler in the human mind, no emotion so utterly sacred, no spirit beyond the confines of Heaven so truly divine, as that of self-sacrifice.

It is not inception, nor anything else bearing a name; it is one of those invincible proofs striving to force in mankind a recognition of its own brotherhood, through the medium of some great unknown.

It was in the days when my mad hungering heart denied access to the palliating influences of mind. It was while I was ambling through the world with neither object nor care. I knew no hope, no despair, no joy, no woe. I was in that imperial state of indifference when a man would just as soon live as die, or vice-versa. I was like a king in an unpeopled kingdom. Owing to a lack of education and depth of thought, I was superbly ignorant of myself. I had passed many semi-utilitarian epochs, such as newsvending, viâ pick-pocketing and Salvationism, to histrionic performances on provincial stages.

The experience gained in this latter avocation opened my mind to a perception of beautiful realms corrupted. I saw minds of might stranded and rolling upon the scorial shores of passion, and my own mind sickened at the sight.

About this time a legacy enabled me to escape this atmosphere of dishonest vice—dishonest because half concealed—and contemplate with well measured concern vices committed honestly and openly. This recreation projected upon my mind a scheme of vast moral reform, in pursuance of which I frequented gaming hells and slums, and dens of depravity.

Closely thereby hangs my tale.

One night when everybody in the land—properly excepting myself—seemed exceptionally wicked, I was disconsolately meandering amongst the ill-omened slums above mentioned.

All rights reserved.]

Be it known this was in the days when thieving flourished. Gangs, whose notoriety was principally due to their invincibility, were on all hands molesting alike the wary and unwary. No structure was impregnable, no home secure; they went whither they listed and opened whatsoever they willed; in short they succeeded in opening everything except theatres on Sunday, and the minds of Local Protection authorities. They opened the purses of uncharitable millionaires, they opened wonderment and fear, and probably—if not too luxuriously inclined to spendthriftness—banking accounts.

One particular gang proclaimed itself particularly successful in this way. This was a society of young ladies, so neat and tender in their cunning, as almost to inspire belief that their predatory usages were all on behalf of the "starving poor."

Wending my melancholy way I was thinking of all these things when I found myself quickly contracting a most profound interest in them, and I imagined into shape a new inroad for my great moral reform schemes.

Consequently I bent my head and my thoughts at the same time, and ploughed the road assiduously.

In this manner was I engaged when a jerk in the region of my vest, suggested the possibility of my effects being in danger. Groping hurriedly, I caught a hand closing over my watch. With the hand still disengaged, I examined my person, and found my purse already gone. Turning to my uninvited retainer I found her to be a woman.

After a momentary pause I asked—quite dispassionately:

"What are you doing?"

"You seem to have found out," she returned; and I was struck with the rich beauty of her voice. Her tones implied no coarse defiance, neither did they betray any fear.

Vaguely realising her remark was in some way conclusive, but still feeling a deep interest, I cast about for something to say next. At length I succeeded.

It was—"What shall we do?" It seemed rather irrelevant, but I did not mind so long as I said something

Digitized by Google

"I suppose you're going to lock me up, aren't you?"

Disregarding this suggestion entirely, I asked: "Whatever made you do it? Do you want money badly?"

"I don't," she returned with earnest emphasis on the pronoun, "but others do, and it is my mission to help them."

My mystification grew, and releasing her wrist, I asked her to follow me to the light of a near street lamp. When we both were beneath its full glow, I scrutinised her intently, with a rudeness ruder than her designs on my property had been. The inspection filled me with wonder. She looked a mere child—a veritable baby, I thought—and truly her face bore an expression of pensive divinity. In fact I was so amazed, that at that moment, slight as she was, she could have knocked me down and plundered me had she so wished, without any fear whatever.

"Forgive me, sir, I did not know you."

With slowly subsiding surprise, and accumulating interest I cried:

"Heaven above, child, you should not have attempted that; why did you not ask me for help? Don't you know your own——"

Here I abruptly stopped, fearing she might misconstrue the intent of my compliment.

"Forgive me, sir, I did not know you," she rejoined; and the glistening pleading of her eyes found a direct and tumultuous response in the rugged depths of my emotion. A lump of choking tears rose in my throat as in a half fever I gulped:

"Here, take it, little one, take it all!" And straightway upon this I proceeded to divest myself of every valuable I had about me. I pressed her to receive them, for I was beside myself with compassion for this strange misplaced little creature.

"No, no," she hurried to rejoin. "I cannot take it now. Here is the purse I stole—take it back please—take it." She faltered a moment, and then in a voice of perfect pain sobbed:

"God help me, whom have I tried to rob."

In the true fulness of my heart I answered:

"Someone less deserving than yourself, child. Don't, little one, don't grieve any more; your tears unman me."

Hastily turning I wiped one, of my personal conception, away. I struck it away, half in shame.

Her tiny hand fell within mine, but I dared not press it, lest it should vanish.

"Forgive me," she said. "Forgive me and let me go. May your goodness turn to your own reward. Forgive me, sir, and let me go." Upon which she moved as though to depart. I started. Let her go?—this tiny, heavenly little thing with hair like bronze hyacinths, this mite of perfect purity, rusting on a mound of vice? Let her go—how could I?

"Who are these people you work for?" I questioned at last, with half-shaped indignation.

"My blind husband and his son!"

I started again, exclaiming:

"Your son?"

"No, one by his first wife."

"Can I see them?" I next asked her.

"Yes, come with me."

Started on our way, I requested her, with as much considerate reticence as the circumstances permitted, to tell me her history: and these are the words in which she gave it.

Readers will notice she commenced with: "When quite a tiny child." I laughed at this consumedly, but she didn't mind.

"When quite a tiny child," she began, "I had strayed far away amongst the northern hills and sullen lakes. I had no home that I knew of, and in all truth I was a waif.

"This night was peculiarly dark, but yet I had no fear. I knew there to be danger all about me, but I did not care. I only strayed on and on, very hungry and very cold.

"Between two low ranges of hills, deep in the valley, a black river lay, stagnant and still. On either side it was embanked with tall green weeds, seeming to have a wonderful fascination for me. People used to say I was a strange child, and I believe I must have been, because some folks said I was mad.

"Well, I was standing by the edge of this river wondering. I wondered why it was really so black and nasty, and yet so lovely to me. Once or twice I felt I wanted to throw myself in and never come out again, but I didn't do so, as you see.

"Walking on a little way, I came to a place where the bank rose high. I stood on the extreme edge to see the picture of myself in the water below. I was so engaged when a wild duck flew shrieking from amongst the weeds, startling me, and giving me a very hard knock. In a second I lost my footing, overbalanced, and fell splashing into the water.

"I wasn't frightened, that I remember, but I knew no more until I found myself in a little hut with my present husband and his wife standing over me. He had saved me, and I was grateful, so far as I knew how.

"The accident had no ill effect upon me, but it had upon the man who had risked his life for me.

"From that day his sight gradually faded, until he eventually became quite blind. On the same day, his wife, who had been a mother to me, died in giving birth to a son.

"The doctor said my saviour's blindness was entirely due to the immersion, and just imagine how I blamed myself."

I could not imagine why she did blame herself, and I made intimation to that effect. Although she was speaking without emotion, and afterwards silently heard my attempts at her justification, I saw she meant what she said and continued to blame herself accordingly. The thread of her story was resumed.

"This calamity took from him all means of subsistence, between which and his wife's death his life became little better than a blank. But I remembered his goodness to me, and did all in my power to comfort him. He was genuinely appreciative, and although when he asked me to marry him I was greatly surprised, I did so from pure gratitude and—and, well because I did not love anyone else. But matters all went sadly; we found it hard to live, and so we came here. He earns a little by playing a harmonium, and I—well you know all about that, sir. Circumstances have forced me in league with others of the same set, and they help us when business is bad. I am not expert, but I have never been caught till now. It seems like an intervention of fate; I mean that my first—well that you should have been so good and forgiving. I hate doing it—hate it, but think of all he has done for me and the gratitude I owe him. Think of it."

She stopped, and I saw the glistening tears falling down her cheeks. Oh, how I pitied her! pitied her with a depth of sadness, deeper than the mysteries of the stars.

"But this son of his?" I queried. "Can he do nothing?"

"Nothing at all. He's undersized—a dwarf, and only half-witted; so I work for them both."

Thereupon I was about to make some speculative remark—or more probably, a fool of myself—when my companion intimated we had reached our destination. As we traversed the cramped back entrance of an isolated house, we were immediately greeted with a weird dreamy melody, floating sadly on the sullen air. It was one of those expressive tunes, enabling a man to conjure in one vast array all the phantoms of a morbid imagination. The strangest of earthly emotion fell through the mesh of those sobbing tones.

"Don't want one," rejoined the man ungraciously.

As my guide opened the door of the chamber from whence the music proceeded it suddenly stopped, and the performer addressed the entering souls, in accents which must have delighted the very deuce, making him, or it, drunk with anticipation.

I looked around me. The cold barrenness of the room suggested itself as an ugly relation to the ugliest aspect of a haunted house—forsaken alike of God and man.

I looked again when these sensitising influences had prepared me for improving stages of development.

The man behind the instrument seemed somehow to express a mute but perfect conception of a better world than this for his own especial delectation. Had it not been for his scalding opprobriums upon our entrance, I might have liked him. He was new and novel. His face was pale, his eyes closed, and a rich, unkempt fibre bristled about his lips, chin, and neck.

His raiment was poor—a condition evident in everything material about him.

Recumbent upon a ragged coat in one corner of the room was the dwarf half-wit. His skin was yellow and his forehead receding, but admitting phrenology's capability of truth, this creature should have been of constant purpose and benevolence.

"I have brought a visitor," said my companion by way of introduction.

"Don't want one," rejoined the man ungraciously.

"But he's a friend," the woman persisted.

"I'd rather you brought an enemy," rejoined the man again, still more ungraciously.

I nearly groaned, but with a manly and commendable effort recovered myself sufficiently to say:

"Yes, I'm a friend. I want to help you. I want to stop this——" I hesitated.

"Well?" said the man. "What next?"

"Your little wife here——" But before I completed the phrase, his exuberant petulance made such a raid on his feelings that he was compelled to strike a discordant groan from the instrument, which probably was more expressive and less harsh than my word might have been.

That there is anything reassuring about my voice I am not aware, but in a strange way the man's demeanour grew cautiously trustful.

"To wish to do good by humanity," said he, "proclaims the inveterate foolishness of wisdom; and to do good, argues an unhealthy lack of selfishness."

"But look at my motive!" I urged in my unsullied innocence.

"You mean look at my wife," he replied; and then a deep silence fell, broken only by the snoring of the half-wit. Presently the blind man ground another and harsher discord from the vitals of his harmonium and called out:

"Judas!" Then turning to me he said:

"We called him Judas, because he betrayed his mother unto Death."

The boy so addressed sprang up, bending a filmy eye upon me.

"Is this person a traitor, Judas—can you tell?"

The boy scanned me from toe to crown slowly, closed his eyes, and as slowly opened them again, saying in a low, soft voice:

"No; he is true."

I am essentially a man of first impressions, and from that moment I liked the boy. Furthermore, I saw in him a power by which his blind father might be swayed, and I blessed him accordingly.

The man arising, took my hand and pressed it. In fact, the trio took my hands between them, each pressing their portion. Having cautiously felt my way I broached the subject which, through the fulness of my own nature, and my interest in the woman, had spontaneously sprung upon my mind a new birth.

I told them I was a lone strange man for whom life had no consuming interest—that I was rich but without a call to do good. Would they please press my heart as they had done my hand? Would they pardon me and receive my help? They must not feel hurt, but weigh my words in a true measure. Would they help me to a useful life?—live upon me as a favour to myself? They would—yes—I felt assured they would; and as a result of my earnest solicitations they did. Consequently, in a very little while I had them established with me, a trinity of useful souls and interests.

Judas, the half-wit, entered.

CHAPTER II.

A glorious golden summer beamed and languished, giving sufficient warmth to last us during the spell of its burial and resurrection. We kept beyond the spiky pale of the world, benignly pitying alike its urbanity and vice. A rose ridden cottage, with a sea of summer flowers surrounding, held us and our secrets aloof from all outlying distraction. Our futures were like the dim blue hills in the distance—buried in haze, but withal, enticing.

Looking back, I can see even now in my mind's eye the best radiance of all; the tiny woman laving so to speak in the sleepy ocean of garden flowers.

She seemed like a rarely beautiful giant lily, animated with breath of the Divine to tell the earth of an unknown Heaven. She ever appeared to me—as she had upon my first beholding her—as a baby angel.

I thought of her—I dreamt of her—I loved her. My whole life became absorbed in her happiness. From my mind—she called it a kingdom—I fashioned forth heavens, with her like upon each throne. Many were the conversations in which I betrayed these visioned realms. Day after day would we together glorify these continued dreams, until I at length discovered that in the respect as she was indispensable to me so was I to her. At this consummation I trembled—why, I cannot say. I loved her, 'tis true; but I loved her quite innocently. I loved her as a child—an ambition. I loved her with the strength of sunfire, sucking dry the bosom of the desert, and I trembled at my own power.

Despite this passion, however, this all abandoning love, I always remembered my duty to the others—father and son. We—the quartette complete—spent long hours together, happily talking and discussing, and sometimes listening whilst the blind man played.

In my favour, but next to the beautiful woman, the half-witted boy held position.

The rooms I had chosen for my own use were at the top of the cottage, so that I could sit and watch—watch and with my eyes devour—the woman, as she lingered among the roses.

I used to see her burst upon the rose-decked lattice, like a new Parnassus, where all the Muses sat.

Here, by my window, the boy would often join me, and we would sit and watch together, mutely drinking her loveliness. A strange wild fire would leap into the dwarf's expressionless eyes, whenever they lighted on her, his father's wife. I could not understand it, and feared it consequently. His eyes, so generally lustreless, seemed on these occasions to absorb all surrounding light, so much so as to render me for the time being unconscious of almost everything save themselves.

With the one propitious circumstance, the occurrence was invariable. Their blazing radiance, portentously blended itself with my ever-present fancy of the woman. Their fire swarmed about me, and yet I could prevision no disaster.

One unusually sombre night a little before Eastertide, when I thought all except myself had retired, I was sitting reading, as was my wont. The fire burnt freely, but the lamp had burned dim. At the first weak flutter of its dying flame I put down my book and lay back, placidly musing. Fancy took his flight, and my senses were just about to succumb to their own lethargic influences when I was aroused by a knock at my chamber door.

"Come in!" I said, startled and surprised.

Judas, the half-wit, entered. In the spectral dancing of the fire flame his face appeared ashen and grey, and its yellow parchment skin was more than usually roughly drawn. I saw he wore a dressing-gown, as though he had recently and hurriedly left his bed.

I almost shuddered as I looked. Although his eyes were, as usual, half closed, something told me the sometime mystery in their depths had deepened.

He sat down, paused, and then spoke.

"We are on the eve of the Crucifixion, aren't we? That's when the Master died to save the thing He loved; the world that is—the world which didn't love Him in return. Never mind, He died all the same. No sacrifice was too great, or had a second consideration. He humbled Himself, denied Himself, became worldly, and because people whom He loved wouldn't die for His sake, well He died for theirs. Judas betrayed Him and he died too—repentant, I believe. Never mind!"

He paused, and in that moment I felt a revelation was about to burst upon me. His eyes opened vacantly, and as he resumed, his voice sank lower than ever, containing a strange, sweet ring.

"Father's a poor useless man," he began; and for my life I could not then have denied him the belief.

"Yes, a poor weak man, and very much in the way of other's happiness. His wife's a very wonderful—a beautiful and wonderful woman—almost an angel. She is good, and deserving of happiness. But I say, how can she be happy with father or—or me? You are fairly good, and with good influences might be useful to God's world. Tell me, is it wrong to love when you can't help it—no matter where you put your love? Tell me that."

I felt his eyes, the sight of his soul going through me, and a painful blush sprang from my heart, suffusing my face as I answered:

"I don't know!" my head drooped.

"You say you don't know, well, I should say not. Who can help themselves?—never mind."

He paused again, and a look of genuine emotion lit the icy hardness of his face.

"Who can help loving my father's wife?" he asked. "Not me, not you, nor yet the angels who envy her. The world she loves, therein she should rightly reign; and that world is not my heart, nor my father's heart, nor the world of weary gratitude! None of these."

I was stung to the quick. I was mad. I spoke but cannot now remember my words.

Gasping with fear, awe, and sinful expectation, I sank back again. The long restrained burden of my love had made me capable of Hells.

"Gratitude," he continued, "dies on the threshold of love. Now listen—listen well. Would you like to be alone with—with——?"

I sprang up with a rasping moan. I shrieked: "Your father, boy, your father! Think—he lives!"

"He might die!" rejoined the boy measuredly.

"God! no, no, no! not that," I shrieked again.

"Why not? What sacrifice is too great?" said he.

The blood leapt to my head like beads of molten lead. I sweated and quaked—I groaned.

The boy knew me; he saw as clearly as the scintillant stars; this knowledge encompassed my whole being. I dared not answer him. I dared not stay him. I dared not consent. I was dead to all save fear and love—my consuming love for the woman. His next words I remember only as a fantastic dream, thrust within the chaos of latent reason.

"You are not well—you shiver and yet will not die. You will not die—will not; that I know. You are not meant to die, and yet somebody has to die. The only way to diet an infant is to tempt with various things, and mark the one chosen. Everything earthy is an infant—an infant of Nature's. Rivers are infants and require feeding, and should they vomit afterwards you must change the food."

I was conscious of another pause here, during which a vague understanding of his meaning bent my thoughts.

Continuing he said:

"This is the eve of the great world romance. The eve of Death, of Burial, and of Resurrection. Such death was at once encompassing, and self encompassed, and yet not sinful. I must remember that, must think of it, and remember. I have power and resource. The blind man depends on me, and is the mere breath of my nostrils.

"Rivers like human food. Sometimes they vomit, and sometimes they devour. You are unwell. Never mind, you will recover!"

Recalling in the extremity of all horror this significant scene again with its gall and inhuman delight, I remember him drawing from his vest a red rose. He kissed it first, then flung it upon the floor, mutilating it beyond recognition. It was one she had given him.

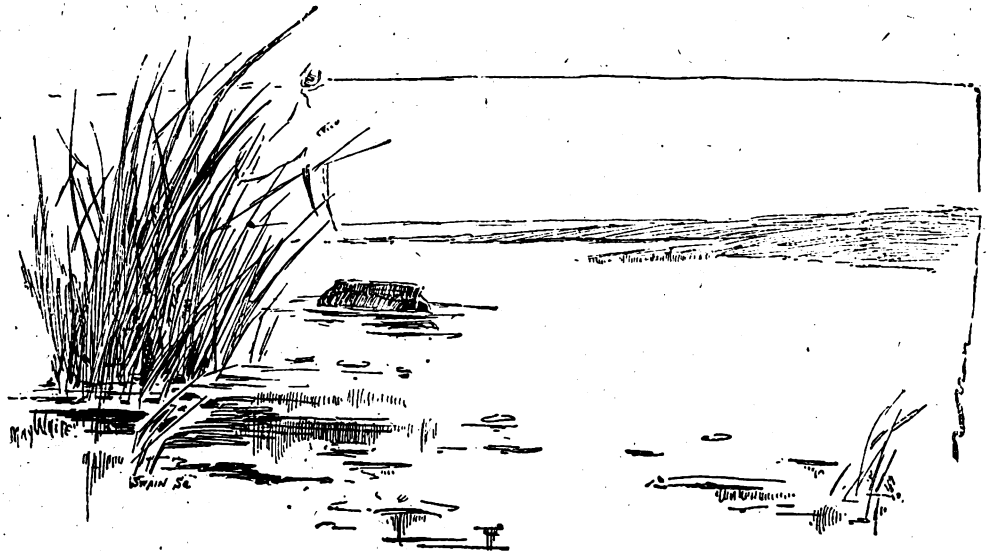
Shortly after midday on the day of All Holiness, the boy Judas rowed his blind father far down the silver stream. The gathering treachery burst. The poor old man bent his head, ploughed the seared furrows of his eyes, and then shrieked and shrieked again.

With a sudden turn the boat capsized, and an hour afterwards two stark bodies threaded their way through the nausea of weed, scum, and bubble, down to the raging sea.

DUNSTAN DENN.



Down to the raging sea.

A WOMAN'S RING.

"I suppose it must go; there is no help for it." Her voice choked a little as she spoke the words, and her long, slim fingers trembled as they came in contact with the little gold hoop with the single brilliant in it. There was a quivering of her pale lips, too, and just the semblance of a tear glistened in the corner of her eye. But it was there only a moment. With a hasty and impatient movement, as if angry with herself at having given way to the sudden weakness, she brushed the tiny drop away and forced a laugh, harsh and unreal.

"Poor old Jack; I wonder where you are now. In your grave or out of it?"

And she fell into another reverie, slipping the ring on her finger, and letting the dull light flash and glitter on the lovely diamond.

Three years ago Jack had given it to her; the date was stamped on her memory. She had forgotten thousands of other things far more inportant, but she remembered that lovely evening in August when they drifted together down the river. The sky was red with the setting sun, and the calm water looked like blood beneath the crimson clouds. They had had a jolly day, a day never to be forgotten, a day of joy and happiness to them both.

In the sweet solitude there had been no one to disturb them, and they had landed on a little island. Lost in the leafy shadows, they watched the sun vanish and night give place to day. And when she got home, weary, but palpitating with the recollection of the day and of the evening, she found the ring on her finger. Jack had slipped it on as she lay in his arms—perhaps it wasn't right, but how could she, a poor weak woman, help herself?—besides, Jack had promised to marry her when he came back, so what did it matter?

In a week Jack had gone, called away on foreign service, and from that day, when they parted at the railway station, and the train rolled out of the station, to the waving of handkerchiefs and "The Girl I Left Behind Me," she had never received so much as a line from him.

Her letters, too, were returned marked "Not known." At first she gave way to passionate fits of tears, but growing calmer, she resigned herself, a something telling her that she had muddled the address, and that he would come back to her and fulfil his pledge some day. This calmed her, and became her one fixed idea.

And so three years slipped away; many things happened, and still she cherished the little gold circle with the great glittering stone in it, even though scores of little treasures dear to her with a great and tender remembrance had gone to the pawnbroker.

That is how she was situated. She had been out of an engagement for close upon a twelvemonth; no one would have her; the agents shook their heads when she called upon them. She had grown tired of their silly grins and repulsive familiarities, and she had given up calling and resigned herself to her fate.

And yet she could dance and sing, had a picturesque little face, and rounded limbs. There were plenty of girls on the stage who had neither, and yet fortune smiled on them and managers paid them big salaries. And the agents spoke of them quite respectfully, and had their photographs pinned all over their walls. It was hard luck, that it was, nothing more or less.

However, there was no good fighting against it. One must live, and there was only one way to do it. At least, there were other ways, but Nellie had always kept straight. She felt that she should hear from Jack one day, and she didn't mean to do as other girls had done.

So one by one her little trinkets and trifles vanished into the pawnbrokers' shops, and now nothing remained but Jack's ring. And over that she cried; it gave her a wrench to part with it. Still it must go; it would keep her alive for a long time to come, and life was worth more than silly sentiment.

Besides, in a week or two managers would be filling up their vacancies for the pantomimes, and there was always a chance for her. But it was silly wasting time in this way. She would put on her hat and coat, and slip round to old Emanuel's at once. If she hesitated much longer, her courage might fail her altogether, and the ring be locked up again, in its covering of tissue paper. That would be stupid.

Old Martin, her landlady, was crying out for her rent. And there was nothing to eat in the house, and she was ravenous. It was no earthly good starving, that wouldn't get her an engagement, at least, not in this world. And an engagement in the next wouldn't be of much use.

So she popped on her hat and coat, and put on her gloves, wondering the while what that old skinflint, Emanuel, would give on it. The aged one was in a good humour; in fact, quite genial, and handed over quite a handful of glittering, clinking, musical sovereigns.

* * * * *

"You'll be a fool to return it." Susie jerked out the words with spiteful emphasis. "If you don't want the thing, do as I do."

"What's that?" Nellie asked innocently.

"Take it to the people it came from—you'll find their names just inside the case—and ask them how much was paid for it. When they tell you, offer to sell it 'em back at a reduction. They'll take it like a shot, for, don't you see, they'll make two profits and yet have the things to sell again. That's what I do with half the things left at the stage door for me. I don't want them; the money's far more useful, I can assure you, and if you're not a fool you'll do the same."

It was a pretty enough little bracelet, attached by a blue ribbon to a visiting card bearing a name and a few lines scribbled in pencil: "Will Miss Daltry honour an ardent admirer of her talents and beauty by accepting this trifle, and may he hope to be granted the pleasure of her company at supper to-morrow evening?"

Nellie didn't know who the ardent admirer was, nor did she possess any desire to make his acquaintance. The note could be left to take care of itself, but the bracelet—what was to be done with it? Susie's advice was practical, and early the following morning she did not hesitate to carry it out.

They gave her fifteen guineas for it, about half its real value, Susie said. But she didn't care if she had been swindled. All she wanted the money for was to get Jack's ring out of pawn, and fifteen guineas would do that easily, and leave a bit over. "Jack's ring, Jack's ring;" even the passers-by in the street seemed to be shouting the words in her ear, and the very cabs and omnibuses rumbled it out as they ploughed through the mud.

With a light heart Nellie rushed to the theatre. There was a "call" for rehearsal of the chorus, some new business was to be introduced, and all day long the girls hung about the cold and draughty stage whilst the stage-manager and the author squabbled about this, that, and the other. After the evening performance Nellie crawled home, weary and shivering. It was too late to get Jack's ring out of pawn; she would make that her first business the next morning. It would be quite like old times to have it back again. Yes, just like old times.

"She's in a state of high fever," said the doctor, as he felt Nellie's burning wrist, "and you mustn't let her move on any account."

For days she tossed on her hard little iron bedstead, muttering deliriously about a ring and calling upon some one, vaguely named Jack, to marry her, and take her away from her solitude, misery, pinching, and screwing, and temptation. Poor old Martha didn't know what she meant, and she didn't trouble to find out as long as the fifteen guineas lasted out.

Regularly each week she helped herself to the little store, and when the last sovereign melted away, Nellie, as thin as a lath and as shaky as a blade of grass blown by the wind, began to sit up and to smile in her old way at the doctor when he said she was pulling through all right, and would be well and strong in a week or two. Then the good Martha began to ask her when and how a fresh supply of the needful would be forthcoming.

Nellie listened listlessly to her grumblings and growlings; the doctor's warning that she was not to attempt to return to her old pursuit affected her more keenly. What was she to do? She had no money, everything of value was pawned, and Jack's ring had not yet been redeemed. That worried her more than anything else. Suppose he was to return suddenly and to find that she had parted with his gift? What would he say?

The thought haunted her night and day, but it gave her strength to grow well again. She was determined to get that ring back again somehow. She accepted an engagement at an East-end music-hall—anything was better than idly lounging about—and danced and sang her heart out.

Every week she put a trifle by, and each Saturday she opened the little tin money-box and counted out the sixpences and shillings. She might have filled the box with sovereigns a dozen times over if she had accepted only a few of the invitations that were showered upon her; but whenever she felt weak and tired of the dull grind she kissed Jack's photograph, and comforted herself with the thought that he would return directly and carry out what he had promised, and they would go away from the hateful scenes and associations for ever.

It took a long time to save up the right amount, but in time it was got together, and with a beating heart Nellie rushed to Emanuel's.

"Diamond ring, miss? Oh, yes, I remember. Ticket ran out a long time ago and it's been sold."

"Sold!"

"Yes, miss, sold last night, strange to say. Who bought that diamond ring, Isaacs?" He called out to his assistant. "Wasn't it a gent with a fair moustache?"

"Yes. Said he'd come from Africa or somewhere."

Nellie staggered from the shop, weak and helpless. It was raining heavily, and a cutting east wind tore down the streets. But heedless of both she wandered about crying softly, and clutching the worn leather purse in which lay her little store of silver, so carefully gathered. It was all of no use now; time and energy had alike been wasted.

She went home and flung herself on her bed just as she was, in her wet and mud-splashed things, and cried herself to sleep.

Presently she awoke. The opening of the door had disturbed her, and she raised her swollen eyelids slowly and languidly. Then she was conscious of a man's face peering into her own, of a man's arms round her, and of a man's lips pressed to her hot, dry lips.

"I have found you at last, little one," said a voice softly, as in a dream. It was the voice of Jack that she heard dimly and distantly. "Yes, I've found you at last. The ring did it. I saw it in a shop window, and the man told me your address. It was only last night, dear, and here I am, and here is the ring again, and neither of us three will ever be parted again."

The sound of his voice was music in her ears. Her throat was too hot and dry to speak, and her tongue refused to move, it was so swollen and heavy. She simply lay there looking at his dear old face, bronzed and anxious, but not changed one whit since that day on the river. She tried hard to speak, but it was useless; an iron hand gripped her throat and slowly choked the life out of her.

She felt him slip the ring on her finger; and with an effort she raised her hand—how heavy it was—! to her lips and kissed the cold, glittering stone. Then a mist came across her eyes; she sighed once—it was a sigh of quiet happiness—and her head sank back on the pillow.

And outside the rain beat pitilessly against the window-pane, and old Martha fidgeted in the hall for the rent that was three weeks overdue.

The Coiners:

AN ADVENTURE IN BIRMINGHAM.

I.

DURING the year 1860 London was flooded with counterfeit coin. It was so well manufactured that it passed readily. The evil at last became so great the authorities requested that a skilful detective might be sent to ferret out the nest of coiners. I was fixed upon to perform that duty.

I had nothing to guide me. The fact, however, that Birmingham was the city where the counterfeit coin was most abundant, led me to suspect that the manufactory might be somewhere within its limits. It was, therefore, to the capital of the Midlands that I first proceeded. I spent five weeks in that city without gaining the slightest clue to the counterfeiters.

I began to grow discouraged, and really thought I should be obliged to return home without having achieved any result. One day I received a letter from my wife requesting that I would send her some money, as she was out of funds. I went into a bank and asked for a cheque, at the same time handing a sum of money to pay for it, in which there were several half sovereigns. The clerk pushed three of the half sovereigns back to me.

"Counterfeit," he said.

"What!" said I, "do you mean to tell me those half sovereigns are counterfeit?"

"I do."

"Are you certain?"

"Perfectly certain. They are remarkably well executed, but they are deficient in weight. See for yourself."

And he placed one of them in the scales against a genuine half sovereign on the other side. The latter weighed down the former.

"That is the best executed counterfeit coin I ever saw in my life," I exclaimed, examining it very closely. "Is all the counterfeit money in circulation here of the same character as this?"

"Oh, dear no," replied the clerk; "it is not nearly so well done. These are the work of Ned Wilson, the famous counterfeiter. I know it well, for I have handled a great deal of it in my time. Here is some of the money that is in circulation here," he added, taking several half-sovereigns from a drawer. "You see, the milling is not nearly so perfect as Ned Wilson's, although it is pretty well done, too."

I compared the two together and found that he was right. I supplied the place of the three counterfeit half-sovereigns with good coin, and returned the former to my pocket again.

A few days after this I received information which caused me to take a journey to a village situated about thirty miles from Birmingham. I arrived there at night, and took up my quarters at the only tavern in the place. It was a wretched dwelling, and kept by an old man and woman, the surliest couple, I think, it has ever been my lot to meet. In answer to my inquiry as to whether I could have lodgings there for the night, I noticed that the host gave a peculiar look at his wife, and after some whispering I was informed in the most ungracious manner possible that I could have a bed.

I have frequently in the course of my life been obliged to put up with wretched accommodation, so I did not allow my equanimity of temper to be destroyed by the miserable fare set before me, and the still more miserable sleeping apartment into which I was ushered after I had concluded my repast.

The chamber was small in size, and was certainly well ventilated, for I could see the stars peeping through the roof. The bed was simply a bag of straw thrown into one corner of the room, without sheets or covering of any kind. This last fact however was not of much consequence, as it was summer-time and oppressively hot.

I stood for more than an hour gazing out of the opening which served for a window. Before me was spread an immense landscape, the limits of which I could not see. The tavern in which I had taken up my abode appeared to be isolated from all other dwellings, and save the cry of an owl and the hum of a moth on the window-pane, not a sound reached my ears. It was a beautiful moonlight night, and so bright that I could have seen to read the smallest print.

At last I began to grow weary, and, throwing myself on my pallet, I was soon in a deep slumber. How long I slept I know not, but I was awakened by a dull sound, which resembled someone hammering in the distance. I suppose it was the peculiarity of the sound which awoke me, for it was by no means loud, but conveyed to me the idea of someone striking iron with a muffled hammer. I rose from my bed and went to the window. The moon was low in the western horizon, by which fact I knew that it must be near morning. The sound I have referred to reached me more distinctly than when in the back part of the chamber. It appeared to come from some out-houses which were situated about a hundred yards from the inn.

Now, I am naturally of an inquiring mind, and this sound, occurring as it did in the middle of the night, in such a remote, out-of-the-way place, piqued my curiosity, and I felt an irresistible desire to go out and discover the cause of it. This desire, as the sound continued, grew upon me with such intensity that I resolved to gratify it at any price.

I put on my boots, the only articles of attire I had discarded, and cautiously opening the door of my chamber, noiselessly descended the rickety staircase. A few steps brought me into the lower apartment, which I found entirely deserted. I crept quietly to the door, and, unfastening it without making the slightest noise, was soon in the moonlight.

Not a soul was visible, but the sound still continued, and grew more distinct as I approached the place whence it proceeded. At last I found myself before a long, low building, through the crevices of which I could perceive a lurid glare issuing. I stooped down and peered through the keyhole, and, to my extreme surprise, I saw half-a-dozen strong looking men, with their coats and sleeves turned up, engaged in a variety of strange occupations. Some were working at a forge, others were superintending the casting of moulds, and some were engaged in the process of milling coin. In a moment the whole truth burst upon me. Here was the gang of counterfeiters I was in search of, and the landlord and his wife evidently belonged to the same band, for in one corner I perceived them employed, the man polishing some old half-sovereign pieces just turned from the moulds, while the woman was packing the finished coins into rolls.

II.

I had seen enough, and was about to return to my apartment again when suddenly I felt a heavy hand placed on my shoulder, and, turning my head round, to my horror found myself in the grasp of as ill-looking a scoundrel as ever escaped the gallows.

"What are you doing here, my good fellow?" he exclaimed in a gruff voice, giving me a shake.

"Taking a stroll by moonlight," I replied, endeavouring to maintain my presence of mind.

"Well, perhaps you'll just take a stroll in here, will you?" returned the ruffian, pushing open the door, and dragging me in after him.

All the inmates of the barn immediately stopped work, and rushed towards us when they saw me.

"Why, what's this?" they all exclaimed.

"A loafer I found peeping outside," said the man who had captured me.

"He's a traveller that came to the tavern to-night and asked for lodgings; the last time I saw him he was safe in bed," said the landlord.

The men withdrew to a corner of the apartment, leaving one to keep guard over me. I soon saw they were in earnest consultation, and they were evidently debating some important question. The man keeping guard over me said nothing, but scowled fiercely. I had not uttered a single word during the time I had been in the barn. I was aware that whatever I might say would in all probability only do more harm than good, and it has always been a maxim of mine to hold my tongue when in doubt. At last the discussion seemed to be settled, for the blackest and dirtiest of the whole came forward, and, without any introduction, exclaimed:

"I say, my man, look here—you must die!"

I did not move a muscle, nor utter a word.

"You have found our secret, and dead men tell no tales."

I was still silent.

"We give you ten minutes to say your prayers, and also allow you the privilege of saying whether you will be hanged or shot."

Suddenly an idea struck me. I remembered something that might save my life. I burst into a violent fit of laughter—in fact it was hysterical, but they did not know that. They looked from one to the other in the greatest amazement.

"Well, he takes it mighty cool," said one.

"I suppose he doesn't know we are in earnest," said another.

"Come, come! you had better say your prayers," said the man who had just spoken; "time flies."

My only reply was a fit of laughter more violent than the first.

"The man's mad!" they exclaimed.

"Or drunk," said some.

"Well, boys," I cried, speaking for the first time, "this is the rummest go I ever heard tell on. What! hang a pal?"

"A pal!—you a pal!"

"I ain't nothing else," was my elegant rejoinder.

"What's your name?"

"Did you ever hear of Ned Wilson?" I asked.

"You may be certain of that. Ain't he at the head of our profession?"

"Well, then, I'm Ned Wilson."

"You Ned Wilson!" they all exclaimed.

"You may bet your life on that," I returned, swaggering up to the corner where I had seen the old woman counting and packing the counterfeit half-sovereigns.

Fortune favoured me. None of the men present had ever seen Ned Wilson, although his reputation was well known to them, and my swaggering, insolent manner had somewhat thrown them off their guard, yet I could plainly see that all their doubts were not removed.

"And you call these things well done, do you?" I asked, taking up a handful of the money. "Well, all I can say is that if you can't do better than this, you had better shut up shop, that's all."

"Can't you show us anything better?" asked one of the men.

"I rather think I can. If I couldn't I'd go and hang myself."

"Let's see it," they cried.

This was my last coup, and one on which I knew my life depended.

"Lookee here, gentlemen," I exclaimed, taking one of the counterfeit half-sovereigns from my pocket, which had been rejected at the bank. "There's my last job; what do you think of it?"

It was passed from hand to hand, some saying it was no counterfeit at all, others saying that it was.

"How will you prove it is a counterfeit?" asked one of the men.

"By weighing it with a genuine one," I replied.

This plan was immediately adopted, and the character of the coin proved.

"Perhaps he got this by accident," I heard one of the men whisper to another.

"Try these," said I, taking the other two from my pocket.

All their doubts now vanished.

"Beautiful!" exclaimed some. "Splendid!" said others.

When they had examined it to their satisfaction they all of them cordially shook me by the hand, every particle of doubt having vanished from their minds. I carried out my part well. Some questions were occasionally asked me involving some of the technicalities of the businesss. These, however, I avoided by stating that I was on a journey of pleasure, and would much rather drink a glass of whisky than answer questions. The whisky was produced, and we made a night of it, and it was not until morning had dawned that we separated.

The next day I returned to Birmingham, brought down the necessary assistance, and captured the whole gang of counterfeiters in the very act. The den was broke up for ever, and most of them were condemned to serve a term of years in one of Her Majesty's prisons.

I have these counterfeit half-sovereigns still in my possession, and intend never to part with them, for they were certainly the means of saving my life.

The Mistake I Made

The little girl was too charming to be resisted. In vain I called to my aid all the gravity and soberness that beseemed my age. In vain I held myself to myself as a person already within the verge of old fogeydom. In vain I propounded and solved elaborate arithmetical problems as to the variable proportions which sixteen would assume to forty at advanced stages of life. I know that last sentence is not correctly expressed, but let it pass. Thus stood the case: Charlotte was sixteen and I forty, and I, more than double Lotty's age—almost old enough to be her respectable papa—I found myself irretrievably enslaved by that young person, and trotting captive at her chariot-wheels—or more properly, the wheels of her infantine go-cart.

I had nursed Lotty, she had ridden a cock-horse upon my knee. I had kissed her moist lips when kissing was a ceremony performed rather for the sake of politeness to mamma than for any pleasantness in itself. I had made Lotty ill with surreptitious sugar plums; I had presented her with Christmas boxes of the most astonishing toys; I had assisted in the instilling of the alphabet into her youthful mind by means of highly coloured pictures in a painful state of alliteration; I had begged Lotty out of the corner, where she stood obstinate, finger in mouth, and with a general humidity of countenance.

I had thought Lotty a dirty child when I saw her paddling with her little fat hands in a puddle, or with traces of lollipops about her innocent mouth. I had execrated Lotty as a nuisance and a bore when she would poke her pug nose into my flirtation with Miss Mirables (who married afterwards Lord Methuselah). And at last it had come to this! We had changed places. I was the child now, and Miss Lotty was mistress over me and she knew it. She threw me a sugar plum when she so pleased; she taught me a letter of some sweet sibilating alphabet when she had nothing better to do; she patronised me, and began to take an interest in my temper and morals; she petted me when she lacked amusement, and when she was otherwise engaged gave me to understand in the plainest manner that I was a consummate bore, and an unmitigated nuisance.

Miss Lotty knew all about it. In vain I tried to treat her as a child. She laughed in my face at the transparent absurdity of the pretence. In vain I affected indifference. She exacted attention, and would not be snubbed. She flirted with small boys for the express purpose of vexing me, and knew that I was vexed, and I knew that she knew it.

In what manner or at what precise time she left off being a child and began to be a woman I do not know. She passed out of the nursery by no sensible transition, and took to her Missdom quite naturally. Juliet of the house of Capulet, brought out by her provident mother at the age of fourteen, did not assume her new honours with a more perfect coolness.

This, then, was the state of the case. I, who had overlived my youthful heart weaknesses, who prided myself on being safe henceforth from the subtlest fascinations of the female sex, fell into captivity at the hands of a little girl just out of the nursery. Having struggled in vain, I succumbed, and began to think seriously whether sixteen and forty were, after all, such incompatible ages. It was not quite a case of January and May. If I had been sixty and a lord, there would have been nothing unusual in the notion. If I had been a widower, and possessed a daughter a little older than Lotty, the match would have been perfectly en règle. The difference was on the right side. It was not as bad as if I had married my first love, who was forty when I was sixteen.

So I ceased to compare myself with the small boys with whom Lotty flirted. I turned a blind eye on the budding obesity of my figure, and began to consider the matter as an accomplished fact. Miss Lotty had an aunt—a very respectable person—of mature age. Miss Sims was the name of this lady, and Miss Sims and I had always been great friends. She was a gushing person, strongly sympathetic, and given to the study of the minor poets of the last generation. We had often exchanged sympathies, had often discoursed together on the affections after a diluted platonic manner, and she was accustomed to apply to me for explanations of namby-pamby passages of her favourite poets.

Charlotte was sixteen.

Miss Sims occupied the place in the family which maiden aunts so often fill. To make things generally pleasant, to be a general go-between, the friend of everybody, the deliverer of messages, the arranger of the delicate amenities of social life—such was Miss Sims' mission.

Her age was certainly verg-ing towards fifty. She was well preserved; had expressive eyes, hair scrupulously neat, but very thin, white angular hands, faint smile, and a purring sort of voice.

I respected Miss Sims immensely; I had a great friendship for her. The idea struck me that I would make her my confidante with regard to Lotty. She was the very person for a confidante. I could not for the life of me have broken the subject to papa and mamma. Lotty was a child to them still, and I felt that it would scarcely have seemed more ridiculous to them for me to confess a tender passion for the infant in long clothes than to hint the state of my heart towards Lotty. I had determined to make some move, and the aunt appeared to me the very medium through whom to make it. The familiar friend of Lotty, to whom that little maiden confessed all her innocent secrets — the companion and fellow-councillor of Lotty's parents — this aunt was just the confidante I wanted.

Lotty and her mamma were going forth on the business of card-leaving.

But, beyond this, I felt sure that the state of the case had not altogether escaped the sympathetic penetration of Miss Sims. That faint smile of hers, that wistful look in her fine eyes, a playful shake of the head sometimes, the pressure of a kind hand—these signs had not been lost upon me. Often, when my eyes had been following against their will the graceful, buoyant figure of Lotty, they would meet the eyes of Miss Sims; and as I smiled and half blushed at being thus caught, Miss Sims would smile and half blush likewise. Often, when I had been leaning over Lotty at her book, admiring the downward contour of the soft cheek, or the luxuriance of the glossy hair, lifting my eyes, they would again meet Miss Sims' eyes, and Miss Sims would turn her head away with an expression of countenance which spoke volumes.

Once, when I was shaking Miss Sims' hand on departure, I could not restrain myself from whispering: "Qu'elle est charmante?" Why I spoke in French I cannot tell. Miss Sims' knowledge of that language was imperfect, while Lotty's exceeded my own—so that it could not have been an aside from Lotty. But such French sentences are generally spoken without there being any satisfactory reason why they should not be uttered in English. However, to my exclamation, Miss Sims had rejoined: "Hush!" with an upraised bony finger, and an arch smile.

In breaking the matter to Lotty's aunt, then, I did not anticipate very much difficulty. She certainly had observed my admiration of her niece; and even had it been otherwise, the ready sympathy of this kind, estimable woman would have interpreted my meaning from a word or look.

I chose my time. I was copying some music for Lotty. Lotty and her mamma were going forth on the business of card-leaving.

As I took them down to the carriage, Lotty said: "You will finish my music?" And she made the prettiest beseeching moue, and lifted her face, just as when a child she had lifted it up to be kissed. "We shall soon be back, and you can stay to dinner. You must stay to dinner. The evenings are so dull and stupid, and then you can sing that duet with me. Now, go back and finish the music. You and Aunt Sarah can talk poetry, you know, till I come back."

"Yes, Miss Lotty, I had that very intention of talking poetry with Aunt Sarah—the sweetest poetry in the world—yourself the theme."

Returned to Miss Sims and the music copying, I made a crochet—"Miss Sims," I said—then two semi-quavers and a rest, then three blank bars.

"Miss Sims," I said, "I hope you will not see anything absurd in what I am about to—to—to lay before you," crescendo, written in neat italics.

"My heart——"

"Dear me!" cried Miss Sims.

"My heart, my dear Miss Sims, may be of a soft and foolish texture—yes, texture." (I had screwed myself up to the mark, and chose my language with deliberation.) "It may be soft, I say, but, upon my soul, I do not think it is. I think no man, the most insensate, could have seen daily, as I have seen, this sweet girl" (con molto spirito) "and have resisted her attractions. It does not lie within the power of human nature to resist them."

I was silent for a few minutes, and steadily continued my copying. I had determined to discuss the subject in the calmest and most reasonable manner. I confess the dots were scarcely circular, and the strokes scarcely straight, but I completed a most prodigious series of ad libitum before I recommenced. I dare not look at Miss Sims.

"That there is disparity in age I cannot deny. Some people would call it a great disparity——"

"Sir!" cried Miss Sims, with some warmth.

"Yes, I am not surprised at that tone. But I feel that I must bring this into prominence, and consider it judicially. I am not a young man. I cannot hide it from myself, even if I would—I am no longer young. Perhaps I have an appearance of age, a gravity, beyond my actual years."

"I think enough has been said on that part of the subject," Miss Sims interrupted me. "You lay too much stress on this point, and must be labouring, I think, under some strange misconception. After all, what does age matter—a few months more or less. It is the heart, my dear sir, the heart; the sympathy of affections, the reciprocity of ideas, the congeniality of sentiments——"

"It is like you to say so," I exclaimed. "I appreciate your kindness. We are old friends, Miss Sims——"

The expression on Lotty's face surprised me.

"Friends of long standing," Miss Sims agreed correctively.

"Friends of long standing. I knew that you would understand me. I felt that you were the best person, the only person, to whom I could first break this delicate subject. I knew that you would meet me half way."

"Oh! do not say that," sighed Lotty's aunt.

"You have seen the truth for some time," I went on. "In your eyes, in your smiles, I have read that you have discovered my secret. Woman's insight, the sympathy of a gentle nature—who can disguise such secrets from these? And now, be frank with me. I come to you in my perplexity. Do not pretend to misunderstand me. My tongue is timid. Help me—advise me!"

"Maidenly propriety!" she said, in a low tone.

"Exactly so. Your good sense and instinctive feeling of what is right prompts those words. I anticipated this. But, my dear Miss Sims, I do not wish to make you a conspirator with me. There shall be no secrets. I ask you to confess none to me. All I ask is that, as a friend, you will tell me whether there is any chance for me. You are everybody's friend—do not deprive me alone of your help."

"Really, I do not know what to say," Miss Sims whispered, in a voice greatly agitated.

I had long persevered in my music-copying. I knew that I was making the most astounding blunders, but that was of little consequence. If I left off this accompaniment I felt that my voice would break down too.

"My dear Miss Sims," I went on, "I know that your present hesitation proceeds from the best of motives. Do not think I am flattering you when I say that to your influence I attribute much of the exquisite purity of your charming niece."

This was not quite true, but I saw that a compliment would be well timed.

"She is a good child," said Miss Sims.

"I, too," I went on, "have not been blind to this gradual change, to those unfolding beauties. We are old friends, we have known each other many years. You can forgive—nay, you will sympathise with the warmth of my expressions. This gradual growth of love—what a mystery it is! 'He never loved that loved not at first sight,' says the poet. What a libel upon human nature, worthy of the gross lips that uttered it! True love is always gradual. The first indifference burgeons into liking, flowers into friendship, fruits into love. We know not where indifference ends and love begins."

In the flow of my words I flung aside my pen, and strode to the fireplace by which Miss Sims was sitting. My oratory must have been moving. Miss Sims was in tears when I next came to a pause.

She lifted her tearful eyes for a moment to mine, as I stood upon the hearthrug close by her side.

"Oh, spare me!" she said. "This tumult of feelings—so painful and yet so delicious! I am but a weak, girlish thing" (she giggled hysterically). "Leave me alone now. Some other time—some other time. I have been expecting this. I knew it must come."

"You had discovered then," I said. "I knew you had. Long ago, Miss Sims, long ago—did you not?"

"I could not be blind," she said. "Maiden modesty is very innocent; but could I help seeing?"

"Ah!" I exclaimed. "And there is hope for me?"

"What can I say? Do not press me."

"I intreat you. Say, at least, there is not despair."

"No, do not despair," she said. "I do not wish that."

We were silent for a minute or so. Miss Sims spoke first.

"You will speak to my brother!" she said, covering her face with her hand.

"Certainly. That is my intention, if you tell me I may do so. Do you think I may?"

Miss Sims looked at me between the fingers of the hand and covered her face.

"Yes," she said, "I think you may."

I deliberated.

"My dear Miss Sims," I said, "I can never sufficiently repay the kindness—the sympathy, the great sympathy—you have shown to me to-day. I am going to take advantage of this sympathy."

"Sir!" cried Miss Sims.

"Yes; gratitude consists mostly in taking advantage of the people who are kind to you. I am going to ask still greater favour of you. Will you break this matter to your brother? Will you hint my feelings to Lotty?"

"I see no occasion for that! Why to Lotty?"

"Well; I respect your prudence. No doubt you are right. To your brother, then?"

"Had not you better do that? It is so very awkward."

"My dear Miss Sims, oblige me in this. I shall be eternally indebted to you."

Miss Sims gave me her angular white hand. She looked up into my face with an expression of most intense sympathy. "I will do anything you tell me, Henry," she said—"May I call you Henry?"

"I consider it a most tender mark of your sympathy," I replied. I really thought her calling me by my Christian name, which she had never done before, a touching proof of her kind friendship.

"And now," I said, "I had better go. I am not inclined to see anyone in the present state of my feelings. When I next see you, Miss Sims, I hope to be received in this house on another—a closer and more intimate footing. I think we fully understand each other?"

"Adieu! God bless you!"

My readers, I have no doubt, see clearly the fix I had got myself into. Will they believe me when I say that I had no notion of it myself! A preoccupied man assimilates every word that is spoken to the subject of his own pre-occupation. When he enters into tender confidences, he speaks in ambiguously bashful hints, not in the precise language wherewith he would draw up his will.

I left the house with a feeling of the greatest satisfaction. The first move had been made, and made, I could not but flatter myself, with consummate address, and with a success equal to my highest hopes. This good, kind aunt of Lotty, I was deeply grateful to her, and determined that I would make her a handsome present on my wedding.

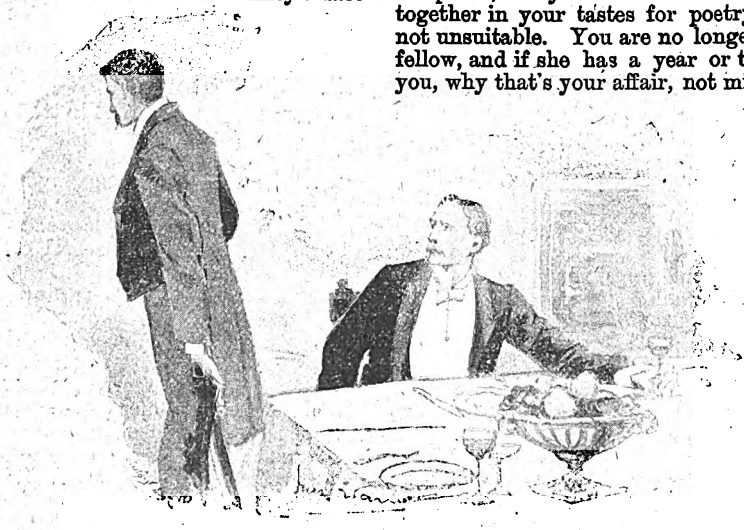
Everything went well.

The next morning I received a letter from Lotty's papa.

"I can have no objection, if you have none," he wrote. "I consent gladly to receive your visits at my house on the footing you desire. Come and dine with us at six, and we will talk it over."

* * * * *

I confess I was slightly nervous as I knocked at the Sims' door. There was a smile on the flunkey's face and an alacrity in his manner as he let me in. I saw that he knew all about it. What can we hide from these omniscient flunkeys?



I rushed from the room.

Miss Sims happened to be upon the stairs.

"How can I thank you?" I said, grasping her hand with a warmth of friendship. The flunkey had disappeared.

"Oh, Henry!" Miss Sims gasped.

Her feelings were too much for her. What a good heart this woman had to be so moved by the happiness of others. She clung to my hand, to my arm, to my shoulder, for support. She raised her eyes to mine, her face to mine—her lips; by Jove, I thought for a moment the good creature was going to kiss me.

"And how is—is—is she?" I said. "She is not unfavourable, I hope, towards my suit?"

"She is only too much blessed!" Miss Sims replied, with a smile, in which archness blended with sympathy. "Can you doubt it for a moment?"

At last I managed to reach the drawing-room door. Miss Sims would have me enter without her, for what reason I could not understand, but she professed to be too bashful and said:

"It would look so odd for us to enter together."

I was certainly very nervous. It cannot be expected that I should now relate accurately all that was said to me, and all that I said in return, when at the time itself I had no very clear notion of that same.

I stammered some sort of vague thanks and gratitude to Lotty's papa; and he said something about congratulating me in return, and then by mutual consent we suffered the conversation to turn on different subjects. Lotty's mamma helped me out of the difficulties of conversation as only a woman's fluent tongue can.

How I got through that dinner I cannot tell. The chief remembrance I have of it, is of the expression of Lotty's face.

I remember that we had champagne as upon some gala occasion. Lotty's papa drank Miss Sims' health and my health together in a humourous manner.

I was in a ghastly dream. Whether I knew the truth or did not know it I cannot tell. The dinner was over at length—the wine was put on. The ladies drank their one glass and left us.

As I opened the door for them Miss Sims whispered: "Do not be long."

We filled our glasses with claret.

"My dear fellow," said my host. "This little affair has given me the most entire satisfaction. I had not a suspicion of it.

"My sister Sarah, though I say it who shouldn't, is a most estimable person, a capital housewife, good-tempered, and you and she have always got on very well together in your tastes for poetry and so forth. Ages not unsuitable. You are no longer a chicken, my dear fellow, and if she has a year or two the advantage of you, why that's your affair, not mine. That is a matter of taste. Of course, you know that her little property amounts to a mere nothing. She has lived with us now for a number of years, and, upon my soul, I shall be sorry to lose her. But we must not be selfish in this world. Yes, I am convinced that Sarah will make you an excellent wife."

"Sir," I gasped, "there is some terrible and fatal mistake!"

"Mistake, sir?" cried my host fiercely; "what do you mean?"

"Your sister is a very respectable person," I stammered, "but I never had the remotest idea of—of——"

"Of what, sir?"

"The remotest idea of asking her to be my wife."

"Jones!" he said solemnly, "I always took you to be a man of honour. The feelings and affections of a woman are not to be played with in this atrocious manner——"

Everything swam before my eyes, the world was resolving itself again into chaos, the final collapse of all things was at hand.

Like Shylock, flung from the height of my certain hopes to ruin irretrievable and blank despair, I turned sick and faint.

"I pray you give me leave to go from hence. I am not well."

I rushed from the room—from the house.

The same night I took my passage on board an Ostend steamboat and floated in the darkness down the Thames, an exile from my native land.

That Hospitable House.

I opened my eyes and looked around me. A man was leaning over my bed; near the man stood a woman with a bonnet with great white wings on the sides, holding in her hand a moist compress. The room was plain and neat, with clean, white walls. On a table, covered with a great napkin of yellow linen, I noted a number of strange objects—rows of little phials, and a brown earthern jar filled with bits of ice. Through the muslin curtains, which flapped out from the window in the balmy air, I could see a patch of blue sky and the tops of green trees bending lightly in the breeze. Where was I? It seemed like a long dream that I had had; my head felt empty, my limbs ached, and I could not think.

The man gently lifted my head, and gave me a few drops of some liquid, which I swallowed with avidity.

"Well, Mr. Furniss," he said, "how do you feel?"

"Eh, what?" I muttered. "Where am I?"

"You are in my house, my dear sir, and we shall take good care of you. Now," he added, replacing my head on the pillow, "be quiet, and go to sleep."

I gazed at him for a long time, and all at once I recognised Doctor Bertram, the celebrated specialist in insanity. A shudder passed through my frame. Why was I in Doctor Bertram's hospital, instead of my own home in Phœnix Park, with my book, my herbs, and my microscopes around me? His hospital was for mad people!—and that Sister of Charity, those phials, that bowl of ice—Oh, heavens! I must be mad! But why—how?

"How long have I been here?" I asked, after a time.

"For four weeks, Mr. Furniss. But you must be quiet and sleep. Now do not talk."

For a month! Was it possible? What had happened. But even as I asked myself these questions, little by little I went off to sleep, and I saw in a billowy meadow, a road covered with blood and bordered on either side with monstrous microscopes shaped like trees—a road on which two little girls played at pitch and toss with a severed head, while Doctor Bertram, comically bonneted with a religious cap, rode astride a dead body, which reared and pranced and kicked till he could scarcely keep his seat.

The next morning I was better; and day by day I improved, though that horrible nightmare came to me each night. But it grew less and less distinct, and in a few weeks it almost ceased to trouble me.

One evening the doctor, whom I had not seen during the day, seated himself near my bed.

"Well," said he, feeling my pulse, "you are doing famously. I'll have you out, as good as new, in a few days. But you've had a close shave. It has been one of the prettiest cases of cerebral congestion I have ever handled—a beautiful case.

"Why, it's a wonder you are alive now. Tell me, how is your memory; can you remember what happened before you were brought here?"

"I—I don't know, I cannot think. I have passed through something fearful. What it is I cannot say. From the faint glimmer of recollection that comes to me, I have the sensation of having been dead—murdered! Oh, it is frightful. My brain is weak yet. Then, the child, a pretty golden-haired child—rolling on the floor!"

"Come, come, this will never do," said the Doctor. "You can tell me all about it in the morn——"

"No, now, Doctor," I cried. "It is coming back to me. Yes, I have it now."

Here is an exact transcript of my recital as I told it to Doctor Bertram, and, later, to the magistrate.

You know my passion for natural history. Well, scarcely a week passes that I do not go into the country botanising. That day I went to Glasnevin, where, as you know, the marshy meadows are rich in curious plants, infusoria, and diatoms. I was returning, and was almost in Dublin with my box full of rare specimens, on which I expected to make a report that would astonish the Botanical Society, when I saw a little girl, certainly not more than five or six years old, who was all alone, crying as if her little heart would break.

I approached her, but at sight of me she redoubled her cries. I could see that the little one was lost, and that she did not know where to go, so I spoke to her kindly, and, by dint of promising her unlimited sweetmeats got her to tell me that her name was Lizzie, and that she lived near Beresford Place in Lower Abbey Street. I took her hand, and we soon started off, talking like old friends.

She was a beautiful child, fresh and rosy, with great, candid eyes and fair hair, which was cut short over her eyes and fell in ringlets about her shoulders. She trotted bravely along, her soft little hand holding my great, ruddy paw confidingly. As we walked she told me remarkable tales, in which figured a big, black horse, a little knife, a doll, and a number of people I did not know.

Lizzie was afraid she would be scolded when she arrived home, but she was not, and I—I was received with transports by her mother, who was half distracted. Never was gratitude expressed so heartily and pleasantly. Who was I? Where did I live? How did I happen to find her? and a thousand like questions were showered upon me.

"Oh, Mr. Furniss," said the mother, "you are the saviour of my child! How can we express our gratitude? We are not rich, but such a debt cannot be paid in gold. How happy my husband will be to repeat my thanks to you! He is still at his office; but—will you do us a great kindness, will you honour our humble board to-morrow? I shall have a savant here like yourself, and you two will enjoy each other's company, I am sure. And my husband will be so happy to have you."

I thanked her for the invitation, and promised to be present.

At the appointed hour I was shown into their modest drawing-room, and you may be sure the husband's gratitude was no less warmly expressed than the wife's. And little Lizzie threw her arms around my neck, and showered on me the innocent caresses of a happy child. I seemed, indeed, to be one of the family.

The dinner was a merry one, the savant seemed to be an interesting man—in brief, I passed an excellent evening.

The air had been heavy the whole day, and in the evening a storm came. Thunderclaps succeeded one another without interruption, the rain fell in torrents. Whether it was the effect of the storm, of the suffocating heat, or of the wine which I had drunk, I felt a strange melancholy, I could not breathe comfortably. I was about to set out for home, however, for it was late and my house was at some distance; but they insisted that I should stay. It would be foolish to expose myself to such a tempest when I was not feeling well; the mother begged me with such good grace that I was forced to remain and pass the night in that hospitable house. They ceremoniously conducted me to my room, and there wished me good night. I remember even that Lizzie, having fallen asleep in her father's arms, I kissed her little cheek, paled by sleep, and her dimpled little arms.

Left alone, I began to undress slowly, and wandering about the room, as one always does when one sleeps in a strange place. I felt as if I should be smothered in the close atmosphere of the room. Before getting into bed, I wanted to inhale a little of the outside air, and in spite of the roaring storm, I tried to open the window. It was a false window.

"Well, well!" I exclaimed, a little surprised.

I thought I would remove the chimney screen; it was a false chimney. I rushed to the door—it was locked! Fear seized me, and, holding my breath, I listened. The house was quiet, all seemed to be asleep. Then I inspected the room carefully, straining my ears for the least sound. On the floor, near the bed, I noticed spots; it was blood—dried and blackened blood! I shuddered, and a cold sweat stood out on my forehead. Blood! Why should there be blood there? And I saw that a whole sea of blood must have been spilt there—for a great space around the hard wooden floor had been freshly scrubbed and scraped. I tried to call out.

Under the bed I had seen a man, stretched out motionless as an overturned statue. I could not cry or call out. With trembling hands I touched the man. He did not move. With trembling hands I pushed the man; he did not move. With trembling hands I seized the man by the feet and drew him forth—he was dead! His neck had been cleanly cut, as with one stroke of a razor, and the head held to the trunk only by a slender ligament.

I thought I should go mad. But something must be done—the assassin might come at any moment. I raised the body, placed it on the bed, and, having blown out the candle, I slipped under the bed. I did all this mechanically, without thought of defence or safety; it was instinct that prompted me, not intelligence or reflection.

My teeth chattered. My hands were wet with a thick moisture. I felt as if I had gone to bed in a charnel-house.

I remained there, in that awful fear, minutes, hours, months, years, centuries—I do not know how long. I lost all idea of time and place. All was silent. From without, the noise of the storm and the whistling of the wind came to me softened and sad, like moans. I could not picture to myself the assassin who was coming—who was there perhaps. In that state of horror, I could see only little Lizzie, fair, rosy, and frank, with her doll and her great hat; I could see her sleeping in her father's arms; and then she lightly raised her eyelids and disclosed her eyes, which seemed to me to be bold, inplacable, cruel, murderous.

The door opened, but as softly as the scratching of a mouse. I bit my lip till the blood came, to keep from crying out. Now a man stepped in with gliding tread, with infinite precautions to avoid touching the furniture. It seemed to me as if I could see the cruel, clutching fingers gliding over my clothes, searching my pockets. Then the steps came nearer—seemed to graze me. I felt that the man was bending over the bed; that he struck one fierce blow. Then I knew nothing more.

When I recovered consciousness, the room had become silent again. But fright held me nailed to the spot. At length I decided to escape, with what caution you may imagine. On tiptoe I gained the door, which had not been closed. Not a sound, not a breath. Feeling my way, I passed into the hall. I waited to see a head thrust suddenly from out of the shadows, a knife gleam in the dark. But no—the brute, glutted with crime, slept without remorse. I descended the stairs, drew the bolt of the door, and, half fainting, with the blood frozen in my veins, I fell into the gutter of the deserted street.

Doctor Bertram had listened to my recital with the deepest interest.

"And there I found you, Mr. Furniss, and in what a state! Could you recognise the house?"

"Yes," I replied; "but to what end?"

"Well, let me cure you, and then we shall go together to the house of these assassins."

Eight days later, the doctor and I stood in lower Abbey Street. I recognised the terrible house. All the blinds were drawn; in front of the door a placard was placed, bearing the legend: "To Let."

I inquired of the former residents from a neighbour.

"They have been gone a month and more," she replied. "It's a great pity, for they were very nice people."

THE DESERTER.

In 1864 the horrors of war spread over the South of America like a pall of death. Not only did they stalk among the soldiers to strip the rags from their backs; to starve them or to feed them on rotten meat; to place them in the deadly path of the Minie or the murderous grape; to mow them down with foul disease and loathsome suffering; but they sent conscription to feed mothers on despair and children on stones, and hunger to take up its abode at the fireside of the poor.

The facilities of the transitory and feeble government for supplying means of sustenance to poor families were inadeqate in remote and sparsely settled communities; and now that the husband, on whom had depended the livelihood of his family, had been armed with a musket and ordered to the front, there was no lack of anguish and the distressing cry of children for bread. The despairing mother wrote to her husband on paper that was blotted with tears, and from every word there stared at him the suffering faces of his children, and the imploring look that no parent can withstand.

So the staunch soldier, who could unflinchingly storm a rampart or face a cannon, and who looked upon death as his companion and honour as his future shroud, employed his affections as his gravedigger, and sneaked away in the darkness like a thief. Desertion and death were synonymous terms, and the man sacrificed his life to feed his children. Depletion of the ranks by desertion assumed such alarming proportions that the War Department stretched forth its relentless arm and stained its sword with the blood of its own men. It was not a question of bread for children, but of men for the vanguard.

Desertion was, in point of number, equivalent to death on the battlefield, so far as it affected the strength of the line; in point of discipline it was a thousand times worse. A man's life was worth nothing unless it served to check the career of a rifle-ball directed at the vitals of the government. To such a desperate strait had the war policy of the Confederate Government been reduced, that in order to discourage a defection that was becoming epidemic, a patrol was employed, which, with the assistance of hounds in rare instances, hunted the deserters down and hanged them in chains, or shot them, blindfolded, with their faces to the wall.

One day a deserter named Martin was at work in a cornfield attached to his humble dwelling. Four or five pale, ragged, emaciated children were amusing themselves in the yard, and a homely careworn woman was bending over a wash-tub, while her infant, with hollowed eyes and wasted limbs, was playing in the dirt at her side. The man had been at home unmolested for two months, and had come to experience a faint sense of security.

When darkness came on he shouldered his hoe and trudged to the house, taking in his arm a few pine knots which were to furnish light for the evening. The family sat down to a supper of cornbread, which they washed down with a disgusting drink. It was made from corn, roasted until it was black; it was called "coffee," and was drunk with sugar.

"Well, Mary," said the husband, "the corn will be in rasting-ear in two weeks, and we shall have something fit to eat."

"Yes," said the woman.

"And then, you know, the birds will begin to flock in, and I can trap a few of them and get meat."

"Yes."

"I think we're going to get along first rate. I don't believe the war will last three months longer. You know one reason for so much desertion is that a great many soldiers have no idea now that we can ever whip the North, and they think that if they desert, the Confederate will go under before the patrol can catch them. I'm thinking that I'm almost out of danger."

"I hope so, William; but there's no telling."

"All right, Mary; but they can't take me alive."

This declaration was made with such a calm and quiet determination that the poor woman looked anxiously at the hard lines about his eyes and mouth. She knew that he meant it, and that the loaded revolver he always carried would never hesitate a moment.

In striking contrast to the woman, the man was of powerful build. His hardships in the army had toughened his muscles, and strengthened his large bones and supple joints. In a simple measure of strength he would have been a match for two ordinary men. His shoulders were broad and erect, and his arms and legs large and full of power.

They sat silently watching the blazing knots in the broad fireplace, the woman engaged with some coarse knitting, and the man smoking home-made tobacco in an old clay pipe. On a sudden, the man took the pipe from his mouth, straightened his shoulders, and listened attentively. His wife noticed the movement and hurriedly whispered:

"What is it, William?"

"Sh-h-h!"

They listened a moment longer, and the man stealthily rose to his feet and gazed steadily at the door, which was barred on the inside.

"What is it, William?" the woman again whispered; having strained her hearing in vain to catch any unusual sound.

"Horses."

"Where?"

He answered by pointing in the direction of the road. The truth flashed upon the woman's mind that, beyond a doubt, a hunting party was abroad, and that their game was a deserter. She rose to her feet, very pale, and regarded her husband with an anxious look. The man glanced at his children, lying asleep in their cots, cast a loving look at his wife, stepped softly to a shelf on which was a bucket of water, and dashed its contents upon the fire. The blaze was extinguished, and the room was in profound darkness.

"Run William!" whispered the woman, in a quavering voice.

He silently clasped her in his arms, and said:

"Keep a brave heart, Mary. They can't take me alive!"

He pushed her away, although she unconsciously clung to him, pulled out his revolver, cocked it, and let the hammer down softly. He then put on his hat, quietly unbarred the door, and slipped out in the dark.

The sound of the horses' hoofs had ceased. The woman staggered to the open door, and saw several dark forms hurrying round the cottage. They must have seen her husband, for a stern voice called "Halt!" and she heard the click of a carbine.

A shadowy figure stole crouching alongside a fence, and on hearing the command it suddenly straightened, and bounded forward like a frightened deer. There was a vivid flash and a report from the carbine, and the stealthy figure halted a moment, and returned the fire. The soldier fell as a pistol ball crashed through his shoulder; the fugitive ran with redoubled speed, and disappeared in the darkness. There was a rapid discharge of carbines, but Martin had gained the swamp, and further pursuit was out of the question.

The hunters returned and bore the wounded man into the woman's cottage. She rekindled the fire, and assisted, with trembling hands, in dressing the wound.

"How long has your husband been here?" asked the captain.

"Two months."

"Where will he go?"

"I don't know."

"You do know!"

The woman made no reply.

"Do you know you are guilty of harbouring a deserter?"

"Yes," she said, firmly and proudly, looking him full in the face.

"Do you know what can be done with you?"

She said nothing.

"You can be arrested, and punished for a crime."

She regarded him with intense scorn, and remained silent.

"I'm glad he got away," she said at length quietly.

"Did you assist him in escaping?"

"He needed no help."

"He surely told you where he was going?"

She shook her head.

"Did he say when he will come back?"

"No."

"Now, I see that you are a woman of sense and courage. If you will tell me where I can find him I will not arrest you. You would not like to be handcuffed, and carried to prison?"

"I wouldn't care."

"What would become of your children?"

The woman became pale, her eyes flashed, and she stammered:

"You would not leave them here to starve, would you?"

"Certainly," said the officer, as he laughed at her agony.

The mother was transformed into a tigress. She sprang across the room, seized a carbine that leant against the wall, and levelled it at his head.

"You would! You cowardly, inhuman brute!" She screamed as she pulled the trigger.

There was a deafening report, and she fell fainting to the floor.

"Simply sheared me a little," remarked the officer, as, with a certain degree of interest, he felt a narrow, white streak, that the ball had cut through his hair. "An inch lower, and—what was it old Man said at Austerlitz? She's game, though, and quick as lightning. No use trying to get anything out of her. I just wanted to scare her a little, and she took it in dead earnest."

"What are you going to do now, Captain?" asked one of the men.

"Oh, I'll put Walker's dogs after him. They'll fetch him."

"The bloodhounds?"

"Yes."

"Will you follow them up?"

"I don't know."

"They'll never leave him alive if you don't."

"I know it."

"That would be terrible."

"Why?"

"They got that fellow Rutherford down, and tore him to pieces."

"Well, what's the difference? Is that any worse than calling the dogs off, and bringing him back alive to be shot?"

"But he's armed and will kill the hounds."

"Twelve dogs? Don't be uneasy. He will finish two or three of the younger dogs, until his pistol is empty, and the rest will manage him.

"Old Tiger will be there at the finish and will make all the final arrangements for the funeral. He hangs on closer than death, and they've never got a square blow or a safe shot at him yet."

At daybreak, the next morning, an old man, smooth-shaved and stoop shouldered, was riding in the direction of the woman's cottage. The cavalry captain accompanied him, and eleven bloodhounds—magnificent dogs—trotted along, some ahead, and others on either side of the horsemen, while two hundred yards in the rear, a solitary dog jogged along, as if already weary of the enterprise, and disgusted with the life he was called upon to lead. This was none other than the famous Tiger, more generally called "Old Tige," the dog that never lost a trail, and never failed to run his game to earth.

"Walker," said the officer, "I think we had better skirt the woods, and not let the woman know that we've got the dogs out. She might give us trouble."

They entered the swamp in the direction the man had taken, and Walker called the dogs about him. Tiger walked leisurely up, and lay down near his master's horse.

"Heigho! get up, sir!"

The old dog slowly obeyed the command, and stood blinking and staring stupidly at his master. Walker descended from his horse, and, pointing to the ground, said:

"Hie on!"

The other dogs were already scouring the ground, in all directions. Old Tige put his nose to the grass and began to hunt the scent by systematically describing a circle, which he continually widened, his master watching him closely the meanwhile, and paying no attention to the other dogs. A young hound soon sent up the well-known howl, and the other dogs chased eagerly around him, Old Tige trotting to the scene behind all the others.

The dogs were greatly excited. The old dog unceremoniously pushed his way through the crowd, and sniffed the ground. The young hound, impatient that no command was given, and satisfied that he had found the trail, slowly advanced into the swamp, his nose all the time to the ground. Soon he set off on a full run, the other dogs following with yelps. Old Tige examined the spot indicated by the young hound, but was entirely unconcerned, and proceeded to smell the ground for a few yards around. Walker called the other dogs back, and old Tige sullenly shook his head until his ragged ears flapped against his jowls, and lay down again.

"He's not satisfied," said Walker. "I will have to show him the track. He's in doubt."

Walker crept away along the fence, followed by the old dog, and when he had reached the spot opposite where the man was last seen, he saw through the fence a track indented in the soft earth, and ordered the dog to climb over. Old Tige clambered laboriously over the rails, and scented the track. He regained his master's side, and trudged with him back to the swamp.

"I think the woman heard the dogs," said Walker. "I saw her looking through the door and listening. Tiger's got the scent. Hie away, sir!"

The dog hunted for a few minutes, and found the trail.

With a single yelp he disappeared in the thicker part of the underbrush, and the whole pack bounded yelping after him. They pursued the trail for a mile through the swamp, and mounted a hill on the opposite side. They disappeared over the summit, and Old Tige, already far behind, reached the highest point, and came to a standstill. He remained for one or two minutes surveying the surrounding country, and then struck off at right angle from the trail, with his nose high in the air and his tail straight with his back. He went in the direction of a large plateau covered with tall pines and salamander hills.

Occasionally he would stop, as if listening to the yelping of the hounds as it rapidly grew fainter in the distance. Having traversed the plateau, which was five miles in width, he came to the outskirts of a canebrake, and bent his nose to the ground. He proceeded two miles along the edge of the dense growth of cane until he found a path which led through.

The traveller would be compelled to pick his way through the mud and water by stepping carefully upon poles and cyprus roots.

The dog sniffed the ground attentively at the entrance to the swamp, and a sudden swishing of the tail and a loud snorting showed that he had found the trail. Before entering, he looked behind him and listened for the dogs, standing the meanwhile on three legs, and as still as a statue. No sound could be heard. They had followed the trail and had gone fifteen miles, while the old dog had cut across the country and headed them off.

He pulled through the mire, clambered over the slippery poles, jumped from root to root, and from tuft to tuft, until he gained the opposite side. Here he found a fence that was decayed and broken down. It inclosed a field that had been in disuse for several years, and that was overgrown with young pines and dewberry vines. Near the opposite side of the field was an abandoned log cabin. The mud had long ago dropped from the cracks between the logs; the roof was partly gone; the chimney had fallen, and was a pile of mud and sticks; the windows had lost their shutters years ago, and the hewn slabs, with which the floor was laid, were disarranged and decayed.

The berries in the field were ripe, and the dog consumed considerable time in wandering around the pines, his nose all the while close to the ground and his tail whisking fiercely. The cause is easily explained; the man had picked the berries and breakfasted in the field. The trail was hot, but the dog remaining silent, every now and then raising his head and peering about him. The old cabin was almost hidden by young mulberries and China trees.

The dog left the trail finally and trotted to the door of the cabin. He place his fore-feet upon the block that served as a step, and looked cautiously around the interior. His victim lay upon his face in a corner, sound asleep, his forehead resting upon his right arm, and the pistol clasped in his right hand. The dog pricked up his drooping ears and eyed him curiously. He noiselessly gained the door-sill, still keeping his eyes cautiously on the sleeping man. He advanced one foot upon a slab to the right, but it rocked and made a slight noise.

Another method of approach was left. The wily old dog crept under the sill and proceeded under the house towards the corner in which the deserter slumbered. About three feet from where he lay a slab had been displaced, leaving an opening of six feet long and twelve inches wide. The dog cautiously poked his head through the hole, planted his fore-paw upon a beam, and gradually brought his shoulders upward until he stood almost erect upon his hind legs. With a dexterous, noiseless spring, he brought his hind feet upon the beam, and stood a moment in this cramped position.

Finding the sleeping man still undisturbed, he approached him carefully, taking steps slowly. He smelt the man's muddy boots, drawing deep and silent inspirations, and sniffed along his entire person until he reached his head, and here he breathed with much greater caution. The man was in his shirt sleeves, and his large, strong neck presented a tempting field for attack. But the dog was old and his fangs were worn with age. He regarded the exposed neck so eagerly, and his whole frame was so rigid, that it seemed he was on the point of taking a desperate step.

Had the man lain with his throat uppermost, perhaps the dog would not have hesitated. As it was, while he was regarding the bait that tempted him he suddenly pricked up his ears and listened attentively. He heard the yelping of the hounds as they emerged from the canebrake. Stepping cautiously backward he disappeared through the hole, slunk into a dark corner under the cabin, and lay down.

The hounds crossed the fence, noisy, furious, and bloodthirsty. They tore through the patch of berries, and their noise awakened the man. He listened, and then sprang to his feet. He trembled in every joint, and his teeth chattered with fear. He looked round wildly and despairingly, and discovered a joist above his head. Securing the pistol in his belt, he sprang upward and caught the joist with his hands. It was old and rotten and swayed under his weight, but he pulled himself upon it and awaited the dogs.

They rushed blindly into the cabin, foaming and yelping, eagerly smelled the slabs on which the man had slept, ran around the cabin barking and hungry for blood, crawled under the cabin, scoured the shrubbery, went over the field again, and rushed madly back into the cabin. Knowing that they would find him sooner or later, and that every moment he lost lessened the distance between himself and the human bloodhounds, the man selected the largest and finest-looking dog, and sent a bullet between his eyes.

The hound rolled over with quivering limbs and stiffening muscles. The dogs were thunderstruck, but not dismayed. One strong young hound made a desperate spring, and fastened his fangs in the man's heel. He fell with a shot through the brain. The man had three shots left, and he must reserve at least one for a last extremity. He had killed two dogs and counted nine remaining. With two more well directed shots he reduced the number to seven.

By this time the fugitive had warmed to his work. The blood tingled in his hands and arms, and he felt his great strength bulging and swelling his muscles. No time was to be lost. He replaced the pistol, stood upon the joist, and pushed a few boards from the roof. Grasping the rotten rafters, he pul ed himself upon the roof, and sought a bludgeon. The boards were of oak, and were weighed down with logs, which ran traversely, and which he easily pushed off with his feet. With little difficulty he secured a worm-eaten partially-decayed board, four feet long, and an inch thick. By striking it over the end of a log, he split it, and was thus armed with a powerful weapon.

Martin crawled carefully to the eaves, and prepared to give battle to the deadly enemy. He looked upon the ground, but the dogs were not visible; and, steadying himself, he dropped heavily and caught nimbly on his feet. He felt that he must finish the fight within half-an-hour, or he would be confronted with carbines and pistols. The dogs heard him drop, and sprang through the door. The man turned quickly and raised his weapon; the seven dogs made a furious onslaught, but a powerful blow upon the head sent the leader rolling dead upon the ground. The rotten board was strained by the blow, and he must use it more carefully. Six ferocious dogs still confronted him, and two eyes that he did not see blinked at him from under the cabin. The vigour with which the deserter met the attacks, and the threatening attitude that he maintained, disconcerted the dogs, and they ran around him at a safe distance, their teeth glistening, their tails whisking, their heads bent to the ground, the froth dripping from their protruding tongues.

The man suddenly dashed at a dog, and mortally wounded him with a heavy blow on the back of the neck. While he was in the act of striking, and before he could regain his defensive attitude, an active young dog, with fangs as sharp as knives, sprang upon his shoulders, and fastened his teeth in the back of the man's neck. The other dogs, emboldened by the success of their companion made a furious attack from behind. The man faced about, with the fangs of the hound still imbedded in his neck, and his back ripped and lacerated with the sharp claws of the suspended dog, and struck about wildly and desperately, breaking the jaw of one and the leg of another. He made one terrible blow that, in his agony, missed the mark, and his noble bludgeon was shattered against the ground.

The dog gnawed at his neck, and imbedded his fangs still deeper in the flesh, causing the blood to pour down the man's back and breast. At this moment, when the man was paralyzed with pain, and frantic at the loss of his weapon, the two dogs still unhurt that confronted him, sprang upon him, buried their teeth in his flesh, and bore him to the ground.

He sank upon his knees, threw off the two dogs with a mighty effort, and defended his throat with all the desperation and strength that aroused his every energy, and sustained his failing hopes.

They snapped at his hands, and tore them; and completely stripped the shirt from his body. They ploughed his skin with their claws, and the blood gushed from a hundred wounds. One of the dogs allowed the strong hand of the man to close upon his throat, and then he was flung stunned to the ground. Catching an idea from this manœuvre, the man allowed the other hound to seize his arm, then took him by the leg and dashed him against the house.

The deserter was growing faint; but he staggered to his feet, grasped the hind legs of the dog that clung so tenaciously to his neck, snapped the bones as though they were reeds, and jerked him from his hold, tearing the flesh horribly.

By one of those curious eccentricities of fortuitous chance, the man found a weapon in his hands in the dog that he held by the legs, and that snapped at his legs, and writhed, and squirmed, and howled.

The two hounds that he had succeeded in throwing off rallied their strength and returned to the attack cooler and wiser, but none the less terrible. The man backed against the wall, and met the charge by knocking down a dog with the one he held in his hands.

Finding that he could not advantageously wield his heavy weapon in such close proximity to the wall, he suddenly advanced, and knocked over the other dog in the act. The blows, heavy as they were, did not disable his two antagonists. Every time that he swung down his living bludgeon it became weaker and its struggles more faint. He struck rapidly and carefully, husbanding his strength, yet every now and then missing his object, as it would adroitly evade the blow, and bringing down his heavy club against the ground with a dull thud, crushing its bones, and dislocating its vertebra.

The wounded hounds had hidden in the thicket, and the two that remained had become bruised and crippled, and had changed their tactics into harassing their enemy until he had expended all his strength.

He felt himself growing sick and faint, and he recognised the necessity of immediately bringing the fight to a close by capturing his enemies with strategy. He threw aside his weapon, but the dogs simply glared at him. If he could only get them in his clutches again he would be saved, but experience had made them cunning. So he suddenly threw up his hands and fell, and they sprang to his throat. Quick as a cat he seized a throat in each hand, turned them over upon the ground with great difficulty, planted his great knees upon their breasts, and crushing their ribs with his remaining strength, choked them until life was extinct.

The terrible fight had lasted two hours. The man staggered to his feet, and looked around. Not a soul was in sight. He drew a deep breath, and his naked, bloody chest swelled with triumph. But the loss of blood, and the extreme pain of his wounds, had so exhausted him, that he felt the ground rising to strike him in the face, and with a heavy lunge, he lay extended upon the ground.

Two glittering eyes, followed by the neck and shoulders of a hound, emerged from under the cabin. Old Tige crept forward softly, but darted back, as the man, with a desperate effort, rose to his hands and knees. The deserter battled bravely with unconsciousness, but was dying of thirst. He crawled painfully along a disused path leading to a spring, while the blood streamed upon the ground.

On reaching the spring, he drank freely, and bathed his face and head. The blood poured from his wounds and changed to the colour of wine the little stream that flowed from the spring. The dog had followed him unseen, and was crouching behind a thick clump of shrubbery. The man, refreshed by the water, again staggered to his feet, but the pines swam before his eyes, and he fell unconscious to the ground. The old dog approached cautiously, and closed his powerful jaws upon the throat of the fainting man.

A woman, pale and haggard, and with the wild light of insanity in her eyes, sat on the ground, and held the head of her husband in her lap, and rocked, and moaned, and sang, and cried, and called him vainly. The eyes that stared at the sky were so terribly bloodshot, and the face was so black, and the features so distorted, that it is strange she recognised as her husband the disfigured, lifeless body of Martin, the deserter.

THE KNIGHT OF THE BLUE ARMOUR

MANY hundred years ago a grim castle frowned with surly aspect from a pile of rocks upon a lonely island.

Rumour said an ogre dwelt there; but really it was Gaston de Mesquin (which translated means sordid and stingy), better known as the Knight of the Blue Armour, who had disappeared from his home in France to guard his treasures in this remote place.

This baron had robbed and plundered his own and foreign countries to so great an extent that his life was not safe. To protect himself, he had ordered a suit of armour to be made in Toledo.

He surveyed himself with pride, for so strangely was the steel burnished that sometimes it appeared bronze, sometimes blue, and sometimes green, and as its owner went clanking about the chamber, he resolved to call himself the Knight of the Blue Armour, and to start a report that he was enchanted.

Rumour wears myriad wings, and, as her lips magnify every tale her ears hear, she spreads this report throughout the country. The frightened servants fled, and alone and mysteriously did the knight convey his hoard of treasures to the rocky island.

The king, who lost his tribute by its master's flight, seized the castle; and nobody mourned the loss of the avaricious nobleman who had sacrificed so many lives for his selfish gain, and nobody tried to discover his fate.

When ten years had dropped their petals in the garden of time, a pestilence swept over the country, leaving famine in its wake; and, although the grief-stricken remnant of humanity murmured prayers for deliverance, no help came.

In their distress they turned to Father Francis, the benevolent, learned, sympathetic monk, whose little church stood not far from the deserted castle.

Father Francis could sit in his little garden in the shade of its high wall all day among the spicy gilli-flowers, the fluffy red peonies and the cloth-of-gold roses, watching the green dragon-flies and brown, speckled butterflies at play among the velvet petals, hearing the birds sing their songs in the swaying trees, and taking pleasure in the bounce and buzz of the industrious bees filling their honey-bags; or he could close his eyes to these delights and study here, as well as in his bare room, odd volumes held together by heavy silver clasps and filled with quaint lettering of ancient scribes.

But even when at his orisons in the chapel, he was always ready to listen to the woes of his people, and to help them by word or deed; for Father Francis believed himself nearer Heaven's blessings when helping mankind than at any other time.

He still believed the Knight of the Blue Armour to be alive, and connected him with the legend of the island, that could be seen on a clear day like a golden dot on the sky line across the sparkling sea.

If he could approach the tyrant, perhaps he might soften his heart. Father Francis called his people together in a little ivy-wreathed chapel.

"I go," he said, "to procure help to that island which legend calls enchanted. Be its owner monster, dragon, wizard or cruel man, I will bid him aid you, my dear children. Who will sail thither with me?"

The faces grew pale.

"Do not leave us, Father Francis, do not leave us," was the cry.

"Who will go with me?" he repeated.

Then in the silence out spoke the bold voice of Jean le Hardi: "I am your unworthy companion, Father Francis, if you will have me."

"One is all I need," answered the monk, "and now farewell, my children; we go to-day. I give you my blessing!"

The people bowed their heads and sobbed. The old ones grieved to lose their priest, but the young maidens sorrowed for the handsome, dauntless Jean, who had captured their tender hearts.

As Adele du Bois walked out under the arched stone door, she found Jean waiting. He clasped her hand and told her in his ardent gaze the secret she had craved so long.

She slipped her scented rosary on his wrist for a talisman, and to thank her he bent his tall head and kissed her before the astonished and jealous girls, at whose gaze deep poppies rose in her cheeks under the shadow of her crimpled linen wimple.

One bright morning the Knight of the Blue Armour had left his stronghold and lay basking on the rocks. He enjoyed the fresh breeze that blew away the curling heads of the roaring waves as he had blown away human sympathy.

Like himself, the day was cold and brilliant in appearance, and the sun seemed to delight in striking upon the figure that lay a shapeless mass of glittering steel upon the huge brown boulders.

Insensible to the loneliness of the place, he was rejoicing in his good luck to have been so long unmolested, when his quick eye detected a tiny black speck drifting from wave to wave, midway between the island and the ship, many leagues away.

In it were two men, an elderly priest and a strong, handsome youth, who pulled the oars with a hearty stroke.

"It is he," said Father Francis to Jean, as a gigantic billow dropped them down its slippery side in full view of the rock, on which the knight rested. "I thought the Blue Knight and the ogre were identical. Pull steady, Jean, and keep a stout heart."

The knight, meanwhile, with a very angry expression, rose to his feet.

"Who lands?" he cried to the intruders. "Who lands? Is it peace? Is it menace? This island is mine; neither friend nor foe is welcome. Ye land on peril of your lives."

"We are messengers of peace," said Father Francis, as he stepped from the boat, followed by Jean, "and, after craving your pardon and begging for your grace, we sue for favour."

"Beg and sue as you please," was the reply; "your blood will answer for your crime of entering my rocky gates. Begone."

Adele du Bois walked out.

"I know you, Gaston de Mesquin," said the priest, undisturbed by threat and scowl and furious gestures, "I know you. Have I believed the tales of your disappearance? Do I not know that yonder castle contains the treasures won by your greed of will and strength of arm?

"Listen; your people, who are my people, starve. Atone for your evil deeds by giving your bounty to succour the suffering ones. Help them, help; help for their sakes, for your present peace, for your future reward, and for my sake—who will call heaven's gifts of mercy upon your path. Help them!"

"I would the plague had carried you off, too; mayhap famine will, if he bide long enough.

"Were my prayers useful, I would piece head of nation on to tail of vesper and beg him starve thy stomach into dust. Begone, I say, both of you; begone!"

Turning, he started up the beach with haughty, swinging strides.

"Halt, sir knight," called Father Francis, "halt! Once more I give you a chance to atone for your past misdeeds of rapacity. Will you aid your people, or will you continue to selfishly guard what you have gained?

"Choose, for I am empowered to bring you to punishment. Choose, for in this hour your doom is set. Whether you wish it or not, your property is mine—mine to divide among your people, who are my people."

The strong breeze played with the white curls on the troubled brow of Father Francis, for he hoped the knight would relent and escape his doom. But these could not pierce his heart any more effectually than the sun could dart its rays through the glittering armour.

"How blue the sea, how blue the sky, how hard the knight's face, how grieved the monk!" Such were the thoughts of Jean, who gazed wonderingly at the scene.

A strange thing happened.

"It is sad, Jean, but I must punish this man," said Father Francis, as the knight walked away. "We cannot spill his blood, yet we must seize his possessions for the hungry ones at home. Watch!"

As they overtook him again the Knight of the Blue Armour turned with a menacing glance, but was arrested by the monk, who said slowly:

"Knight of the Blue Armour, there are treasures in the sea—guard them; there are monsters in the sea—go live with them. You wear armour—it shall cling to you; the sign and seal of your greedy nature shall be a cumbersome claw; your eye shall shrivel in its socket; and your heart, men shall look for in vain. Begone!"

This was hardly spoken when the knight vanished, and a huge lobster fell from the rocks into the ocean with a great splash.

Father Francis and Jean signalled their ship to land. They loaded it with the spoils of the castle and sailed home; one to the charge of his people, the other to the gentle Adele.

So well does the lobster fulfil the charm that, clad in his helmet and cuirass of mail—a marvel of flexibility—he guards for ever the secret caverns of the ocean.

One thing reminds the Knight of the Blue Armour of his greed—the awkward grasping claw which so often brings him into trouble. ESTHER SINGLETON.

THE EYES OF LUCILE.

For five years there had been clouds of smoke circling in Valentine's eyes, the roar of surf was in his ears, and sullen apathy in his breast. The world passed before him in a dull grey dream of uninteresting figures, and he seldom knew if it were morning or night.

"How sad—how very sad," he sometimes heard a voice saying; "Val was such a promising boy. But the craze for drink—well, he got it from his father."

He would slowly sweep his leaden eyes upward to see who had criticised him thus, but if he discovered anyone, he could not determine who it was, and the words he would have said in response, stuck in his throat and would not leave his tongue. His servant, the white, bent old man that had cared for his father during twenty years of his lurid life, wept over Valentine as the boy lay at night in the heavy sleep that succeeded his days of drunkenness.

"He'll be dead soon—he'll be dead within a year—the beautiful boy," would mutter the old man, as he bent over the bed and smoothed back the matted hair from Valentine's brow. And then the poor old fellow would kneel and pray for the "dear child," whom he had seen at the hour of his birth and loved as his own ever since. And, praying, he would sink away to troubled sleep, holding Val's hand until he was aroused by the hoarse whisper:

"Morton! Morton! The brandy."

Of late Morton's granddaughter had been coming in the evenings to Valentine's apartments while Val was away, to sit with her grandfather and tell him the news of the outer world, of which he saw nothing. They hung over the table in the soft glow of a lamp, and with clasped hands talked gently together.

"They have asked me to be the fairy queen in the tableaux at the Church, grandpa," said the girl one evening.

"That is because you are so pretty, Lucile," replied old Morton, stroking the slender white hand that lay in his.

The girl blushed and turned her eyes away. They looked into a mirror, and the lashes drooped.

"Alice takes good care of you, I know," muttered Morton, half to himself, as his gaze roamed over the fair head and graceful form of his granddaughter. "She guards you well, eh?"

"Mamma says I cannot be the fairy queen," replied the girl, looking up again regretfully.

"Good," he exclaimed. "Alice is a thoughtful mother. She does not want you exhibited, Lucile. That is right."

There was a knock at the outer door. Morton sprang to his feet.

"It's Val," he exclaimed. "I did not expect him for hours. Lucile—you must not see him. But there is only one way out. Wait! when I let him in you pass quickly by him. Do not hesitate. He will not notice you! but hurry!"

As he spoke, he went into the narrow hallway, and opened the door. The girl rose, and poised herself like a bird for flight. By some chance Valentine, his handsome face as white as marble, his lustrous eyes glittering with the fever of drink, paused exactly on the threshold when he reached the room and braced himself by extending his arms on each side of the doorway, thus completely barring the entrance. His gaze was fixed upon Lucile, who stood with one hand pressed on her breast, looking at him with large, wondering, timid eyes. She had heard incidentally of this young man, she knew his failing—but had never seen him before. Val and Morton had been living in London for less than a month, their home for three years past being in Paris. Only in a vague way had Lucile thought of her grandfather's charge. She had felt a pang of sadness when once her mother had spoken of his habits. But she had pictured him as being repulsive—and now that she saw him, he was beautiful.

The lamp cast a golden halo about her, the rest of the room remaining in comparative shadow. For several moments utter silence prevailed. A strange look of ineffable tenderness and pity stole into the eyes of Lucile, as she looked upon that white, set, ravaged face. A swift sympathy agitated her, and her lips trembled, as she slowly and appealingly held out her hand towards Val. The young rake was shivering violently, his fixed gaze was full of terror, and presently he raised his arms with a pathetic gesture and shielded his face. Then he looked upon Lucile again, only to sink to his knees an instant after, sobbing like a woman. Morton, who had been standing just behind him all this time in the hall, sprang into the room, and, leaning down, drew his young master's head to his breast.

"Poor boy, poor boy." he murmured; and then he motioned to his granddaughter to go away at once. Lucile obeyed, after a backward look from the doorway at the tortured form of Valentine as he crouched on the floor, crying as she had never known a man could cry.

"Come, Val, come," murmured Morton, soothingly; "come to your room and tumble into bed. You want a good sleep."

A few hours later Morton sent for Dr. Stanton.

"Look here, Morton," said that impressive person, as he was laying aside his great coat in the hall, "I can't do anything for Valentine, and you oughtn't to send for me at this time of night. He's just like his father, and he'll have to die like him."

"But, doctor," replied Morton, "there's something strange going on in the boy to-night. He is trying not to drink."

"What's that? Do you mean he——"

"He threw a glass of brandy on to the floor after he had it against his lips, and prayed with me to be freed of the curse."

The doctor drew himself up and rubbed his eyeglasses vigorously with his pocket-handkerchief. He was interested.

"Has any unusual thing happened?"

"Well, there was a strange incident I might speak of. When Valentine came in to-night my granddaughter was here. The boy looked long at her, and then set to sobbing like a child. He has since talked of her eyes, and says they condemned him."

"Huh," grunted the doctor. "Did he ever see the girl before?"

"No."

"Is she beautiful?"

"Yes."

"Have her here to-morrow morning at eleven. There's nothing for me to do to-night. Remember about the girl."

The doctor put on his overcoat again and hurried away. The next day at eleven he appeared at the apartment again. Lucile, looking as fresh as a flower, was sitting on the edge of a chair, with her hands clasped in her lap, when Dr. Stanton entered. He scrutinised her closely.

"Ah, I see," he mused softly to himself, as he drew off his gloves. "The eyes are remarkable. They are like a nun's ought to be—innocent and thoughtful." Then, aloud to Morton, who stood by: "How's Val?"

"Very shaky, sir."

"Drinking?"

"He refused to touch anything till I forced him to. He was getting bad, sir, and I knew he couldn't stop all at once, so I——"

"That's right. Now, see here, Morton. I've got a scheme. This girl of yours can do wonders just now. Close Val's door. Now listen. I once had a friend, a young man who drank nearly as hard as Val. Drink had deadened every wholesome impulse in him—all but one—his love for his mother. He worshipped her, and she idolised him. For years she lived in despair of ever redeeming her son. Finally, one day, when he was comparatively sober, she appeared before him—drunk, insanely, terribly drunk. He looked on her, uttered a cry, and fell in a dead faint. From that moment he fought against liquor, and found the strength to conquer it."

The doctor looked towards Lucile, who was attentive and rigid.

"Val has no mother," he went on. "The principal difficulty that we have always had to contend with in his case has been that he was alone in the world and no one could make an effective appeal to his heart. We will not disguise matters now. My dear young lady, your innocent beauty has brought Valentine to a sense of his shame. Your presence has disclosed to him the hideousness of his own soul. By some mysterious process your eyes have pierced the shadows in which he lived, and released the pent up good there was always hidden somewhere in him. If I can make this shock a positive and lasting one, I will undertake to build the boy up physically. If I can produce an absolute horror of liquor in him, I can cleanse his body and make a sound man of him. Will you, my child, help me in this task?"

"Yes, sir," said Lucile.

"You heard my story of the man who was cured by seeing his mother in an intoxicated condition?"

"Yes, sir."

"Well—Valentine has no mother."

The girl was silent. Her grandfather, who had been nervously pacing the floor, and rubbing his hands together, stopped and lifted his head proudly.

"Dr. Stanton," he said, "I love Valentine Brant as well as if he were my own flesh and blood, but you ask too much when you——"

"I insist on doing what the doctor wishes," interrupted Lucile, rising tall and white, to her feet.

The doctor rose also, and, crossing the room, put his hand on Morton's shoulder.

"We can save Valentine if we do this thing," he said, in a serious voice. "His emotion of last night will not last. And if he starts on one more debauch he will die in a week. The girl is willing. I insist on trying the experiment."

"And must she really drink?" asked Morton, looking pitifully at the doctor.

"She must appear before Val at the right moment—intoxicated."

Morton groaned, and drew away, with his hands covering his face. The doctor turned to the girl and talked to her for some time in whispers. She listened attentively, her clear, pure eyes looking straight into his, her pale face serene and womanly. After a while the doctor crossed to where Morton stood, and said:

"Get me a bottle of brandy!"

The old servant shuffled away, and soon reappeared, bringing a bottle with him, and handed it, with a glass, to the doctor.

"Now, my brave little woman," said the doctor, passing over the bottle and glass to Lucile, "you go into the next room. In about half-an-hour I will call you. In the meantime, follow out my directions. Morton, you will come with me while I talk with Val."

Morton took a step towards his granddaughter, and would have snatched the brandy from her hands, but she held it away from him, and drawing herself up, said:

"I shall be very angry if you do not let me do what the doctor directs. I will do it;" and she turned and glided quickly into the adjoining room, shutting the door behind her. With a look of utter despair, Morton stared at the closed door, but permitted himself to be led away when the doctor put his hand gently through his arm.

They found Valentine sitting, white and trembling, in a big arm-chair. He smiled wearily at the doctor, and held out his hand. The doctor looked carefully into his eyes and felt his pulse. While he did so, Valentine, in a nervous way, waved his disengaged hand at Morton, and said:

"Bring me my brandy! I can't—can't—oh this throat of mine—I'm dry—I'm choking! Get me the brandy!"

Morton and the doctor exchanged glances.

"It's the first time he's asked for it since last night," whispered the servant.

"Well, get it," replied the doctor.

Valentine's eyes were roaming about the room in a vacant way.

"Doctor," he said, after a moment, as he ceaselessly slipped a heavy ring on and off his finger, "I believe there's a heaven."

"Yes," said the doctor.

"Yes, I believe there is. I was sitting—somewhere—not long ago—a few hours ago—and I opened my eyes and saw—an angel. She was all white, with wings of gold—and she looked at me, doctor—like a dove. I must have been pretty near gone, don't you think so—to have seen an angel?"

"The angel you saw, Val, may have been an angel of the earth," responded the doctor.

Valentine drew his hand across his brow.

"Morton was there," he went on. "He let her in. She stood in front of me, and gazed at me—gazed—oh, her gaze! It burned me to a cinder, doctor. I am not so vile as the angel thought. I might have been better—if it were not for the—Morton, Morton, hurry with the brandy."

The doctor remained with Valentine for a full hour. Then he rose, and passed quietly from the room. In a moment he returned, holding Lucile by the hand. The girl's golden hair was hanging in a disordered mass over her shoulders. Her dress was torn open at the neck. She was as white as a ghost, her eyelids drooped heavily, and—she staggered. Her grandfather Morton turned and fled as she entered. The doctor led her directly to Valentine.

"Here, Val, is the angel you spoke of," he said, and then stood aside.

Valentine started up in his chair and fastened his gaze upon the girl before him. She stood in a limp, wavering attitude, holding towards him a bottle, which was about three-quarters filled.

"D'you ike bran'y?" she asked. "Here! Help y'rself. I've had 'nough."

Then, wheeling wildly round, she flung the bottle straight against a mirror, crashing it into splinters. This amused her, and throwing back her head she laughed.

"Pardon me," she said, suddenly becoming grave, and turning to Valentine again; "pardon me, but I always mus' break mir's w'n 'm intoxicated. It's a bad habit, but I mus' do it."

Valentine was on his feet, his eyes riveted upon the wavering figure before him. He was deadly in his pallor, and great dry sobs broke in his throat. Gradually he moved slowly round the room till he gained the chest of drawers, never moving his gaze from Lucile. He reached out his arm and opened a small drawer. Then he withdrew his hand and shut his eyes. There was a flash of steel, a click, and Lucile, with a scream, flung herself on him and struck out of his hand a revolver whose muzzle he had pressed against his temple.

"See! See!" she cried, throwing back her hair, and holding herself erect before him; "I am not drunk! It was acting! It was only a trick! Look at me; I am myself!" And, panting with excitement, she extended her arms wide apart, and in glance, attitude and word expressed her innocence. Valentine, pressing back against the wall, looked and looked upon the girl's face, and then, with a smile, sank to the ground unconscious.

"It was a miraculous cure," said Dr. Stanton, as he related the circumstances to a friend some months later. "After all, it takes a woman, a good woman, to drive out demons."

"Well, is the sequel of your story a happy one?"

"Of course. Val and Lucile were married in May."

"Lucky girl. They say Brant is worth half a million."

"Well, what of it? Lucile would be cheap at double that figure."

His doom had been spoken, and he was to die very soon. It was the kind-hearted, grey-haired physician who had told him "the worst," with a voice inflected by altogether unprofessional emotion; and as he recalled the scene Wilfred Devereux smiled grimly.

Wilfred Devereux had led a selfish and altogether useless life, but he had found the world fairly amusing until it had begun to bore him, and of late it had bored him profoundly; so he did not care so very much if he was "going out," as he phrased it.

He was to avoid excitement. The doctor had said so. Again he smiled, as he recalled this advice. For years his life had been a restless search after fresh distractions and excitement, and the sated worldling thought how entirely superfluous the counsel tendered by his physician had been.

Well, he was following out the prescription to-night, at all events, idly lounging in the luxurious little smoking-room.

He did not feel any penitence for his misspent years of manhood. No; since one summer afternoon long ago he had made up his mind to give up taking life seriously and to regard it merely as an opportunity for having "a good time," and now he had nearly spent his life; he had had the "good time," and felt reckless.

In a few days, weeks, or months—it did not interest him to speculate which—the men at the clubs would say to one another: "Hello, so I see poor old Devereux is dead," and the cousin who was to inherit his property would congratulate himself that there was anything left to inherit.

That was all. It might have been so different; but it was her fault. Was it quite fair, though, to lay the blame on his old love? Yes, yes; she had cast him off, she had sent him adrift, and his life's shipwreck was due to her.

But, despite these melancholy reflections, Devereux would not give way to gloom. On the contrary, he rose exchanged his smoking jacket for his dress coat, studied his list of engagements, and having ascertained that Mr. Pottinger-Jones expected him at a ball in Kensington, and that Lady Hildegarde had sent a card for her crush in Brook Street, he sailed out into the thronging street.

Once more Devereux felt a momentary pleasure at being a citizen of the brilliant world; and then he thought of the summer nights that were to come next year, when all this life would go on just the same, while he would be lying in six feet of earth somewhere away from the sound of the throbbing of the wheels, and the never-ceasing fall of feet on the London pavements.

He shuddered. After all, death was not pleasant to think about.

Again he forced his mind to thoughts of the past, and presently to such good purpose that he had forgotten Mrs. Pottinger-Jones and Lady Hildegarde, and was leaning on the parapet of the embankment, whither he had strayed, and was watching the sparkle of the stars in the dark river.

* * * * *

It was a sunny afternoon, and the fresh breeze blew from the sea. The tide was out and the long lines of foam were white against the blue. On the cliff edge, where the poppies flamed and the bees hummed in the thyme, stood a young man and a girl.

She wore a pink dress and a hat with a shady brim, and there was a look of pain in her beautiful eyes.

"Is this your final decision?" said the young man. "Have you no pity?"

"Pity? Yes, infinite pity; but I cannot marry you. Indeed—indeed, I cannot," she answered.

"I would do anything, anything," he pleaded, "to make you love me again. I know I am unworthy of you," he went on. "You are an angel, a goddess——"

But she only listened to his frantic praise with head averted.

"No, no, it is too late," was all she would vouchsafe in reply to his pleading. Her mingled expression of pain and scorn told the young man how he had been weighed and found wanting, and he clenched his hands in despair and mortification.

Then he drew himself up and spoke slowly and deliberately.

"Very well," he said, "since you cast me off I have nothing good left to live for. But don't think I shall waste my time in vain regrets, or that I shall ever come back to you. I will commit every sin and folly that can hide away the pain of this parting. I will squander my life as carelessly, as recklessly, as I can. I will never try again to be or to do anything pure or good.

"My only object henceforth shall be to forget you and all my foolish dreams, my belief in you and your love, my misplaced trust in womanhood, and all my sins shall be laid at your door. You may repudiate them, Mary, but my sins shall be upon your head. You could save me if you would, and you will not."

His face was flushed, and hers had grown angry and scornful.

Suddenly he softened again. "Don't you see, Mary, how you are spoiling my life?"

She made no reply. He asked her for a last kiss, for the flower she wore at her throat. But she refused both by silence and a downcast gaze. And so the romance of the young man's life had ended.

Devereux thought of all this as he gazed into the dark flowing Thames. Heavens! How well he had kept his word about squandering his life! But he did not blame Mary now.

"Mary is in town to-night," he reflected, as his cab bowled down the Embankment and came under the towers of Westminster towards Kensington. "I wonder if she has changed much, and if I shall come across her before I die."

And now he had reached his destination and was walking up a carpeted stairway, while the music sounded above him. He could not dance. The doctor had forbidden it, so he strolled aimlessly out of the ballroom.

Sometimes one seems to know by premonition what is to happen next. So it was with Devereux, and he scarcely started when the girl whom he had been so recently thinking about appeared before him.

The salt smell of the sea, the freshness of youth and the old impossible happiness seemed to come back to him as he looking into her beautiful, glorious eyes and returned her sedate greeting. She was no longer a mere girl, but she was very beautiful; indeed, little changed from what she used to be.

Silently she suffered him to lead her out on to the balcony.

"I have heard little of you since we parted," he said.

"And I have heard much of you."

"Nothing to my credit, I fear," he said lightly. "You see, Mary, I kept my word, and wasted my life as I foretold I should."

She made no answer.

"Do you think, Mary, that I was really so bad as you believed me to be?"

"As one grows older," she said gently, "I think one's creed grows less narrow. I treated you badly."

The last part of her reply was scarcely audible, but he leant forward and caught her hand, and held it lightly, while his frame thrilled with a feeling he had thought he could never experience again.

And she was thinking sadly of him whom she had cast adrift years before—of a young man, careless, worldly, perhaps, but with many possibilities in him of good, who had, however—she knew it only too surely—since chosen evil.

And she blamed herself bitterly for her self-sufficient righteousness, for her intolerance of what, viewed through the softening influence of time, seemed to be but very human weaknesses after all.

Her old narrowness of mind had been lost with fuller knowledge. The girl had led a sheltered life, and was ignorant of the world and its temptations. That woman who sat in the gloom of the balcony told herself that she had been wrong. That was all. But it had spoiled a man's life.

He was a weak man, to be sure, to have fretted over the loss of a girl's worthless heart; but she sat in the darkness conscious that she had made a great and grievous mistake.

And Devereux sat there as in a trance, drinking in every line of her face, dimly seen in the gloom, his heart filled unexpectedly with the sweetness of the only pure love it had ever felt.

Life had been a fever of late, a hot delirium, but he had found he was not worn out and weary of it as he had believed.

Neither spoke for a few minutes. At last Devereux said: "Mary, could you love me now?"

"Hush!" she said, "you must not speak so. I am married."

"Then I hope you are happy," he said very gently.

She was silent.

"Do you know, Mary, I am to die very soon?" he said.

"To die?"

"Yes. The doctors say I cannot last many weeks."

He heard her breath come faster.

"Mary, will you give me that kiss you refused me once?"

She bent forward and pressed her lips to his pale brow.

"Do you remember I asked for a flower. You did not give it to me. Will you give me one now?"

She took a white flower from her hair, and gave it him silently. Then he led her indoors, and returned alone to the balcony.

He sat down and crushed the flower she had given him to his lips, while its fragrance seemed to penetrate to his soul.

They found him there in the early morning—asleep, they thought—with a smile on his worn face.

But it was something else than sleep. For him "the fever called 'living'" was ended at last.

BESSIE.

"You'll come again to-morrow?"

"If I can."

The man kicked a stone viciously.

He was so tall that he had to bend to look into those stitches.

She stood facing him now, a little thing with soft, fair wistful, upturned eyes.

"How dreadfully old he is looking to-night"—stitch, swiftly.

A man with hair streaked with grey, and a slight pipe.

The man smoked furiously.

"Just once more," he pleaded; "I shall be going away once more."

She looked at him astonished.

He took her little face between his hands and kissed it.

He did not often ask for kisses now.

The man (he was not so very old either) laid down his his neck, and held her close to him.

"Let me go. I shall be so late."

"I can't, besides——"

"Why didn't we meet three years ago?" A pause. "I meet you like this is very, very wrong."

"Rot!" the man ejaculated.

She was working, and her thoughts kept time to her notepaper.

"Good-bye, Dick."

"God bless you, my darling."

* * * * *

At the gate, by the cornfield, the man and woman met.

"I am going out shooting to-morrow," he said.

She opened her blue eyes bewildered.

"One must have a change," shortly.

"Yes," replied the woman sadly, "and I shall be glad and she sighed.

Oh! how she longed for a change. If only she could stooped like that three years ago. I wonder——" She meant never to see him again.

He was reading the paper and smoking his beloved wife's portrait which smiled down at him over his table.

A clock chimed three a.m. The man did not heed it as it slowly set.

He went into the library and locked the door; then he would be far away.

A knock at the door.

Going into the library she sat down.

"How he stoops! Always poring over those musty old stitch.

After that he began to write. Sheet after sheet of paper, and looked at her, opened his mouth to speak, but stoop, passed them; he half paused, then hurried on soon now."

"Bessie," he said softly.

"You look tired; you had better go to bed. I must see when you have gone. I can't help it, but I know that to to my gun and things; I shall be very late to-night."

"What ages we have been married"—stitch, stitch—while the late autumn sun flooded the room with colour She was very white; they were to say good-bye. She accidentally shot himself.

"You know, Dick, well enough," and the woman turned angrily now.

The woman lit a lamp and searched for some hair clustering round her almost childish face.

The man took her little arms and placed them round "more like thirteen years than three"—stitch, stitch—took a large parchment document out of his desk, and books, I suppose"—stitch, stitch. "I don't think he stopped, and took up his paper again.

It was a long sunny day, the late roses were heavy sleeping peacefully.

"No, no," he muttered, "better not," and he threw notepaper he covered, pausing at length to look at his sudden fear struck her. Still holding the paper in her commotion in the hall; he was coming home; she must go away for a little time, it would be easier to bear then.

"Bessie, dear," he said, "I have not made you very light, then he stole up to his wife's room. She was laid down her work and closed her eyes.

"Shooting!" She sat up and looked at him. "I read it over.

"It will be late when I come home; I want you to kiss the paper on the fire and watched it burn and smoulder with perfume, and the birds sang unceasingly.

"You are up very early," she said.

Yes, she would write to those friends up North, that talk just yet, and the light would hurt her eyes.

* * * * *

A man and his wife were sitting in the drawing-room, but sat smoking. At last, as daylight dawned, he took away. Then he took a fresh sheet and wrote five words yesterday.

"Besides what?" curiously.

Then he kissed her and went downstairs.

A hurried pretence of breakfast in the grey morning was dark and still; she was, oh! so glad she could not on it, and placed it with the parchment in a drawer.

She could not find any, she knew there had been some up his gun and examined it.

They did not see him; they were looking at each other. me, dear."

On a stretcher lay her husband, dead. He had didn't know you cared about it."

She opened a drawer. A folded parchment document, get the letter written quickly; she seized the sheet of paper.

The sun had set when she went slowly home. The house still held. On it was written:

"A change; perhaps he was weary too!"

"Then promise to come to-morrow?"

"I shall expect you. Good-bye, darling."

"No it is not rot, Dick, but I will try and come just happy, but I am going to try and make you happier."

"You are wanted at once," said a strange voice. A fingers, she followed the man out into the hall.

Bessie glanced mechanically at the paper which she and on the top a sheet of paper. There was a sudden wonder why I married him?" Stitch, stitch, stitch—away.

CHAPTER XVIII.

Finding the Scent.

Kenyon could never explain to himself how it was that he neither felt surprised nor greatly shocked, when Shenstone's treachery was revealed to him. He had not really suspected that Katherine Dale's lover had been playing a double game. If Mr. Daunt had not warned him, Harold would have gone on placing implicit confidence in Shenstone, telling him everything that occurred, and taking his advice at every step. And yet a thousand minute circumstances—a little coldness on Shenstone's part, or a little undue warmth of tone, a certain slackness in maintaining the cause of the absent man, which subsequent protestations could not quite make up for—these, and such like things, had produced an unconscious impression on Kenyon's mind, which made him at once recognise that the attorney had told him the truth.

He merely nodded when Simpson whispered the name, as if he quite expected to hear it; and then turned the conversation into another channel.

Presently Simpson rose to go upstairs, and possessing himself of Kenyon's hand he began protesting with tipsy earnestness that the letter he had written to the bank was only intended as a joke, and "not meant t' injure you, Mishter Kenyon, in any shape or form." Kenyon assured the little vagabond that neither he nor anyone else would suffer on account of the disclosure he had made, and saw him led off to bed with much satisfaction.

When left alone Harold set about reviewing the situation in the light of this new fact which he had learned, and trying to find a reason for Shenstone's conduct. For more than two hours he sat there almost motionless, endeavouring to reason from the known to the unknown, and thinking what his next step ought to be.

The startling fact was that Shenstone had paid what was a considerable bribe—paid it, too, at a time when, as Harold knew, money was by no means plentiful with him—to check the prosecution of the search after Vere. There was no other conceivable motive for Shenstone's conduct. He wanted Vere to remain in seclusion. But why?

That was the question that haunted Harold's mind; and he could find no answer to it—that is, no satisfactory answer. A thousand wild surmises ran through his brain. Perhaps Shenstone was secretly in love with the Rector's daughter, and had murdered Vere to prevent the marriage taking place. Or perhaps he had been in love with Miss Unwin, and had beguiled her to the lonely spot in which the body was found, and shot her, out of jealousy. Or perhaps he was a relation of Miss Unwin, though he was too proud to acknowledge it, and had murdered Vere for his conduct to the girl, and had then taken the girl's life to conceal his former crime.

But these were all so many guesses in the dark, and afforded no guide for him in the future. On two points only he felt clear. One was that he would give Shenstone no hint that his double-dealing had been discovered. Simpson, no doubt, would hold his tongue for his own sake. The second point was that he would see Mr. Daunt at once, and be guided by him as to the next steps he ought to take.

Next morning, accordingly, he went straight to Mr. Daunt's office.

The old lawyer heard the news with a grim smile of satisfaction.

"We must find out something more about this man Shenstone," said he. "But tell me, in the first place, can you imagine any reason why he should have wished to injure you personally?"

Harold hesitated a moment. He remembered that he might perhaps have offended Shenstone by declining to allow him to overdraw his account at the bank without security. But then there was no likelihood that any manager who might have been sent down to Darnport in his place would act more leniently. And although Shenstone and himself were rivals in respect of Kate, Shenstone was the successful man, and had nothing to fear (as he must know very well) from his competitor.

"No," answered Harold; "I don't see any motive Shenstone could have had for injuring me."

"Can you think of any reason he could have had for requiring your presence in Darnport?"

"No."

"You had told him, I presume, that you meant to prosecute the search for Vere?"

"Oh, yes; he was helping me in the matter."

"Then I think we may assume, for the present at all events, that it was to hinder that search, to stop it, in fact, that he caused that letter to be written to the bankers, your employers."

"I am quite of the same opinion. But I can't see what I can do. I have advertised for Vere without any success. I don't dare to do so now, for fear that those who might have information to give may communicate with the police. I have not a ghost of a clue to guide me."

"And yet," said the lawyer thoughtfully, "a clue must be within your reach, or Shenstone would not have given himself so much trouble to get you put out of the way of finding it."

"Do you think so?" cried Harold.

"I am sure of it."

"But what can the hidden clue be? What is the point that Shenstone is so madly afraid of my touching?"

"Let me see. Didn't you say that Shenstone had done something to help you in your investigations?"

"Just a little. He called on Beaumont—or said he did—took him to the restaurant at which Vere had left his overcoat, and found that the waiter could not identify him as Vere's companion on the Tuesday evening—the night when Vere disappeared."

"Stop a moment. Did you propose, or did Shenstone, that he should undertake that job?"

"Shenstone offered to do it himself," answered Kenyon, after a moment's recollection.

"Then that is the point to which we must direct our attention. But I'm afraid I must ask you to excuse me. I have an appointment for 10.30, and I heard the people come in some minutes ago. Come back this afternoon; for I am deeply interested in this affair of yours, and I mean to see you through with it."

Harold went off at once, as a matter of course, though he was much annoyed that the conversation had been cut short before Mr. Daunt had offered him a word of advice.

But he felt that he must in the first place become, for the time being, his own master. He might be sent back to Darnport at any moment; and it would not do for him to be hampered in that way. He went to the bank, therefore, and told Mr. Bonnington privately that he had discovered the person who had accused him of negligence, and had ascertained beyond a doubt that the letter had not been written in good faith.

Mr. Bonnington stared when he heard this, and naturally wanted to know more. Kenyon, however, did not feel himself at liberty to go into particulars; and the banker had known Kenyon so many years that he was content to say no more, but accept his word for what he had stated.

Kenyon then begged his old friend to procure him leave of absence for three or four weeks, assuring him that at that season of the year, Mr. Green, the cashier at Darnport, was perfectly capable of transacting the small amount of business which was coming in, and adding that he could not retain his situation unless his request was granted.

Mr. Bonnington was at first little disposed to grant what he felt was an unreasonable demand; he told Kenyon that he was a fool; that it is easier to resign a post than to find a new one, and so on. But in the end he said good-naturedly that he could not see him ruined, and that he would manage to send someone to take his place at Darnport for the next three weeks.

"I will never forget your kindness, sir," said Harold, "and you may rely on it, that if the—the painful private business I am engaged in—is finished before the three weeks are over, I will not delay an hour in returning to my place at Darnport."

Having rid himself of this obstacle, which might have proved a formidable one, Harold left the bank. It was then only a quarter-past eleven; and he felt that he could not trouble Mr. Daunt again till after three—nearly four hours to wait. And it seemed to Kenyon that he could not spend this time better than in ascertaining whether Beaumont had really seen Vere on Tuesday evening, or whether Shenstone had lied when he reported that he had ascertained that Beaumont had not been in Vere's company that night.

So, without pausing to reflect, he walked rapidly to Mr. Beaumont's office.

CHAPTER XIX.

A CHECK.

"I HOPE you will forgive my troubling you a second time," said Kenyon to the young lawyer; "but I am anxious to ascertain when you last saw my friend Launcelot Vere."

Beaumont sat looking at his visitor a few seconds without speaking.

"When I last saw Launcelot Vere?" he repeated—"I—really—I can hardly say, at this distance of time. When a man has a good many engagements he can't remember them all."

"You had an appointment with him, you remember, for the evening of the day on which he was last heard of," said Harold. "May I ask if you saw him at all on that day, Tuesday?"

Mr. Beaumont shook his head.

"You feel sure of that?"

"Perfectly sure."

"You can't imagine any reason why he did not keep his engagement with you?"

"No, indeed, I can't."

"Thank you," said Kenyon rising. "By the way," he added, "do you mind telling me if a Mr. Shenstone called on you lately?"

Kenyon stopped short.

Something—a nervous tremor, or a too apparent exercise of self-control—in the lawyer's face had brought back the vague distrust which he had before felt about this man. And in the same instant Harold stood aghast at his own folly. For if Beaumont was not to be trusted, the only result of putting these questions must be to arouse his suspicions. And it was a quick, suspicious glance he threw at his questioner, as he replied abruptly:

"Shenstone? No! Don't know any such name. Good-day."

"What an ass I have been!" cried Kenyon to himself, as he left the office. "How can I find out whether this fellow is speaking the truth?"

The answer suggested itself readily. He must confront him with the waiter from whom he had received Vere's overcoat.

Harold at once jumped into a hansom, and in a few minutes was deposited at the "Cock Pheasant."

"Forbes," he said, going up to the stout, sandy-haired waiter, "can you come with me for an hour or two?"

"I'm afraid it's impossible, sir. After hours, I might—"

"That won't do," interrupted Harold. "But it is still early in the day. Can't you find a substitute? I may only want you for half-an-hour or forty minutes; and I will pay you well for your trouble."

Still Forbes looked doubtful.

Kenyon slipped a sovereign into his hand. This wrought a marvellous change in his demeanour.

"Luncheons will be on immediately, sir," he said, "they're beginning now. But from three to five there ain't so much doing. I might be able to get away for an hour, or even two hours, about that time."

Kenyon was impatient at the delay, but there was no help for it; and he thought he might as well spend the time there as anywhere else. He ordered luncheon, therefore, with a bottle of wine; and waited as patiently as he could, until Forbes announced that he had got an hour's leave, and was ready to accompany him.

By this time it was half-past three. The weather was raw and foggy; and in the narrow passage into which Beaumont's office opened, it was almost dark.

"You remember the gentleman who left the overcoat you gave me?" said Kenyon to his companion, when they had reached the spot.

"Cert'nly, sir."

"And do you think you would recognise the gentleman who was with him that night?"

"Yes, sir; I feel pretty certain I could."

"Then I must tell you that this gentleman" (pointing to Mr. Beaumont's name on the door-post) "denies that he was with my friend that evening, and I want to find out whether he is telling the truth. Can you make some excuse for going in and speaking to him?"

Accident rendered it unnecessary for Forbes to tax his inventive faculties. At that moment the office-door opened, and Beaumont himself came out. Kenyon had just time to step back a pace or two, leaving the waiter standing right in the lawyer's path.

Forbes stared hard at him, but Beaumont did not apparently notice it.

"Beg pardon, sir," said the waiter, "but I think you were with a gentleman as left his overcoat at our place, the 'Cock Pheasant,' about three weeks since."

Beaumont started and stared at the speaker, his face growing paler each moment.

"Not I, my man. You've made a mistake. I know nothing about it," he said roughly.

Forbes fell back, and the lawyer's eyes wandered to the corner where Kenyon was standing. Harold, on his part, felt ashamed of the part he was playing, necessary as he believed it to be. He would have been glad if Mr. Beaumont had not noticed him; and he expected to receive a look of indignant scorn, perhaps a few contemptuous words, from the man whose word he had doubted.

But it was a very different expression from contempt that rested on the lawyer's face—it was fear. Swiftly his glance travelled from Harold to the waiter and back again. There could be no doubt in his mind that Harold had brought the man there on purpose to see whether he had spoken the truth, when he denied that he had been in Vere's company on that Tuesday evening.

He seemed about to speak, then apparently he changed his mind, turned his pale face away, and crept along the passage towards the street.

"There goes a guilty man, if ever there was one!" said Harold to himself.

Forbes nodded his head emphatically.

"That's the man, sir," said he. "I'll take my oath on it. I wasn't quite certain till I heard him speak, but now I know I'm right. He may deny it as much as he likes."

Harold told Forbes he had no doubt he was right, gave him an additional half sovereign, and dismissed him.

But on going to Mr. Daunt's office to report progress, Harold found that a disappointment awaited him. Mr. Daunt had been called away on important business, and would not be back at his office that day. He had left a message for Kenyon, explaining this, and adding that he should expect to see him in the morning.

This was particularly provoking. Harold felt that he was approaching a crisis. Beaumont knew that his falsehood had been discovered, and he must know that Vere's friends would naturally ask—What was the reason for that falsehood? If he was concerned, directly or indirectly, in Vere's disappearance, he had abundant warning that denials would no longer serve his turn. Harold was convinced that it would be a fatal mistake to give him time to prepare his defences. He ought to be pressed at once.

Kenyon pondered the question for some moments, and then decided to see Beaumont again, and point out that it was certain that he was the last person in whose company Vere had been seen, and put it to him plainly that suspicion of a very black kind must rest upon him, if he did not at once tell all he knew about the missing man.

Ten minutes took him back to Mr. Beaumont's office. The door was shut and locked, and no light shone from within. Harold was alarmed at this, for all the other offices on the staircase were open, and clerks were coming and going busily in all directions. Yet there was no notice of any kind posted on the door, to intimate that it would be opened again that night.

Harold waited for more than an hour—waited till every other office was closed, and all the clerks had gone home. But Mr. Beaumont's door remained closed.

Next morning Kenyon was there before ten. The lawyer's office was still shut. There was still hope, he thought. Beaumont had evidently not very much practice. He might be in the habit of coming down late; and the clerk—there was but one—might have fallen into idle habits. He might put in an appearance at any moment.

But every minute this hope became fainter, till at last, when twelve o'clock struck and no one had appeared to open the door, it died away altogether. It was plain that the last man who had seen Vere alive had fled, the moment he was recognised, and had carried with him the secret of Launcelot's life or death.

CHAPTER XX.

The Trail is Recovered.

"My dear fellow, what is the matter with you?" cried Mr. Daunt, starting from his chair, as Harold came into his room. "Surely you are ill."

"Nothing is the matter," answered Kenyon, "except that I am now convinced that poor Vere has met with foul play and I—ass, blind, insensate fool that I am——"

"You are white as a sheet, and—here, drink this," said the old lawyer, pouring out a glass of port from a decanter he produced from a bookcase. "Now, tell me what has happened."

"I have hardly the patience to tell it. In order to find out whether Beaumont had really been with Vere up to the time he disappeared, I went to inquire of—whom do you think? Beaumont himself. He denied that he had seen Vere at all that day. I had sense enough to see that he was lying, however; and I took the waiter who had noticed Vere and his companion at the restaurant, to see whether he could identify Beaumont. Do I make myself clear?"

Mr. Daunt nodded.

"Unfortunately I had not given the waiter proper warning, so that, in speaking to Beaumont, the man allowed him to see that it was known, or at least suspected, that he had lied when he denied being in Beaumont's company that night. I was foolish enough to go to the office myself, instead of simply giving the waiter proper directions; and so Beaumont saw us together. In that way he got full warning, and now—he has bolted."

"Bolted! Surely not!"

"His office door was shut before closing time last night, and it has not been opened again."

"But that looks serious! It looks as if——"

The old man stopped, staring at his visitor in silence.

"As if he had murdered your friend, and fled in a panic as soon as it became known that he and Vere had been seen together"—that was the thought that was in Mr. Daunt's mind, although, out of consideration for Kenyon, he did not utter it. And Kenyon knew well that that was the old man's meaning.

"Can anything be done?" he asked, almost in a whisper.

"If he were going to leave the country, he must be on the Continent by this time," said the lawyer, as if speaking to himself. "And in any case, we can't apply for a warrant. There isn't evidence enough against him, by a long way. No," he added, after a pause, "the law can't help us. But that is not to say that we may not help ourselves. Do you go and discover this Mr. Beaumont's private address. Hunt it up from his landlord, his clerk, his—anybody you can think of. When you've got it, come for me, and we'll call there together. Meantime I will make inquiries, and find out something about Beaumont—his past history, his character, and so on. It is just possible that I may hear something that will throw a ray of light on our path. Stay a moment, here is my card with my private address—29, St. James's Square. Can you dine with me to-night, at seven? Very happy if you can. Then we can compare notes, and try to decide on our future plans. Good-day, for the present."

Kenyon's task was by no means so easy as it looked. There are thousands of men in London, respectable men, too, many of them, of whom it might be said that no one but their laundresses are acquainted with their private addresses. They spend their days in their chambers or their offices, their evenings at their clubs; they have no occasion to tell their friends, or anyone, the exact locality of their bedrooms. And Kenyon told himself with a sigh that if Beaumont was the sort of man he feared he was, it was more than likely that he would be extremely reticent on that point.

But Harold had the whole day to work in, and he did not despair of success. He applied first of all to the agent of the landlord, whose name and address he soon ascertained. But the house agent could not help him. The only address Mr. Beaumont had given was that of an hotel at which he had been staying when he took the office. Then Kenyon tried the policeman on the beat, and then the officials of the Law Institution, but with no better success.

Then a bright idea occurred to him. He knew that junior clerks are generally on friendly terms with the lads employed by neighbouring firms, so he made advances to the office-boy in the office next to the one Mr. Beaumont had occupied, and obtained from him, without much difficulty, the name and address of the lad who had acted as Mr. Beaumont's clerk. The boy's name was Herbert Joyce, and he lived in Fetter Lane.

Kenyon went there at once, and found Joyce at home—a gawky, sullen-faced lad of seventeen.

"I have been at the office," said Kenyon, "and I find that Mr. Beaumont is away. Can you tell me his address?"

"No; he didn't leave no address."

"Can you tell me when he will be back?"

"No; he didn't say when he'd be back."

"Can you take a letter from me to him?"

The boy shook his head.

"Come. You must know his private address."

"No, I don't."

Harold was convinced that the lad was telling a falsehood. But how was he to make him speak the truth? Harold tried coaxing, bribing, even threatening him, all without any effect. It was evident that Beaumont had so worked upon the lad's fears or cupidity—it was impossible to believe that he had touched his affections, even supposing that Herbert Joyce had affections to be touched—that he would not betray the secret of his master's private address for any reason short of torture. For nearly an hour Harold intreated, bullied, and tempted him in vain. The boy would admit nothing; and at last Kenyon was forced to leave him without attaining his object.

By this time it was getting late in the afternoon, and Harold had not advanced a step. He wandered back to Beaumont's office, without any expectation that it might be open, but thinking that it was barely possible that some one of the clerks in the adjoining offices might have learned from Joyce some idea of the place his master lived in.

A hansom cab was waiting at the door of the house as Harold entered the passage; and when he left, half-an-hour later, after making many unsuccessful inquiries, the same cab was loitering about the street.

Harold, thinking that he might as well give up the hopeless quest, signalled to the cabman; and the cab drew up to the kerbstone.

"St. James's Square, Notting Hill," said Harold, preparing to enter the vehicle.

"Beg pardon, sir, but I have a regular job here. The gen'lm'n's very late to-night. He may be gone. Perhaps you would kindly look behind you in the passage, and see if his office is dark. Name of Beaumont." Kenyon started.

"The office is shut up," he said quickly; "and I am anxious to see him. Did you say you were in the habit of driving him?"

"'Most every night of my life, sir."

"Just take me to his house."

"Can't, sir. Don't know it. I only drove Mr. Beaumont to the corner of Sussex Street, in the Edgware Road."

"Drive me there, then," cried Harold, jumping into the cab.

"Now, it all depends on whether Beaumont had an alias for professional use," said Kenyon to himself. "If he had not, I will find his rooms, though I should have to ring every door-bell within a mile radius of the spot where I am set down."

It was dark when the hansom came at last to a standstill.

"That's the street the gentleman always turned down, and I fancy he lives there," said cabby, as he pocketed his fare.

Kenyon gave him an extra shilling for this hint, and began his tour among the houses which exhibited an "Apartments" card, with some hope of success.

And Fortune, tired of persecuting him, and retarding his efforts, smiled on him at last.

A trim maidservant answered his stereotyped inquiry with: "Yes, sir; but he's not at home."

Harold was delighted. He had not expected to find the fugitive at his fireside; and the fact of his absence went to show that he was on the right track

"Has he been long away?" he asked.

"Since yesterday afternoon, sir."

"Who is that, Jane?" said a gentle voice in the passage.

"Gentleman inquiring 'bout Mr. Beaumont," said the girl.

"He forgot to leave his address," said the landlady, coming forward.

Miss Bruce—that was the lady's name—was not by any means a typical London landlady; which was explained by the fact that she was not a Londoner. She was a mild-tempered, unsuspicious, garrulous creature, as Harold perceived at the first glance.

She asked him to walk in, and proceeded to exchange with him regrets that neither of them could satisfy the other's desire to know Mr. Beaumont's address. Kenyon purposely lingered, and encouraged her to talk, throwing in now and then a question about her rooms. Finally she insisted upon showing him some apartments which she had to let; and it occurred to Kenyon that he might as well take them. It would be much cheaper than living at an hotel; and he might learn something by becoming an inmate of the house.

"Have you any other lodgers, Miss Bruce?" he asked.

"None but Mr. Beaumont at present, sir, and he is so quiet you wouldn't know he was in the house. He never has company, I may say; not for six months—well there was one night, but he said the poor gentleman was suddenly overcome, and as he went away quietly and made no disturbance, I didn't say anything about it."

"Very good of you to overlook it, I'm sure," said Harold politely. "Mr. Beaumont had a bachelor party, I suppose."

"Oh, no, sir. The young gentleman and he had been dining out at a restaurant he said; and the gentleman had taken a little too much wine."

"When was that?" asked Harold quickly.

"Well, sir, let me see. It would be about three weeks ago—three weeks last Tuesday. Dear me, sir, there isn't anything wrong, is there?"

"No. But tell me about that young gentleman. He is a friend of mine, and I want to know when he came here, when he left, who went with him, and in fact all you can tell me. It is not mere curiosity that makes me ask you this—the truth is," Harold added, "I am sorry to say my friend has left a young lady he was engaged to be married to, and I am anxious to find him. Don't be afraid on his account. I am his friend, not the lady's. But I want to bring him back to her. I intreat you to tell me all you can."

Thus adjured Miss Bruce summoned her handmaid, and the sum of what Harold learnt was this:

That Mr. Beaumont had brought home with him, about eight o'clock on the evening in question, a gentleman whose description corresponded exactly with that of Vere. On his first coming in the strange gentleman seemed sober enough, but when the maid-servant went into Mr. Beaumont's dining-room, shortly after nine, he was asleep in his chair, and breathing very heavily. They had had nothing to drink but some coffee, and a little brandy and soda-water, so it must have been at dinner, Miss Bruce argued, that he had over-indulged himself. At any rate a cab came for him a little after nine, and he was so far gone, then, that Mr. Beaumont had almost to carry him into the street—he could hardly move one foot before the other; and the lady who was in the cab had to get out and help him in.

"The lady!" cried Harold, starting to his feet.

"Yes, sir; the gentleman's sister, Mr. Beaumont told us."

"Do you know where they drove him to?" asked Harold in a fever of excitement.

Miss Bruce shook her head; neither she nor her servant was able to say a word on this all-important point. From the description given of the lady, Harold had little doubt that she must have been Miss Unwin. That was the last piece of information he could elicit from either Miss Bruce or the servant; so, telling Miss Bruce that he would occupy his rooms next day, he left the house, and made the best of his way to St. James's Square.

WHAT DID YOU DO WITH YOUR FIRST WEEK'S SALARY?

A large amount of humour and pathos is indiscriminately mixed up in the actions of the boy who looks round for the best means of enjoying the full benefit of his first week's salary. One young man of fourteen on receiving his first five shillings from his employer expended the greater part of it in mussels for which his mother evinced a liking. Another boy laid out his little all in Spanish onions.

Everybody has had experience in this line before, and a guinea is offered to the person who sends in a description of the most humourous use to which he put his first week's salary. Each attempt must be written on a post-card, and the truth of the statement must be vouched for by another person. All attempts to be in by Monday, July 6th.

DROWNED NEAR HIS OWN DOOR.

"Why, that's Tom, my husband!" cried the poor woman; "I was expecting his ship to come in almost any day. He'd been gone a year on a voyage to South America, and now here he lies dead on the sand. Oh, God! what shall we do, what shall we do?"

The ship had foundered during a tremendous gale off the South Coast in the winter of 1879, and the body of this sailor (by the irony of fate) had been cast ashore within half a mile of his own cottage. Such an incident is dramatic; it appeals to the imagination and excites pity. But are there not thousands ——? What's the use of any more preamble? Read this:

"In the spring of 1884"—so runs a woman's letter—"my health began to slip away from me, as a dream does when one awakes. The first sign of what was happening was a feeling of languor and fatigue that I could not account for. My mind was full of small worries; and things that I commonly took no notice of assumed an importance which did not, I knew, properly belong to them.

"My appetite was bad and what little I ate gave me an intense pain at the chest which seemed to go through to the back between the shoulder blades. Not infrequently the pain in my stomach was so keen, and held out so long, as to double my body up as one folds a napkin. Following this there would come a sense of sinking as if the very ground were failing beneath me.

"Being unable to digest nourishing food, my strength vanished day by day until I had barely power to walk feebly about. All ambition to work was gone from me. With the least exertion I would lose my breath and my heart would throb and palpitate so that I was alarmed lest some one of these attacks might be fatal. Often I would sit for an hour or more, powerless to move hand or foot.

"During all this time I was troubled with other distressful symptoms which I will only allude to in few words. There was a belching of wind or gas from the stomach, foul and disgusting, which sickened me dreadfully; an aching head, sallow skin, a feeling of chilliness even on slight exposure, sleeplessness, mental anxiety and increasing exhaustion.

"I was treated by a doctor, and used many medicines suggested by others—all to no purpose. The disease seemed to be seated beyond the power of human skill to uproot it. I speak now of a time four years after I was first attacked. While in this wretched and apparently hopeless condition I read of what Mother Seigel's Curative Syrup had done in like cases. I procured this medicine from Mr. Gee, the chemist at Whitehaven. After taking it for a week I felt marked relief, and when I had used three bottles I could eat any kind of food; my strength gradually returned and in a short time I was well and strong as ever. This may sound almost incredible to some, but it is the simple truth."

The above letter is from a lady residing at Distington, near Whitehaven, Cumberland. For personal reasons she requests us not to publish her name at present, yet her illness and cure, as stated, are known to all in her neighbourhood. We append a note which explains itself:

"I can vouch for the accuracy of the above statement. I have known the lady for the past five years. (Signed) Charles Clarke, Postmaster, Distington, October 10th, 1894."

For one moment now let us consider two or three important facts. This lady suffered for four years. Read her letter again, and see what this fact means. Pain, loss and sorrow filled that dreary period. Yet she was finally cured in as many weeks. Had she known of Seigel's Syrup and used it at the outset she would have been cured at once. Not a day, not an hour, of all those four years but the Syrup would have set her on the road to health, had she used it to drive out her disease—indigestion and dyspepsia. Still, she suffered, and faced death, with help right at her elbow. Alas! she knew it not.

Now do you see why so many of us are like poor Tom, who was drowned at his own door?

PAUPER BLUE BLOOD.

CHAPTER I.

THE NICHE GEORGINA FILLED.

Two figures side by side watched a sunset.

"Glorious!" whispered the woman, shading her eyes with her hand, as if the crimson glow, the sea of gold with opal shores, dazzled her.

The man—tall, elderly, pale, with grey hair, and deep lines about his mouth—stared into space, the corners of his lips drawn down, his hands thrust in his pockets.

"It will soon pass," he answered, "and then darkness. You have read, Georgina, that the wicked 'love darkness rather than light, because their deeds are evil.' I look out of these God-made eyes, and loathe those God-made splendours. They rake up in my heart the embers of remorse—a long, long bitterness. One evil deed leading to another, till a chain is formed, twined round the soul—strangling—suffocating!"

He pointed with his thin fingers at the fading radiance of the sky. Beneath the amber haze a black cloud rose like a mountain out of a blue lake. He spoke again, while the woman watched his ever-changing expression with keen, wakeful eyes. His were dreamy and dim.

"You cannot always be in darkness, Georgina," shaking his head and contracting his brows; "the time comes when you can no longer hide the truth from yourself. You see your life about to be crowned with failure" (he shivered, as if the word cut him); "your pride, your honour, lowered to the dust; your name—that has been great for centuries—suddenly despised, branded by fraud!"

An ashen hue stole to his lips.

"Then," he continued, "you wake to the fearful discovery that you are your own destroyer; death alone can release you from the condemnation of the world, yet by your own works the terrors of death are increased tenfold."

All rights reserved.]

"Why?" asked the woman hoarsely.

"Because you have bartered immortality for a bauble, closed your eyes against the light gleaming from the great white throne. You have laughed and mocked at the real, and made obeisance to the unreal! Your feet have stumbled on dark mountains. In Hell there is outer darkness, and yet inextinguishable flame."

He clutched the woman's arm, and gazed straight into her eyes; his voice rose like a wail in the gathering gloom.

"There is light—the light of fire in the endless night of torment—that man may be able to see his folly, his ruin, his madness. But not light enough for him to read any record of deliverance, and possibility of pardon. How can a man face death with this in view?"

Two figures side by side.

The woman tried to speak, her lips moved, but failed to utter a sound. His hand was still upon her arm, holding it in a deadly clasp.

"Better unmitigated blackness," he whispered, as the after-glow of sunset spread its blood-hued fingers on the fair summer earth. "Better night without a solitary candle—a veil of Egyptian darkness—of solemn and palpable gloom!"

He felt a tremor of dread shake his listener's arm. The tightened fingers relaxed upon her sleeve, while a hand stroked her long white fingers.

"I won't scare you with terrors," he said softly.

She glanced up with a queer, incomprehensible smile. Its power and fascination seemed to lull the storm of misery in the man's soul. Yet the woman was not beautiful. Her eyes were bright and penetrating, her hair raven, her mouth wide. She had expression. Oh! yes, plenty of it! But the light that gleamed through the black lashes might have been borrowed from the eternal fires. A half sigh broke from her lips as she drew the man's hand against her heart.

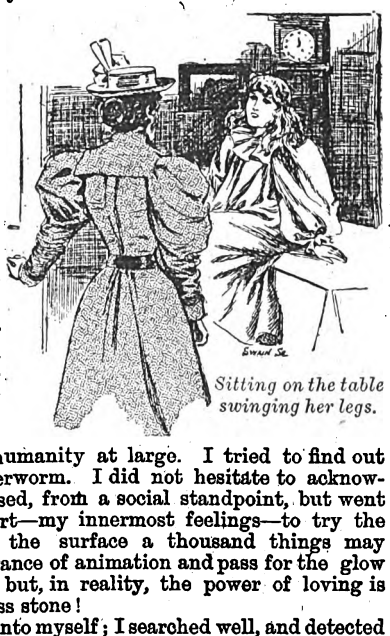
"Speak to me as you will," she murmured. "I fear nothing for you—so strong, so powerful—and Ravenscroft is not easily beaten, even when misfortune meets him face to face on the field. Take courage, and this depression will pass."

She spoke with prophetic power, but he bent his head to hide the thought now uppermost in his mind. Georgina was quick at reading thoughts when she looked into Sir Reginald's eyes. "Your wife knows nothing of this impending trouble—you have not prepared her for the blow?"

"No, Georgina; I am too great a coward. You, with your gentle tact and quick sympathy have drawn forth every secret of my heart, as you inspired the love which is yours to-day and for ever. I can speak to you as a kindred soul—a deeply thoughtful, clever woman—one that understands, counsels, sympathises, but does not betray."

"Strange," she replied, "that fate has placed me under your roof just when you needed me most. I used to think the world was empty — a great, blank wilderness through which I was destined to wander alone. I would ask myself the question a hundred times a day—why, why am I here? What can I do? It's so solitary walking through life all by myself. Perhaps, I argued, I am different to other people, repellent in my manner, shrinking too readily into my shell, fearing men and women alike, mistrusting humanity at large. I tried to find out where lay the cankerworm. I did not hesitate to acknowledge myself diseased, from a social standpoint, but went down into my heart—my innermost feelings—to try the pulses there. On the surface a thousand things may preserve the appearance of animation and pass for the glow of life and health; but, in reality, the power of loving is dead—cold as lifeless stone!



Sitting on the table swinging her legs.

"So I descended into myself; I searched well, and detected degeneracy. I was unsound in my lonely career. A worm had been eating out the core of my loveless heart. Then at the very height—or shall I say depth?—of my despair I found a niche to fill. I crept into it with freshly-beating pulses, like a hunted animal who suddenly sees the refuge he is seeking open before his bloodshot eyes. The niche was my corner in Ravenscroft Park, the refuge your heart. Then for the first time I realised the expulsive power of a new affection. It cast out fear, it killed honour, it made all men as shadows across my path. I thought of nothing, I yearned for nothing, but you—you—in the early morn to the sunset eve. Now, when I sit in my prim position of instructress over your child, I look only for some glimmer of likeness to you in my pupil's eye, some sound in her voice that reminds me I am teaching Reginald's child. It is a work of love—for you."

The woman spoke wildly; her passionate face seemed to kindle the last ray of dying sunset, till it flickered like an unholy flame between the two dark figures.

The surroundings appealed to her in their weird beauty, she stretched out her hands to the sky.

"What a lovely, yet what a deadly world!" she half moaned, pleasure and anguish battling in her soul. "The everlasting toll of the funeral bell, the ceaseless tears, the laughter, the joy, the pain. Love in itself is not sinful; how can it be when all things love? But to love in excess, that is crime, and its poison is upon me now, sapping my very life's blood."

"Hush," he said; "crime and love go ill together. Do not couple the two words."

"Then what would you call it? Madness? Infatuation?"

"Neither! Though the taunts of the world would be hurled at a union of hearts such as yours and mine, we can hide the secret away in the store-room of conscience, treasure it as the very essence of life, the wine of mortality. Do not stand up for the ignorant multitude to cast stones at you, but seek the safe and covered paths which are soft to the feet, and refreshingly beautiful!"

"Yes," she replied; "I have a right to choose my own way, for I have no one but myself to consider—and you. My life has been stormy, a struggle from birth, bereft of good influence, devoid of love. I have taken the kicks of the world patiently. Heaven forgive me if I linger over the sweets."

The darkness descended, and shadows of tall, imposing trees lay across wide gravel walks, casting an air of gloom and grandeur from their dizzy heights.

The figures turned to walk towards the house. Through the wide shrubbery and past the lake, till Ravenscroft Park, the splendid old family mansion, stood before them. Within and without the presence of wealth asserted itself.

"Ah!" thought Georgina Pluff, as she surveyed the land stretching away for miles, "how rich the verdure! What a splendid estate, and yet in the face of luxury and ease, ruin has dared to step forward, and is lurking within reach of these lordly portals. When the moment comes he will advance, knock boldly at the door, crying 'Admit, admit.' Even the stately Lady Ravenscroft, with her calm, pale, impassive face, cannot bid him nay. All the servants may not shut him out. He besieges the great hall, he fills the house to its very attics with his decayed and loathsome presence."

Georgina drew a deep breath. Yes, the proud Ravenscrofts must suffer poverty as she had known it.

Truly the awful and desperate time had arrived to justify the declaration: "Ye have set at nought all My counsel, and would none of My reproof: I also will laugh at your calamity; I will mock when your fear cometh."

Miss Georgina Pluff went to the schoolroom with lowered eyes. She found her pupil—a pretty girl of fourteen, with rosy cheeks and auburn curls—sitting on the table swinging her legs. Miss Pluff wondered if she ought to tell her it was "unladylike." But she looked at the unmistakable signs of breeding in the child's refined face, and felt that the term would be incongruous. Even the leg swinging was graceful, though careless.

"Where have you been, Miss Pluff?" asked Eva, in rather an aggrieved voice; "I've hunted for you everywhere."

"I was in the garden looking at the sunset."

"Oh! why didn't you call me? We might have tried to sketch it together."

"This is your hour for preparation. Why are you not working?"

Eva turned and regarded the open books on the table.

"Simply because I've done it all."

Miss Pluff involuntarily raised her eyebrows. The girl astonished her—she appeared to learn by magic, it was almost uncanny.

"Look," she said, drawing her governess to the window, and pointing to a figure on horseback riding up the drive, "do you know why Sefton is so late?"

Digitized by Google

Sir Reginald's son dismounted as Eva spoke, and the girl leant out of the window to wave to her brother.

"No," said Miss Pluff.

"He has been to Rosemont to see Lady Norah. She is very young, and very beautiful. Mother tells me they have an 'understanding.'"

"Then why are they not engaged?"

"Because Lady Norah is a shocking flirt. I heard the FitzJames's say so—she has broken ever so many hearts. Well, you see, her people do not want it made public till they are sure she is not going to change her mind. Of course, Sefton is quite certain she won't, and so am I, for who could help loving him? He is so handsome, and so delightfully passionate when fairly roused. I do love to see a man in a passion. Don't you?"

"I hardly know. It's such an odd idea, and certainly would not be pleasant if you were the object of the violent wrath!"

"No. But of course a man would never get really angry with a girl. Do you think Lady Norah will marry Sefton?"

"It seems a very suitable match; your brother is the only son of a baronet with untold wealth!"

There was a touch of satire in her tone that yet could not force back the angry tears from her eyes. She resented the sorrows hanging over Sir Reginald, and accepted them as her own.

"Could you marry Sefton, Miss Pluff?" continued Eva, engrossed with the subject. "I mean, of course, if you were Lady Norah."

Miss Pluff shrugged her shoulders. "My dear child, what nonsense you talk!"

"She has such green eyes, and they are always laughing at you, even when her lips do not smile. Their lashes are longer than yours, Miss Pluff, though I know you have good ones, and I dare say they are often admired. And then she dresses!"

The girl broke off with an expressive gesture, unable to describe the bewildering toilettes of the flighty and flirtatious Lady Norah.

"Oh! I forgot to tell you, Sefton brought me a lovely stamp album from London yesterday, and I want to show it to father. Look!" holding out her treasure, "isn't it a beauty? May I go and fetch him? He promised to give me the Bulawayo envelope that came this morning. He is always so interested in my stamps."

"What is the matter with father?"

The child spoke with undisguised pride and pleasure. Miss Pluff smiled.

"Yes, you may fetch your father, only be quick about it, for I must dress for dinner."

"You need not wait," replied Eva as she rushed away.

Sir Reginald Ravenscroft had insisted on Miss Pluff dining downstairs.

"You can't shut a girl like that up in a schoolroom alone all the evening," he had said reproachfully when Miss Pluff was first engaged.

Lady Ravenscroft had demurred, but had finally surrendered to her husband's wishes, saying:

"You know, Reggie, she's rather good-looking for a governess, but really, Sefton is so sensible, and quite wrapped up in Lady Norah, that perhaps it would not matter."

Eva returned with her father and the Bulawayo stamps.

Miss Georgina Pluff was still in the schoolroom.

CHAPTER II.

PREACHING DOWN A DAUGHTER'S HEART.

"WHAT is the matter with father?" asked Eva.

Lady Ravenscroft looked up from the book she was reading under the trees.

"He has a bad headache, and is lying down, so don't make a noise if you pass his room."

The girl watched her mother with rather a puzzled expression.

Lady Ravenscroft was one of those rare characters that think no evil. Her sweet calm face bore testimony to the placid lovable nature beneath. Always pale, but not with the pallor of ill-health, she had once been a very beautiful woman. Her smooth fair hair was parted off her forehead. She was simple yet stately, graceful in every movement, an adoring mother, a devoted wife.

"Do you think father is worried about anything?" said Eva after a pause.

"No, dear. Why do you ask?"

"Only I fancied he seemed different. He looks so dreadfully old!"

Lady Ravenscroft stirred uneasily.

"I am afraid his health is failing. I have tried to induce him to go to a doctor, but he always puts it off. Last week, when we were in town, I had the carriage waiting at the door to drive us to Harley Street. I put off an engagement purposely to accompany him, when a telegram came—some urgent business, he said. The following day he looked better, and pooh-poohed the idea of consulting Dr. Reynolds."

"Miss Pluff says it is his nerves. She noticed the change in him too."

The book slipped from Lady Ravenscroft's hands, and lay unheeded on the grass. A look of deep anxiety stole into her blue eyes. She stroked Eva's hair softly, as the child rested her head against her mother's knees.

The sound of wheels on the carriage drive changed the current of their thoughts, as a dog-cart driven by a girl came in sight.

"Why, it's Lady Norah," cried Eva springing to her feet.

"Yes, she has come to lunch. Sefton asked her yesterday."

The visitor drew up her horse on catching sight of Lady Ravenscroft under the trees, and sprang down as Eva and her mother came across the lawn to meet her. She wore a light summer driving coat, and a hat covered in brambles and wild roses. She smiled brightly under a wide white veil, advancing with a swinging gait.

They were standing by the lake.

"How cool—how ideal you looked in the delicious shade!" she cried. "And here is Sefton," as young Mr. Ravenscroft appeared. He had been listening for a voice and the sound of carriage wheels. She glanced merrily at him with those very open audacious eyes, which had already worked havoc among many of the susceptible rougher sex. She drew a brown driving glove off her right hand. Sefton's signet ring was on her second finger—evidence of the so-called "understanding." He had bought the diamond engagement ring, but Lady Norah was not yet allowed to accept it.

"Did you come over alone?" he asked, luring her away from Lady Ravenscroft on some trivial pretext.

"Yes—that is with Jennings, of course. He has taken the pony to the stables."

"You might have told me, and I would have fetched you. I thought your mother was coming."

"Oh! I am very independent. I go for miles alone. It is so nice to think, instead of talk. I am trying to train up my parents in the way they should go. I give them lectures on the necessity of freedom for the young. Give a mare her head, and she won't bolt. So take a warning, Sefton; when we are married don't try and hold me in, or the chances are I shall get the bit between my teeth, and then——"

Lady Norah gave a low whistle, and laughed one of her sweetest chimes, looking so adorable that her lover's heart beat wildly, and his eyes glowed as they rested on the flushed and rounded cheek.

She was as light-hearted as a child.

"Is that Eva's governess?" she asked.

"Where?"

"On the old tree stump by the lake," pointing to a figure in dull yellow.

"Yes; you know her, don't you?"

"Of course. We have often met, and she always gives me a shiver when I shake hands. I don't know why, unless that her palm is so fleshless, it is like clasping a thing of bone. I have a presentiment about that woman—something evil. See, she is coming towards us; what an odd slouching walk! How do you do, Miss Pluff?"

Lady Norah's tone changed as Georgina came within earshot, her gay, unaffected girlish manner contrasting with the governess's mechanical bow.

A conventional word on the weather and Miss Pluff passed, her lips compressed. She seemed like a woman moving in a waking dream. Her presence cast a momentary gloom over Lady Norah's evanescent spirits.

"Did you notice her face, Sefton? It was like a dead woman's."

"The result of a mustard gown," laughed the man. "Miss Pluff is a harmless, anæmic creature."

They were standing by the lake, Lady Norah looking down at her radiant reflection in the sunlight.

"What do you see in the water?" he asked, bending his head closer to hers.

"Two figures—mingling into one. Two figures destined for each other. Two lips—which meet!"

The last words were uttered with a little gasp as Sefton drew her to him.

"Are you happy, dearest?" he whispered.

"How can you ask? I don't suppose there is a more wildly happy and exultant being in the whole world. I am only afraid it is too good to last."

As she spoke Sefton's eyes fell on a gold chain bangle encircling her wrist.

"This is new," he said, touching it lightly.

"Yes," laughing up in his face; "an anonymous present from Captain Brooke."

Sefton's brow clouded.

"People always know who anonymous gifts come from," she continued, "at least, sensible people with guessing capacities. He was staying with us last week, and we made a daisy chain for fun, just to make believe that we were children. I wore it on my wrist until it faded. But he would not let me throw it away—he kept it. This chain is just the same size."

"Don't wear the thing," said Sefton, unfastening the clasp, "I hate the sight of it!"

Lady Norah drew away her hand with a reproving glance.

"That is just where your awful and horrible jealousy comes in," she said, shaking the roses and brambles at him seriously. "You should try and cure yourself, because it is such a stupid, childish fault."

"But you won't give the bangle up even to please me?"

"No," speaking decidedly. "I have a right to make a friend, and Captain Brooke has never said a word that even you could complain of."

The sunshine seemed to fade out of Sefton's morning.

"Very well," he said between his teeth; "do as you like."

Lady Norah turned away, and walked slowly towards the house. Sefton followed, ill at ease and sad.

"Was it an unkind action?" she wondered, fastening the open clasp. "A bangle was such a little thing; Sefton could not really mind." But all through lunch she was haunted by a string of familiar words: "You sow an action, you reap a habit; you sow a habit, you reap a character; you sow a character, and reap a destiny!"

When the dog-cart came round to take her home, Sefton announced his intention of driving to Rosemont with her, and walking back.

"It's such a long way," she said deprecatingly, "and I am sure you will be tired. Besides, I have to go back by the station to meet a friend." She coloured as she spoke.

"Is Captain Brooke coming down again?" asked Sefton quite casually.

Digitized by Google

Lady Norah owned that he was, and Mr. Ravenscroft declared that, perhaps, after all, it was too warm to walk, and saw her off with a mist before his eyes.

"Poor dear Sefton!" she thought, "it does him good to be teased sometimes. It would never do to let him know how utterly and hopelessly I adore him. He would become a perfect tyrant."

Nevertheless she felt strangely dull and miserable driving away through the green lanes, and more than once longed instinctively for Sefton.

Captain Brooke looked train-weary and out of sorts, though he brightened considerably at the sight of Lady Norah.

She noticed he glanced at the bangle, and talked aimlessly of daisy chains.

That evening, while Captain Brooke was smoking on the verandah with her brother, Lady Norah was summoned to her father's room.

Lord Cannington did not often interfere with his daughter, who had her own way in most things, and was generally considered the wilful pet of the house. But when he spoke his word was law. In his own domain Lord Cannington was an autocrat, and even Lady Norah trembled before his frown.

"What could he have to say to her in private?" she wondered with a vague misgiving.

She found her father waiting with a fretful smile that was meant to be kind. He patted her shoulder and hesitated before speaking. Then, clearing his throat, came straight to the point.

"You go with Lady Cannington to Worboise Manor to-morrow."

"Tell me, Norah, my dear, you don't really care for young Sefton Ravenscroft; not enough to break your heart if the marriage were impossible?"

The girl raised her eyes to his full of mute terror and astonishment, her cheeks blanched, and she moved a step back to free her shoulder from his hand.

"Care! Father, how can you ask?" twisting the signet ring upon her finger nervously round and round. "Of course, I love him. Have I not promised to be his wife?"

"Yes, yes," speaking impatiently, "and how many others were you as ready to promise, and remain faithful to for a week—perhaps a month? You have a remarkable facility for changing your mind, and I wish you to do so with regard to young Ravenscroft."

Norah stared at him incredulously.

"But I can't," she said, with moist eyes and dry lips. "It has gone too far; besides—there is no reason."

She steadied herself against Lord Cannington's desk.

"We will pass over the reason," muttered her father testily.

"No," she replied, her breath coming quick and fast; "out of common justice I must hear it."

"Well, well, don't excite yourself; no man is worth it. Listen calmly, and I will explain; only, mind you, not a word to anyone. It isn't often I trust a girl not to chatter, but you say you care for the fellow, so I'll take the risk. I alone happen to know that the Ravenscroft family stand in peril of immediate ruin. So far the state of Sir Reginald's affairs has been kept secret, but any day the catastrophe may be made public property. His son will be a pauper. You are not openly engaged, but think, Norah, how far better it will look for you to throw him over now than afterwards. Come, take a sensible view of the case, and for once be led by your elders. Write a letter to-night, and banish the matter from your mind. We can't have you throwing yourself away."

Lady Norah was silent. To her, poverty held terrors innumerable. She had been brought up to regard wealth as the chief object of matrimony, to marry a poor man was a social crime, suicidal and impossible. Yet she had learnt at last to love. Men had been her sport since she was sixteen, now that her heart had gone out to meet Sefton Ravenscroft's, now that she had tasted the very wine of life, the worldly teaching of her youth stepped in, to deny her lips that intoxicating draught!

Cruel, inexorable fate! She stood staring at her father like an image of stone, trembling before his stronger will; the free will, which is the pivot on which man's complex nature turns, the will that places him above the lower creation, making him a little god upon the earth.

"Is it—quite—true?" she gasped at last.

Lord Cannington seized the opportunity to strengthen his argument. He was a shrewd, clever man, and few girls of Lady Norah's age and temperament would have failed to be "talked round."

So long as everything was made easy she smiled, and danced through life heedlessly, but when the necessity arose to assert herself, and combat misfortune, she sank beneath the load tearful, yet unresisting.

Before the interview ended she had written the letter under her father's eye, shaken by low sobs, sealed it with Lord Cannington's seal, and fled weeping from his presence, to cry out her heart in her own room.

What did it mean? Marie, her maid—packing!

"Mais oui, Mademoiselle," in reply to a half incoherent question, "you go with Lady Cannington to Worboise Manor to-morrow."

The floor seemed slipping from under Norah's feet.

Marie handed her a silver bottle of salts.

"Mademoiselle is triste?"

At that moment "Mademoiselle's" eyes fell on the gold chain round her wrist. She tore it off, as if the contact stung her quivering flesh, and flung it with a dramatic gesture through the window.

"Go, Marie," she said, "and if you find that hateful thing, keep it, but never let me see it again."

The maid hurried below, anxious to recover the bauble.

Norah's second finger was ringless, but she pressed it to her lips, and kissed the dent upon it.

Her brain, her blood, her whole body and soul were in a fever and ferment.

What had she done? What had that urgent, stern, yet persuasive parent driven her to? She tried to recall the words of her letter, the heartless, lying note, which pleaded a worn out affection. No tear-stain betrayed the truth, she had cast out her love, killed her heart, henceforth the beauty of life must fade and wane.

The world claimed her, the terrible world of wealth, whose god is gold, and whose creed money, power, luxury, ease! She writhed upon her bed, and beat the pillows. It had crushed her and mastered her, the wide-mouthed devourer of souls. She could no longer bask in the sunshine of love, and play on youth's fair hills, for she had fallen unawares into the cavern that lay beneath the flowers, she could only dream of the heights, and wander bereaved in the depths.

That night Lord Cannington had a dream. He thought that the unknown powers placed two human lives in his hands—to use at his will—one was that of a man, the other of a woman.

"What can I do with them?" he asked. "I will throw them together, and they will solve the problem themselves."

And when these strange living creatures met they clung to each other in a fond embrace.

"The woman has fair hair and green eyes," whispered a voice. "Can't you see it is your daughter Norah?"

So he snatched her back and held her away, and bade the unseen spirit at his side take the man and hurl him into hell.

"For Norah," he said, "will never find him there."

A chorus of weird, unholy mirth greeted this assertion.

"Women can always reach the home of sinners," mocking voices cried. "Leave this man in the world, curse him, and brand him with the taint of Poverty, write it about his doors and upon his person. Then your daughter is safe indeed!"

And when Lord Cannington woke he was numb with cold, though the breath of the summer night came in warm waves through the open window.

CHAPTER III.

Sir Reginald Ravenscroft was alone in his room. His face ashen, his eyes sleepless, haggard, and wild, with a real yet unspoken terror he walked slowly to and fro.

Could he trust himself to see Georgina—his Georgina—once again? or would the power of her fascination master the decision he had made in the still hours, alone?

The fear of life overcame his horror of death; he weighed them on the scale of his unhinged intellect; and the vague hereafter appealed to his racked brain and tortured conscience with soothing unreality.

If it might only be sleep—sleep through endless ages of restless time—if the soul might slumber on, on, in peace. Yet something told him it was not so, and then he shrank in tremulous alarm.

No wonder Sir Reginald Ravenscroft stood aghast and reluctant—half persuaded of the soul's immortality, yet clinging to the hope of annihilation. Involuntarily his parched lips muttered the appalling penalty incurred by man through disobedience: "It is appointed to him once to die, and after that the judgment."

He ceased pacing the floor, and stood as one transfixed, gazing through the open window.

He had asked his wife to leave him in solitude, that he might sleep. Little she guessed the thoughts that were ensnaring his soul, and urging it on to eternal doom.

The evil spirits that attack the weak, had glided noiselessly into the very chambers of his heart, to blind his reason, and pervert his will. He could no longer wrestle against them, as he looked back on the gorgeous yet fleeting treasures of wealth, honour, and reputation, all gone, crumbled to dust under his feet. His corrupted affections and debased reason remained the lusts and passions that worked his own destruction, while sins long accumulating had eventually provoked the vengeance they deserved. Yes, he could no longer blind his eyes, this was the climax, this the end! He had tempted God, his career had been checked and crushed. It was time to go. Suddenly as he watched the sunset fading and remembered how only the night before Georgina stood beside him, pouring forth her love, a revival of his apparently dead principle leapt into life. As though to make up for its long torpor, it arose with the resistlessness of a fury, sweeping all the clogged recesses of memory, making each slighted warning and base misdoing sting like the bite of a fiery serpent on his soul.

In a frenzy he seized pen and paper, writing one last fond line to his wife:

"Forgive me, dearest, if you can. There is, alas! no other way. They say that only cowards commit suicide, but I maintain it takes a brave man to die. Tell our son to guard well the good old name, on which, had I lived, I should have brought dishonour. God bless you and the two dear children. Good-bye."

He placed the hurried writing in an envelope, addressed it to Lady Ravenscroft, and laid it on the blotter.

Then he went out quietly, meeting Eva on the stairs.

He kissed her passionately as she passed, declared his head was better, and he was going out.

"Shall I come, too?" she asked. "I am just running up to fetch Miss Pluff."

"Miss Pluff!"

He winced at the name.

"No, no, girlie! I—I would rather be alone."

Eva, leaning over the banisters, watched his steady step as he descended.

"Yes," she thought, "father is better. But I wonder why he looked at me so strangely and kissed me—oh, as if—as if he were never going to see me again."

Then she went silently to the schoolroom, determined Miss Pluff should not follow her father into the garden.

"Lady Norah has gone," she said, joining her governess. "Didn't she look sweet at lunch? Sefton never took his eyes off her, and ate nothing. That is 'being in love,' I suppose. He wanted to drive home with her, but she put him off. Something about a Captain Brooke and the station. Sefton looked awfully wild, and has hardly spoken since. I think it was rather mean of her, don't you?"

Miss Pluff was not sufficiently interested in Lady Norah or Sefton to offer an opinion.

"Is your father better?" she asked.

"Yes."

Miss Pluff had just caught sight of the tall, spare figure walking towards the shrubbery.

"Shall we go out in the garden, Eva?"

"If you like; only we must not follow father. He does not want to be disturbed."

Miss Pluff drew in her lips.

"I am sure mother doesn't know he's down. She is with Sefton in the boudoir. I think I'll go and tell her."

"I should advise you to do nothing of the sort; if your father wanted Lady Ravenscroft he could quite well have fetched her himself. When people's nerves are unhinged they are often cross and irritable, better left alone."

"Father is never cross," said Eva indignantly.

But Miss Pluff kept her pupil upstairs.

As Sir Reginald wandered alone in the gloomy shrubbery, his hand pressed upon something cold, he longed instinctively for human aid. Why had not his wife found the letter and rushed to stop him from his deadly deed?

But no, his fate was definitely planned—the hour had come.

Even as the thought flashed through his brain, Lady Ravenscroft was stealing on tiptoe to his door. She pushed it softly open and looked in.

Eva, leaning over the banisters, watched his steady step as he descended.

The bed, the sofa, were alike tenantless. Her husband was not lying down.

She entered the room surprised at his absence. The chair by the writing-table was pushed back, papers lay scattered broadcast, a pen had been left point downwards in the ink-pot.

Her eyes fell on the letter addressed to herself.

A horrible foreboding crept over Lady Ravenscroft. What could it mean? Why did he write to her?

She opened it with fingers that trembled in spite of herself, the words danced before her eyes. She looked round wildly, her blood freezing with terror, trying to cry out. Then rushing to the door her strangled voice broke forth: "Sefton! Sefton! Help—quick! Your father!"

The report of a gun sounded on the tranquil air, like a death-knell to her hopes.

"My God!" she cried, tottering forward, "he has done it!"

"Mother, what is the matter?" Sefton was by her side.

"Lady Ravenscroft is ill!" It was Miss Pluff's voice behind her.

"Who is shooting in the shrubbery?"

Eva's question gave her speech. "Reggie!" she muttered hoarsely. "He—he—has killed himself!"

With one accord they ran towards the spot whence the sound had come, Sefton ahead, Eva clinging to her mother's skirts, Miss Pluff alone—apart. Her hands were tightly clenched, her eyes starting from her head, her breast heaving with ill-concealed emotion.

"He would never do it," she said. "He had not the courage."

Sefton stopped suddenly, and sank upon his knees, as if to hide the terrible sight from his mother.

There lay Sir Reginald, ghastly and bloodstained, upon the moss and undergrowth, his head against a knot of roots, his hands flung back above his shoulder, his body contorted by the last grim struggle. Lady Ravenscroft viewed it in mute misery and speechless horror, involuntarily placing her hands over Eva's eyes, while she pressed the frightened child to her breast. It was the girl's arms that prevented her falling, as the two swayed together under the trees.

Then in the awful and solemn silence that fell upon their grief, a wild shriek rent the air, while Miss Pluff brushed past Sefton in her mustard dress, and sank upon the earth by the dead man's head.

Scream after scream, piercing and blood curdling, broke from her lips. She beat her brow with her hands, rocking herself to and fro in a paroxysm of hysterical, uncontrollable despair. Her tears streamed down and fell on Sir Reginald's damp hair; her face was hardly recognisable so distorted had it grown from anguish.

Her cries brought the whole household rushing to the spot—grooms, gardeners, men servants, all with white, scared faces, while the maids followed at a distance, whispering of murder in the gloom.

Mrs. Leslie, the housekeeper, advanced in rustling silk, and grasped the situation at a glance. The master was lying dead; the poor dear mistress, half fainting and stunned by the blow, stood, supported by her children, at the foot of that grim body; while Miss Pluff, the governess, moaned, shrieked and wailed, kissing him and crying over Sir Reginald's mutilated head. The shocking fatality of this sudden and mysterious death hardly horrified the good woman more than the sight of that presumptuous female, parading her grief in the face of Lady Ravenscroft.

Sefton turned to Mrs. Leslie with a pleading, piteous glance.

"Get her away, for mercy's sake; she is mad!"

Miss Pluff was conscious of a firm hand on her arm; someone drew her up sharply to her feet, and hurried her off against her will. Once she tried to dart back, but her intention was somewhat roughly frustrated by the buxom woman at her side.

"He's dead!" groaned Georgina. "Oh, my love—my life!"

Mrs. Leslie shook her with ill-natured vehemence, considering she was almost too weak to stand.

"You ought to be ashamed of yourself, and before my lady, too! As brazen and scandalous a scene to make as ever I saw over a poor dead gentleman! Who are you, I should like to know, to make his memory a talk among the servants? They won't have much to say for your character after this evening."

Miss Pluff listened dazed and stupefied. Her hysterical fit was subsiding under Mrs. Leslie's open reproaches, though she still wailed of her love in a spasmodic undertone.

"Who murdered him?" asked the housekeeper shrewdly, glancing round, as if expecting to see assassins hiding among the trees.

Miss Pluff shivered.

"I—I don't know, but he was cold. His dear eyes looked into mine, and their stare was glazed! Oh! how can I bear the bitter—bitter years to come?"

Mrs. Leslie set her lips, and still retaining Miss Pluff's arm, marched her on like a gaoler with a prisoner.

"Poor Mr. Sefton, he did look at you, as much as to say: 'Well there, who'd have thought it!'"

"You are a very cruel, unfeeling woman," hissed the governess, suddenly waking up to the realisation of the housekeeper's "insults," as she afterwards termed them. "You have evidently never known what it is to have your heart torn out, to suffer as I do to-day."

"No, thank the Lord. I have always kept myself respectable!"

They had reached the house, and Miss Pluff was conducted to her room, where she flung herself on the bed, and lay staring at the ceiling, with hands clasped on her breast, and limbs rigid.

Mrs. Leslie left her in disgust, declaring her affectation was past endurance, and anxious to return to the stricken widow and weeping, frightened child.

What passed in Miss Pluff's mind that night only herself and her conscience knew.

But sleep came not, and as she counted the hours she planned her future skilfully while still sobbing for the dead.

Sir Reginald had kindled a violent passion in Georgina's soul that left her hardened and resentful! The world was against her, and she against the world. Henceforth battle, conflict, strife!

Scruples? She had none. They should be buried with all that was good of her in the late baronet's grave.

So she laughed, and cried, and sobbed, till the morning light revealed the havoc caused by these oceans of tears.

Her face looked old and swollen; her eyes were weak, watery, almost sightless. As she viewed the sickening apparition in the mirror, she struck the glass with the back of her brush, in a fit of painful rage. It shivered and cracked from top to bottom. Georgina staggered back, sick with superstitious dread. She could not have explained the action, it seemed as if an inward power had moved her hand against her will.

"It is fate," she said. "I must fight that now." Then turning to the broken glass she addressed it in a hoarse whisper: "I challenge you, do your worst, I am not afraid."

* * * * *

Half the night Sefton sat by his mother's bed, holding her feverish hand, bathing the burning forehead and comforting her as best he could. He was gentle and considerate as a woman, no trained nurse could have tended Lady Ravenscroft with greater patience and skill. He soothed the desperate torrent of her grief, just as if his own heart was not tortured with fears, aching with pent-up sorrow, lacerated by the agony of bereavement.

He dared not ask himself what that letter meant, hinting darkly at disgrace, nor venture to suggest a reason for his father's self-sought death.

When at last she fell asleep, he crept softly from the room to listen at Eva's door.

He could hear a deep sigh, then a sob, and fretful tossing from side to side. He went in, and kneeling down, clasped the shuddering little figure in his strong arms, and whispered that she must be strong, "for mother's sake."

But not till he was alone did his manly frame break down before that human weakness, and shed in secret the tears which must fall for a parent's lost soul!

In the morning a mounted messenger left a note addressed to Sefton Ravenscroft, Esq.

It was the final drop in his bitter cup—the letter and the signet ring from Lady Norah.

"WAITER, AN ABSINTHE FRAPPÉE."

The Crime Confessed in a Club.

"We both loved her," my strange acquaintance continued gloomily, setting down his glass and leaning his elbow heavily upon the table, he, calmly and sedately, after his wonted manner, I, feverishly and furiously, in my way. She was worthy of any man's love. She was pure and sweet, and her cheeks were like white rose leaves.

"She favoured me; I knew that, and so did he; so did the old man, her father, he of the millions. It was this which led to the trouble between the old man and my hated rival, the nephew; the old man seemed to hold him responsible for losing the girl's affections, and was consequently enraged, because he wished the two to marry. He was always choleric and violent in his tantrums, and the night they quarrelled he was particularly so.

"Waiter, an absinthe frappée."

It was the third he had ordered. He drank doggedly, as suited his mood. Every drink seemed to intensify the desperate look in his eyes and the harsh expression about his lips.

Having quenched his inordinate thirst, he continued:

"I overheard part of the trouble, as did the servants in the house. The two were in the library, and the old man was storming in a loud voice. I had called at the house unknown to them, and was in the drawing-room where, standing alone near the door which led to the library, I could hear everything.

"Finally, the young man got up and went out, saying in his exasperatingly calm voice: 'You will think better of your words to-morrow.'

"'Curse you, I will not!' shouted the old man, and then a door closed gently, and I knew that he was alone.

"But still he kept on talking noisily to himself, condemning everybody to everlasting perdition—me, in particular. I heard him get up presently and go to the sideboard where he kept his liquors. Then he returned and settled himself in his chair before the fire, and I knew that he was preparing for his evening siesta. He always nodded an hour or two in his chair before he went to bed. Gradually his mutterings grew fainter, and after a time I ceased to hear his voice altogether. Then, by listening closely, I could hear his heavy breathing, and I knew that he was asleep.

"Now, it occurred to me, would be a good time to kill him. I had never before thought of murder, and the idea disturbed me somewhat, as you may believe. But there were reasons—pressing ones at that—why I wished him dead. My office as assistant prosecuting attorney of the city had cost me all the money I had saved from my practice, and the income it yielded me was not sufficient to supply all my wants. So, while I loved the daughter, I wanted the father's money, and there was only one way to get it—by putting him out of the way. Once out of the way, I would speedily effect a marriage and come into his millions.

"I reasoned out the plan well, as I stood there in the shadow of the curtains. It would be so easy to open the connecting door, steal into the library, cut the old man's throat, then steal out again and leave the house. When the crime was discovered—ha! the nephew would be charged with it! The servants would testify to his presence in the library, to the quarrel, to all the incriminating circumstances. And I—how could I be suspected? I was supposed to have left the house an hour before. Then, my position—an officer of the great city, a prosecutor of criminals, a man in whom the public had perfect confidence. I suspected? Never! and if I were, did I not have the legal machinery of the city at my command? Why, I knew secrets to ruin half the judges in town! They would not dare to convict me!

"'So,' I said, 'I will kill him.' I took a knife from my pocket, opened it, and tested the blade. It was very sharp. Then, with the greatest care, I opened the door, slowly, very slowly, lest I should wake the old man. He was in just the position I had pictured him, reclining in his great easy-chair before the fire, asleep, with his head on his bosom. You can imagine my feeling of exultation as I noted his helplessness. Waiter, an absinthe frappée!"

He waited moodily for the drink to be brought him, and said nothing more until it was drunk. Then he pursued his narrative.

"I stole cautiously to his side, and, with one swift stroke severed his jugular. He did not so much as moan. Then I retraced my steps and closed the door. The whole episode had not occupied a minute.

"As I passed out into the hall I encountered the nephew. We stared coldly at each other, and I hastened on out to the street.

Digitized by Google

"The next morning the newspapers were full of the crime. My rival had been arrested!

"I was happy. I hurried to the house, and offered my condolence to the bereaved daughter. She was almost prostrated with grief, and I alone could comfort her.

"When the day of trial came, I was on hand with my evidence against the prisoner. As assistant district attorney, it was my duty to prosecute him. He sat before the justice with that same maddening calmness that was habitual with him, and when our eyes met he gave me a look which aroused my hatred to the depths. It was full of consciousness of his own innocence, of challenge to me to do my worst, of assurance that I was the murderer. Yes, he knew the truth; I saw that instantly. But what did it profit him? What could he prove? Nothing. He was in the toils, and I was free to bind those toils more firmly about him.

"I would convict him. For my own welfare it was necessary, and I swore a mental oath that he should not escape. It is not easy to convict a man on circumstantial evidence; but my case was a strong one, while the defence was weak. As the trial proceeded, I felt that victory was certain. In my speech before the jury, I spun a web of incriminating evidence about him from which no amount of legal ingenuity could extricate him. I spoke of his unsuccessful attempt to win the murdered man's daughter, of the quarrel in the library, of the fact that within an hour after the murder was discovered, of the inheritance which the nephew had reason to expect at the death of his uncle. The argument was overwhelming. It was the strongest speech I ever made, and all the while he sat looking at me in that calm, accusing manner, that made me wish for a chance to cut his throat, too.

"The verdict was 'Guilty.'

"I think it surprised him. Serene in his innocence, he had not believed it possible to fix the crime upon him. He had underestimated my powers. 'Now,' I said to myself, 'he will be executed, and his portion of the old man's money will come to me.' How I rejoiced over my triumph! You will not drink? Waiter, an absinthe frappée!"

I was beginning to have a horror of the man—aye, and to fear him, for under the influence of his copious libations, his face had assumed an expression which, while almost fascinating, was yet dangerous and repulsive. Was he telling me the truth? If so, he was a veritable monster. I marvelled that he had made a confidant of me, since we were practically strangers. Perhaps he was crazy? No, he did not have the appearance of an insane man. My speculations were cut short by his resumption of his strange story:

"It was the night before my marriage. I sat in my room meditating, when there came a knock at the door and the man whom I had convicted of my own crime entered. He had escaped from the prison.

"I did not rise from my chair, but sat still, looking up at him. I cannot say that I was surprised to see him, for something had told me he would come.

"'Well?' I said; adding, 'if you are cold sit by the fire, and we will talk over the situation.'

"He drew up his chair, and sat down facing me, all the time watching me narrowly.

"'I must be very cautious,' he said, 'the police are doubtless looking for me by this time.'

"'Do you think this a safe place?' I asked.

"'I am taking chances,' he replied, shrugging his shoulders. 'I want to talk with you. I have something of importance to say.'

"'I suppose you wish to reproach me, or threaten me,' I ventured.

"'Oh, no,' he said carelessly, 'you did only what any villain would have done under the circumstances—that is—assuming that he was clever enough. You are very shrewd. You know, I did not expect to be convicted, although I saw everything going against me. But I had no proof against you, then, so what could I do?'

"'Sure enough, what could you do?' said I. 'You have proof against me now, then?'

"'What's more important,' he rejoined, 'I have the will.'

"'The deuce!' I exclaimed, 'that accounts for it's not being found.'

"'So it does,' said he. 'Now, what do you suppose the will decrees?—that the money and property shall be equally divided between the daughter and me, provided—notice the provision—that we marry within six months after his death! in case we fail to marry, for any reason whatsoever, except death, the estate is to be distributed among other relatives and charities.'

"I uttered an oath. 'That's a nice state of things,' I added.

"'Yes,' he replied, 'the old man was always crazy, and this piece of business is characteristic.'

"'But the daughter could break the will,' I suggested.

"'No,' said he. 'She is not his daughter. She is only an adopted daughter, and not legally adopted at that.'

"'Now, this is serious,' said I, as I got up and paced the floor. 'Will you have something to drink?'

"'Thank you,' he answered, filling the glass I extended him. Waiter, an absinthe frappée!"

I watched his eyes as he waited for the drink to be brought him. They were positively baleful, and green—exactly the colour of the absinthe. "After all," I said to myself, "he is insane." Suddenly he resumed:

"'What effect on the case would your death have?' I asked him.

"'This will provides that in the event of the death of either of us before the marriage can occur, the survivor shall inherit all.'

"'Then,' said I, 'the case is just this: If I marry the girl to-morrow night, with you alive, I marry a pauper; if I marry her with you dead, I marry a millionaire heiress?'

"'Exactly,' said he.

"'Have you the will with you?' I asked. 'It might be destroyed.'

"'Unfortunately,' he replied, somewhat sarcastically, 'my lawyer probated it this afternoon. Now,' he went on, 'I have a proposition to make you: If you will go with me to the girl and confess the crime, in order that I may be placed in her esteem and marry her, I will give you two million francs.'

"'Impossible!' I declared; 'you would be re-arrested at once. Besides, I love her.'

"'So do I,' said he, 'and I will take all chances of being apprehended.'

"'Impossible!' I said again. 'She loves me. She would not marry you. The only feasible solution of this problem is for you to die within the next twenty-four hours.'

"'It certainly looks that way,' he admitted.

"'Don't you see,' I continued, 'that you are standing in the way of the girl's happiness? She loves me, and is happy in the prospect of marrying me to-morrow night. In case anything happened to prevent her, her disappointment would be great; likewise the loss of the fortune she believes to be hers. Now, if you love her, and desire her happiness, why do you not yield to circumstances and get out of the way? You are under sentence to die a month hence; what difference can a month make to you? You have nothing to live for, you can accomplish no good in that time, whereas if you die at once, your demise will vastly benefit both of us. Come, be generous!'

"'You would suggest, then,' he said, 'that I commit suicide?'

"'Capital!' I asserted; 'or, for that matter, I could kill you.'

"'But that would get you into trouble,' he smiled; 'you might fail to escape so cleverly as you did before. Then the whole plan would be baulked.'

"'True,' I returned; 'I agree with you that suicide is better. What do you say, then? Remember it is for her sake.'

"The appeal had its effect. He sat thinking the situation over for some time, and finally said:

"'You have got me in a very bad position. While knowing that my fate should be yours, by rights, I yet am wholly without power to compass your punishment without utterly destroying the peace of mind of her I love. Then, should I try to fasten the crime of which I stand convicted upon you, whatever proofs of your guilt I might offer, you would probably beat me and send me to the gallows; I had much rather die by my own hand, in the free air of heaven, than be executed by the warden of a prison.'

"'Sensible!' I commented.

"'I am liable to be recaptured at any minute,' he went on, in the same philosophic tone. 'I am not good at dodging the sleuthhounds of the law. Once recaptured, I am doomed to the noose. All in all, suicide seems the best way out of the difficulty. There is one thing, however, which you must promise me; will you take good care of her and make her happy?'

"'By all means,' I responded.

"'Then it is settled,' said he; 'I will die before this time to-morrow night.' He arose and went to the door. 'Good-night,' he added in farewell.

"'Good-night,' I returned, and he went out.

"'He is an obliging sort,' I said to myself. 'I should like to know if he means to keep his word.'

"I donned my coat and hat, thinking to follow him; but when I reached the street he was nowhere in sight.

"The next morning I read in the papers that the escaped murderer had been found with a bullet in his brain, in a small side street of the town, not dead, but seriously wounded and unconscious. He had been taken to a hospital.

"'Confound him! to bungle the job!' I thought.

"Then I went to the office of the probate clerk and examined the will. One passage in the singular document exercised me considerably. 'If, within six months after my death,' it read, 'either of the two individuals named marries a third person—except it be after the death of the other—all the property aforesaid shall be distributed to the aforesaid charities.' 'The dickins!' I said, exasperated, 'if he is not dead by eight o'clock to-night every penny is lost.'

"I made it a point to tell the bride nothing of what had happened. Busy with her preparations for the wedding, she did not look at the newspaper, and it was not until some days later that she was informed of her cousin's action. I spent most of the afternoon in the big house I was soon to be master of, and I remember how very sweet and happy she was.

"At six o'clock, just as it was growing dark, I visited the hospital to see the convict patient. He was not dead yet, I was informed; indeed, it was thought he would recover.

"I was left alone with him for a few minutes. Finding him conscious, I took advantage of the opportunity to explain to him the necessity of his dying before eight o'clock, the time set for the wedding.

"He readily agreed with me that no time was to be lost if his laudable purpose was to succeed, and suggested that I put an end to him then and there.

"'Can't you do it yourself?' said I, disliking the task.

"'Too weak,' he responded.

"I saw there was no help for it, so I prepared to do his bidding. 'I am sorry,' I said, 'but you see how it is. It's a great pity you didn't aim a little better.'

"'So it is,' said he.

"'Good-bye,' I said, and shook his hand. 'I'll not find any fault with you. You have won my hearty respect as it is.'

"Then I quickly pressed the pillow over his face, and when I took it away he was dead.

"I hastened to call an attendant, and then left the place to dress for my wedding. Waiter, another absinthe frappée."

My thoughts were by this time past description. The man seemed to me the very incarnation of evil. I was in a cold perspiration, and shuddered at the very sound of his voice.

"The wedding was quiet, but magnificent," he went on—"that is, the presents were many and costly, and those in attendance were all notables of the fashionable world—intimate friends, you know."

He hesitated for a few moments, sipping the emerald liquid absently. Then he threw the glass to the floor, and rose unsteadily to his feet, while his face was bent over the table until his tainted breath scorched my cheek:

"That was five years ago," he exclaimed. "Since then I have spent five million francs, mostly in absinthe! I swim in a sea of absinthe! I love it—I hate it, and I drink, drink, drink! As for her—oh, she died last night, drunk with absinthe! I taught her to drink it, and I'm proud of it! I've spent to-night the last penny I've got to my name, and I'm happy, because I, too, am drunk with absinthe! I'll never have enough money to buy it again, so I'm going to die while I'm happy. Good-night, my friend."

He staggered out of the club and committed suicide within the hour. Whether or not the story he told me was true, I have never been able to discover.

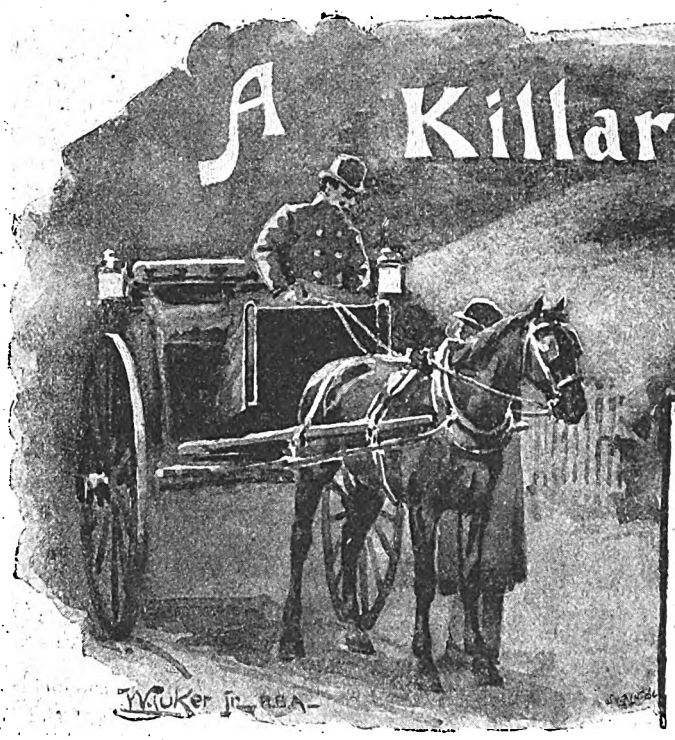
A Killarney Idyl.



Phelim McCaul was not in a particularly good humour as he strode along the rough, mountain path, whistling a faction tune between his teeth, and cutting savagely at the wayside brambles that shivered in the sharp east wind which, appropriately enough, was heralding the Lenten season down the famous Gap of Dunloe.

Judged from Mr. McCaul's standpoint, the situation was a tantalising one. Here he was, a man of thirty-four, with a tidy bit put by, a snug farm and no encumbrance whatever, actually unmarried this blessed Ash Wednesday Eve, and likely to remain so during the coming twelve months, all owing to the unreasonableness of one Thady O'Rafferty, whose daughter, Mollie, Phelim sought in marriage, the negotiations having been broken off that very evening for positively the last time.

Had Phelim been a trifle older, or a trifle more philosophic, he would have probably told himself the disappointment was simply a blessing in disguise, but being still young, and not at all a philosopher, he chafed fiercely at the broken match and heartily cursed Mr. O'Rafferty as he went.

Absorbed in bitter reflections, he did not hear the approaching rattle of gig wheels behind, and it was not until a friendly voice had thrice shouted his name from lungs rendered stentorian by mountain air, that Phelim knew he had a fellow traveller on the road. Thus challenged, he faced round, and recognising his interlocutor as an acquaintance named Lanigan, who rented a farm a mile or so from his own place, came to a halt.

"Yerrah, Phelim, boy, where are ye goin' at that rate this hour o' night?" asked the new-comer, accommodating his horse's pace to that of the young man as they moved forward together, "sure I thought 'tis down colloquing with Mollie O'Rafferty ye'd be this minnit instead of flyin' all over the county like thistle-down——"

"That's all off now!" replied Phelim sulkily, not well pleased at Lanigan's observation, but too true an Irishman to resist the temptation of chattering about his own affairs; "the mane little blaggard of a father wouldn't give a penny more than two hundred quid with the girl, an' he, after as good as promisin' three hundred a fortnight ago, an' I knowin' he had eight hundred lodged in the bank in Killarney!"

"Is it truth ye're tellin' me?"

"Oh, divil recave the lie, an' divil recave the ha'penny more he'd advance; an' I, after swearin' to his face I'd not marry any girl under five hundred!"

"Right y'are, I like your sperret——"

"Sure if I did, I'd be disgraced for ever—lavin' meself down like that, an' there's no fear me wife 'ud respect me either."

"Oh, begob, I suppose he thought that as ye were dacent ye'd the soft vein in ye too," commented the other, cracking his whip, "I suppose he believed that since Miss Mollie was at the convent for a year an' could play the pianny, the head 'ud be turned on yer shoulders."

"Faith, then he never made a bigger mistake in his life," retorted the rejected suitor, knitting his short, straight brows, "there's not such a differ between wan girl an' another as all that, an' 'twould take a keener man than Thady O'Rafferty to fool me anyway—himself an' his daughter, the cross-eyed——"

"I don't wonder at yer feelin' hurt," interposed Lanigan smoothly, as he reined up, for they had reached a spot where the road branched off in different directions, "but never say die, there's as good fish in the say as ever was caught, an' if ye're willin', ye can still be a married man this very Shrove!"

Phelim laughed bitterly, he was in no mood for wooing now.

"I have three daughters yonder," pursued the other, pointing in the direction of the undulating uplands rolling away to the heights beyond, where the Purple Mountain soared into the deepening twilight, "an' they hear tell of you, Phelim, though I don't know if any of 'em met you lately, for they're great stay-at-homes, but they have all a wish for you, an' I don't think 'twould be hard for ye to put the 'come hether' on any of 'em; so if ye're in earnest, Phelim McCaul, come along with me this blessid minnit, an I'll give you the pick of the three, an' I'll send across for Father Pat O'Hara—he's only a couple of fields away—an' he'll buckle ye in a jiffey, since the time is so short."

Phelim's darkening brow cleared a little; natural cunning was struggling with wounded pride, and that short-sighted longing for swift revenge which impels many a rejected wooer to fling himself away upon the first girl he meets, in order to enjoy the triumph of what is usually but a Pyrrhic victory—pride won.

"I'll go," he cried suddenly, wheeling round, "me father, God rest his soul, often said ye were a dacent man, an' sure the whole parish knows there isn't the dirty dhrop in any of ye!"

"Right you are, me bouchal," responded Mr. Lanigan promptly, "that's the talk, an' before long you'll have a chance of judgin' whether Thady O'Rafferty has all the nice girls in the country. So, just jump up here alongside o' me, an' we'll be over there like winkin'."

Phelim obeyed, and a quick trot along the winding road presently brought them to the group of whitewashed outhouses surrounding Lanigan's cottage, whose lighted windows shone hospitably through a mountain mist.

Here the proprietor begged his prospective son-in-law to wait while he went in and explained matters to the girls.

"They're bashful, poor things, since they lost the mother," he remarked confidentially, "an' maybe they'd be a bit put out if they saw you comin' in on them all of a suddint."

To this arrangement Phelim made no objection, and Mr. Lanigan, hastily passing through the kitchen, went straight to the parlour where, as he expected, he found the three Misses Lanigan placidly engaged in knitting or sewing.

At the entrance of their parent the three young ladies rose to greet him, the eldest, Kitty, a girl with dove-like eyes, limping slightly as she crossed the room.

"Girls alive, don't be flustered," said Lanigan breathlessly. "Cissy, stir up the fire; be quiet, Peg, there's a young man outside lookin' for a wife, he must get married this Shrove, an' he's waitin' at the door."

"Who is he, eroo?" asked Peggy, the youngest.

"Spake aisy; Phelim McCaul," replied her father, with a nod, at once threatening and explanatory. "I'm goin' to give him the pick o' ye, an' 'tis a long time till ye get as good a chance again."

"Sure he's runnin' after Mollie O'Rafferty," interjected Cissy, pausing in her operation of sweeping the ashes under the grate.

"Yes, but that's all broke off now," answered Lanigan; "he's tearin' mad, an' 'ud marry the divil's daughter for satisfaction. Here, don't waste any more time, 'ramashin'' there, but sit down, all of ye, about the table, Kitty here, an' Cissy at that side, an' you, Peg, at this, an' don't ye get up when he comes in, or lave on to be surprised, but be nice an' pleasant to him, for I said ye were all 'gone' after him, be jabers."

And silencing the titter with which the young ladies took their places, he hurried out to Phelim, who, when he was introduced a few minutes later, found the maidens demurely seated in the positions indicated by their fond parent.

There was a decent interval filled by improving conversation, while Bridgie, the handmaid of the establishment, brought in materials for punch, and it was only when the tumblers were half emptied that Mr. Lanigan broached the subject which occupied the thoughts of all.

"Now Phelim McCaul," he said, rising and unconsciously imitating the manner of a gentleman he had once seen auctioneering cattle in Killarney, "these are my three girls, the same I was tellin' ye about. That's the eldest, Kitty, I'll give her five hundred pounds, dry money, and there's the second eldest, Cissy, and she has three hundred pounds to her name, an' here's Peggy, the youngest, an' the man who takes her now will have two hundred. So there you are, me bouchal, an' which of 'em will you choose?"

Mr. McCaul rapidly worked a little sum in mental arithmetic; naturally, he decided on the five hundred pound damsel, then he glanced carelessly at her face.

"I think, ser," he remarked deferentially, "I'll take the eldest young lady, if she'll have me. The other two are very nice indeed, an' it's not the first time I heard of 'em" (he was only dimly conscious of their existence until that evening), "but I think 'tis only proper to give her the refusin' of me."

There was a brief silence, a cinder fell from the glowing mass between the grate bars, Cissy tittered furtively, Peggy leant forward, her elbow upon the table, her dimpled chin crushed in the palm of her hand, watching the episode with the pitiless eyes of eighteen. Kitty sat perfectly still, but her demure mouth was lifted at the corners, and there was a light under her half-closed lids like the gleam of a knife loosened in its sheath.

The disinterested Phelim rose and approached her.

"Will you have me, miss?" he asked gently—perhaps at that exact instant he forgot the five hundred pounds; I hope he did.

Kitty's head sank lower, there came a spot of scarlet on her cheeks.

"Oh yes, indeed," she whispered.

"Begor, that settles it!" cried Lanigan, drawing a quick breath, "she's me own favourite child, the first of the clutch, Phelim, an' I say it without any shame to the others, you've got the pick of the bunch. Sure, I don't know what we'll do at all, at all, without her; but, anyway, I'm glad she's settled, and has a good husband, an' since she was to go, there isn't wan I'd rather have her before your own self. Take her, an' God bless ye, an' may the first boy be a bishop! Cissy, girl, run an' get up the tea, help your sister Peggy avick, while Phelim an' meself settle a little bit o' business here as our heads are cool."

And over-ruling a very faint protest on Mr. McCaul's part, he drew the young man into a corner, where a little old-fashioned cabinet stood, and presently both men were deep in the examination of a bank book, greasy with long use, and also a mysterious ledger which the girls knew to be opened only upon the most momentous occasions.

Meanwhile, a sumptuous meal was hastily prepared, sumptuous according to the ideas of people whose fathers had been obliged to hide their prosperity as other men hide their crimes, and ere long the welcome sound of sizzling bacon and the "pat" of the tossed pancakes dominated the cheerful bustle around the great kitchen fireplace.

The examination of the books concluded, Mr. Lanigan remarked genially, as he pointed to an empty chair at the head of the table on whose snowy cloth the scanty array of household treasures was already glittering:

"I sent over for Father Pat as I was comin' in because 'tis gettin' late in the evenin', so ye can be married comfortably off-hand an' no bother about it; there's a fine room upstairs, an' a bed that's fit for a king, an' they're lightin' the fire there now so the smoke 'll be cleared out when ye're ready, for sweet bad luck to me if either o' ye go out of this house to-night!"

Of course Kitty, who had remained in the parlour, blushingly objected, a mere matter of detail which did not affect the arrangements in the least, while Phelim, who had made up his mind that the bargain was a good one, became properly impatient, so that when Father Pat made his appearance he found an air of undeniable festivity pervading the house, the genial spirit of the hour breathing upon all, from Murteen, the oldest farm labourer, who had got drunk with amazing celerity, to the young lovers themselves as they sat hand in hand under the fostering smiles of Mr. Lanigan while he pelted the amorous swain with appropriate badinage.

The good father, who had been that very evening anticipating a "cold Shrove," was no forbidding figure in this scene of Arcadian felicity, and after some passages of decorous hilarity, the mystic knot was tied, and Phelim McCaul, though he had entered the house only an hour before a bachelor, found himself pledged for life to Catherine Philomena Lanigan.

This important ceremony having been transacted, the home of the Lanigans became a perfect focus of gaiety, a few neighbours and a blind piper, whom very instinct had led to the spot, keeping the impromptu merry-making afoot.

Father Pat, a quaint figure not destitute of a certain pathos and dignity amid this somewhat boisterous jollity, presided in the parlour, and gave "tone" to the rejoicings; now praising Cissy's pancakes, now joking with the young, now gossiping with the old, and later on taking a hand at a quiet game of "forty-five" with Lanigan, the bridegroom, and one Corney O'Loon, a clerical student, a cousin of the family. Finally, it was he who proposed the health of the new wedded pair, in an extempore speech, winding up with a neat little quotation from Martial, which Mr. O'Loon promptly mistranslated, to his own great confusion, but the unmitigated satisfaction of his relations, who secretly believed him to be a far superior scholar to the parish priest, and soon after Father Pat took his departure, going back to his lonely house, the richer by a ten pound note, and a fresh experience in the ways of humanity.

When the priest had gone, dancing commenced in the great kitchen. Mrs. McCaul did not, however, take a part in the proceedings, but quietly retired to her room, while Peggy footed it with the most hopeless detrimental in the parish, to the tune of the "Wind that Shook the Barley."

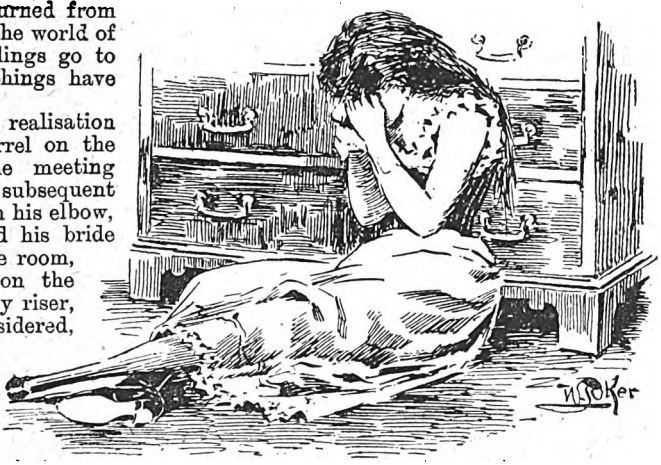
The next morning dawned grey and cold, but acting on a life-long habit, the bride was astir before her snoring spouse had returned from the world of dreams to the world of facts where twenty shillings go to the pound, and most things have their price.



Slowly he awoke to a realisation of his position, the quarrel on the preceeding evening, the meeting with Lanigan and the subsequent events, then leaning upon his elbow, he sleepily contemplated his bride as she pottered about the room, congratulating himself on the fact that she was an early riser, and that, everything considered, he had struck a remarkably good bargain.

After a while, however, his ingenuous brow clouded, a new expression stole into his honest eyes, and presently he gasped:

"Eroo Kitty agra, what's the matter with yer legs, sure 'tis limpin' ye are?"

Kitty suspended toilette operations a moment, taking a twist of hair out of her mouth so that she could reply.

"Yes, indeed, Phelim, dear," she answered placidly, "wan leg is a little biteen shorter than the other, but it's no impidiment, so you needn't be troubled about me at all."

And she limped across the room for a fresh hair-pin.

Phelim swore a bitter oath. Bouncing out of bed, he flung on some clothes, dashed to the door, flung it open, and rushed out upon the landing.

"Jack Lanigan," he shouted, "come here if yer a man!"

A head showed itself just then at the turn of the stairs below, and a moment later Lanigan himself was revealed in the act of ascending.

"Arrah, there ye are, me bhoy," he observed cheerfully, "'tis light an' airy ye are; the top of the mornin' to ye, I was comin' up to know were ye awake, how's herself?"

"See here," roared the deluded bridegroom, "why did ye give me that girl inside with wan leg longer than the other?"

"Sure, didn't you see her," retorted the father-in-law, "an' didn't you chose her from the three of 'em?"

"I know that quite well," rejoined Phelim, his eyes sparkling, "but I didn't know she limped, an' why didn't you tell me?"

"So I would, if you had only axed me," replied the other genially, "but I didn't know 'twas to run races you wanted her!"

That was all. The two men stared at one another the fraction of a second; then Phelim stepped back into the nuptial chamber and closed the door gently.

Then he found the limp consisted of a wooden leg.

TRIAL BY FIRE.

The Major was one of the many well-born Englishmen who went to California with a younger son's portion and a small monthly allowance and hope to make a fortune on a vineyard or a wheat ranch. The plan always looks feasible in England, and the agent assures his victim that the £1 000 will buy a ten-acre plot, plant vines, build a decent bungalow, and tide the owner over until the vines shall bear and bring him in a harvest of good American gold.

The Major was going the way of many of his English friends. The £1,000 legacy was gone, and the monthly allowance of £20 (which, viewed from a distance, seemed large), always grew painfully small as it neared California and the debts it was supposed to cover. The Major's little mountain vineyard had been destroyed by phylloxera, and he was living on the uncertain promise of a number of green shoots, called respectfully "the olive orchard." But the Major was not unhappy. When he was not tilling the soil he sat on a little verandah with his briarwood pipe between his teeth, and studied the long, narrow, picturesque Napa Valley far below.

It may be that the Major's failure to succeed in the grape business was not the fault of the country, but that his genial, unpractical nature was the true obstacle to success. The Major was, in fact, the most helpless Englishman who ever went to California to take care of himself. The poor fellow became so convinced of this after a short trial that he engaged a man to act as valet for himself, and, incidentally, cook the meals of both. The Major was a solitary bachelor then. The gods alone knew in what unpropitious moment he picked up Pete, to hang about his neck a millstone of inefficiency. Pete's poverty must have been his recommendation, and the Major's poverty the excuse for keeping him. Pete had about as much knowledge of laying out and caring for a man's wardrobe as the Major had of running a ranch.

When the Major married Ellie Smith, a pretty San Francisco girl, Pete was promoted to be manager of the ranch, and expended his grooming talents on the pet mule. The Major's wife was "artistic." She had studied sketching, and did some really clever bits. Her admiring husband was sure that she possessed the divine afflatus, and consequently much time was devoted to art and little time to ranching.

But this was not without protest from one individual. Not that he was disturbed by lack of work, but poor Pete was oftener than not the unwilling model for Ellen's clever studies. One day Pete posed for "The Man with the Hoe." His temper was particularly tried on that occasion, for he had taken up his tool with the honest intention of weeding the primitive vegetable garden. Though he had scudded through the back yard and climbed the rear fence, he had not counted on meeting his young mistress in the barn yard. He began to wrestle with the weeds and pretended not to see her. His education, however, had not included a sight of Millet's picture, or he would have fled down the mountain side in utter despair.

"Stop, stop, Pete; right there. Don't move an inch," called the sweet voice that drove him to madness. "Kenneth," Ellie called to her husband, "look. Isn't it wonderful? The lights, the pose, the very landscape like——"

"The Man with the Hoe," shouted the Major gleefully. "I'll get your paints, Ellie. Hold on, Pete," and before the honest son of toil had time to collect his scattered senses he found himself posing in a very uncomfortable attitude, with the Napa Valley lying at his back and the Major's familiar phrases ringing in his ears: "Fine pose—jolly good subject—delicious colouring."

After Pete had posed for a hundred or more indifferent works of art without names, he began to think of deserting his master and leaving him to a just and awful fate. But this stupendous blow was averted by the arrival of Brompton Edwards, another Englishman, who had come to learn practical ranching under the direction of his father's old friend, the Major.

After a week had been given up to driving his protégé about the valley and introducing him to the English colony, the Major returned to his daily routine of pruning olive trees and digging out worm eaten grapevines. Ellie soon discovered in the young man's clean-cut features and fine athletic figure an entirely new field for art study, and Edwards found the time pass more pleasantly as a model than as an embryo rancher. They were together most of the daylight hours.

When Brompton was not posing for a wild Norseman or a Greek hero, he was sitting very close to Ellie, criticising, in soft caressing tones, the sketches of himself which she had been doing. Without actually straying from the path of duty, Ellie was treading on dangerously uncertain territory. She quite frankly admitted to herself that she was pretty and charming, and, being of that mind, she did not repress comparisons between her husband and the younger man.

Matters had arrived at a state where a warm-hearted,

but vain, young woman needed a friend with the strength to hold up a good, powerful, unrelenting mirror for her to gaze into. Pete could have held up the mirror with right good will, but he did not know how. In these days he followed the Major with dog-like devotion, and only glowered when Ellie came out to the orchard one morning with her paints and succeeded in bringing upon herself a scolding from her over-indulgent husband.

She held her head very high and stiff, and marched over the hill some distance away, where she seated herself and pretended to sketch, but was in reality nursing her injured feelings to keep them alive. The Major watched her disappear with a pained expression on his good-natured face, and then went dejectedly into the house. Pete was deeply incensed against Ellie, and made another solemn vow to desert the ranch. It was the ninety-and-ninth time that he had done so, and this time he sealed the vow with an oath.

The long grass on the Napa hills was burnt and crisp, and Ellie was daubing yellow ochre and burnt umber on her canvas with vicious strokes. She was not giving any attention to her work, however, for an athletic form stood between her and the landscape, and she was indulging in a very foolish day-dream. To do the little woman justice, she was not in love with Brompton, but her vanity had been stimulated to such wonderful activity by his youthful gallantries that she fancied he was deeply infatuated with her. She wondered if he would ever tell her that he loved her. If she could only have some test of his love, what a satisfaction it would be!

Over on the mountain side, a half mile away, Pete leant on his horse and watched a thread of fire crawling like a red snake through the undergrush of chaparral and manzanita. He knew only too well that no human power could stop it, and that within a few minutes the gentle breeze would cause a flying spark to fall upon the long dry grass, and puff!—the crawling snake would become a great swirling, galloping mass of flame and smoke, and would pass over the very place where Ellie sat sulking and dreaming. Pete had firmly determined to leave the ranch. He had washed his hands of these people. He would not—but the grass was on fire, and Pete made a dash for the house, yelling at the top of his lungs for the Major.

The volume of smoke was rising high when Ellie rose to her feet and sniffed the air. Before she could gather up her paints, a thin rim of fire ran along the top of the little hill above her. The small birds and insects rose from the ground with a whirr and scattered down the hillside. Ellie glanced quickly backward, and saw the fire licking up the grass as it bore down upon her, and the smoke rolling heavenward in dense, sooty clouds. She did not lose her presence of mind, but remembered a small ploughed field a short distance away, where the flames could not reach her, and ran nimbly down the hill, with her fluttering skirts gathering cockle burs and sticker weed as she sped.

When she was fairly on the ploughed ground and gasping for breath, she saw the young Englishman tearing along the hill at a frantic rate. Through the smoke he looked pale and frightened. Ellie felt a thrill of satisfaction; here was the longed-for proof of his love, he thought she was in danger and had come to her rescue. A deep blush mounted to her cheeks, and her heart beat to suffocation. But he did not seem to see her. It was evident to her that he was crazed with fear and would plunge in to the fire in search of her. Merciful God! he would be burnt.

"Brompton!" she screamed; "dear Brompton, I am here, safe!"

The fire was very close, and she had to throw herself flat upon the ground to escape being burned. She gave one more despairing cry as she felt the hot breath scorch her clothing:

"Brompton! Brompton! Brompton!"

A great wave of smoke and flame swept round the edges of the ploughed ground, and for a minute nothing could be seen or heard. Fortunately for Ellie, the dry grass burnt like tinder, and the fire was soon roaring down the hill towards the valley.

When Ellie, choked and frightened, lifted her head, she saw the thin, long, scantily clad legs of her husband bounding over the blackened earth towards her. His duck trousers were smeared with soot, and he had a wet blanket about his shoulders. He could not speak, but caught Ellie in his arms, and burst into stifled sobs.

Behind them was heard the voice of Brompton Edwards.

"Hello there, Major," he called. "I had a very narrow squeak of it. My hammock and books are burned to tinder by this. By Jove, old fellow, you are burned yourself, aren't you? Your wife was safe enough. I knew she could take care of herself."

But Ellie buried her head in the wet blanket with a shudder and burst into tears of shame and contrition.

"Well, well," gasped Pete, who had stumbled up the hill with a bundle of wet sacks. "I never was so plaguey scared in my life. Thought you'd be burned sure, Miss Ellie. Me an' the Major will have a fine time next week clearing."

For Pete had reconsidered his ninety-and-ninth vow. Indeed, it was only a week later when he was speculating if there was ever a happier couple than the Major and his Ellie. And Pete beamed as he thought of the ignoble part Brompton Edwards played on the day of the fire.

A Real Somersby.

LORD HARRY liked New York. It was his first visit to the great American metropolis, and after the fog of London, the crisp atmosphere and brilliant sunlight of the place affected him delightfully. And then the prevailing spirit of individual independence, which he caught at once, accorded precisely with his mood and charmed him.

Lord Harry had gone to America to be independent. He had tired of the clubs, the theatres, the balls and the boudoirs of London, and had cut loose from them for a good three months, at least. In company only with his valet, he had gone to New York for a new sensation.

He had been a slave to fashion over here. Everybody knew him and everybody courted him. Half the titled maidens in the kingdom wanted to marry him—perhaps he was young and prepossessing, but more likely because he was the possessor of an immense fortune and vast landed estates. To the best of his knowledge he hadn't the slightest sentiment for any one of them, and the prospect of a three months' absence from England was a positive relief.

The valet aforesaid was perfect in his way. He had been a Somersby servant for a number of years and was exceptionally well trained. He seemed very proud of his position and was admirably snobbish. There couldn't possibly have been a more immaculately snobbish servant in all the British realm. His particularly strong points, however, were his distinguished appearance and bearing. His master was quite his opposite in these respects. He of title was free and easy in his way, cordial, and entirely natural. At times it seemed almost as though his careless manner and bonhomie were assumed for a purpose, they were so incompatible with the dignity of his title. In view of the somewhat paradoxical dispositions of the two it is not remarkable that strangers sometimes found it difficult to tell which one was the real lord.

The new sensation which was sought by Lord Harry he was destined to experience without delay. On the second evening of his sojourn in New York he attended an uptown theatre, where the reigning queen of light opera was holding forth nightly to a mighty audience of enthusiastic admirers.

Forthwith Lord Harry fell in love.

That is, the sentiment that beset him was as near love as one of his variegated career was capable of experiencing at first sight. Literally, perhaps, it was not love, but it was a dangerous counterfeit, to say the least.

Of course Lord Somersby's movements in America had been religiously cabled to the London papers from the first. He was open in his attentions to the actress, and thereby furnished a continual fund of gossip. Naturally intelligence of his contemplated marriage reached his attorneys in Lincoln's Inn Fields.

Of course the object of his admiration was the opera queen. His mental conclusion that she was delicious and desirable was quickly formed, after his first scrutiny of her beautiful face.

Miss Marjory Yost was the idol of the hour in the United States metropolis. Born of honest and obscure parents in some remote village, she had found a patron in a casual summer visitor to the place, who had been struck with her beauty and the sweetness of her voice, and had given her the benefit of a thorough musical education. Her professional début was a success, and almost at once she had flashed out into a comic opera star of the first magnitude. Now all the town was at her feet.

She was really a remarkable young woman. To her beauty and her accomplishments she added a vivacity and a charm of manner that were at once fascinating and exhilarating. In her faultless face there was no indication of the worldly wisdom which characterised her conduct of her career. And she was not married. To the best knowledge of the public she was not so much as in love.

Lord Harry kept his seat until the curtain went down in the last act, the finale of which was a picturesque tableau, a crescent brooch of dazzling costumed Amazons set with the rarest jewel the Englishman had ever beheld—Marjory, transcendently fair, as she posed in a flood of calcium light.

"By Jove! I must be introduced," said Lord Harry to himself, as he went out of the theatre. "I wonder how they go about such things in America. I must learn all about this lovely creature, and make a play for her trusting heart."

He was at the theatre the following night, and again the night after that.

He sent the lady rare and costly flowers, and at last a note.

A few days later they were driving together in the Park.

Not so very long after that all the newspapers had the story of Lord Harry's infatuation for the actress. And racy reading it made, for wasn't Lord Harry Somersby one of the best known noblemen in England. Whew! what rich gossip it made for the clubs and boudoirs!

The general opinion was that Miss Yost had caught a veritable brainless prize, and that if she "played him right" she could be Lady Somersby any day she chose.

It was so like a fine British nobleman to throw himself away on a creature of the footlights! British noblemen are notorious for that.

"I suppose I am a scapegrace," said Lord Harry, thinking over the situation with the assistance of a black cigar and a long brandy-and-soda. "It's a shame that I shouldn't fall in love with and marry a maid of high degree. But the fact is, maids of high degree are tiresome. There's a sameness about 'em that's pawsitively exasperating. I'm base enough to like a clever girl, like Marjory, and I'm hanged if I care what people think. Yes, I'm a scapegrace, I suppose, but perhaps I'm not a fool."

Lord Harry later on proved that he was not altogether a fool.

In Marjory's dainty flat, the genial Englishman was quite at home. Marjory off the stage was even prettier and more fetching than Marjory on the stage, and in the warm seclusion of her little home she was like some rare exotic that lures the lips with splendid beauty and intoxicates the senses with sweetest fragrance.

And Marjory was clever; she had fairly eclipsed herself in the manipulation of the strings attached to milord. She had made him welcome in her home, but his privileges were severely proscribed. He was not her lord and master yet. She allowed him to come just near enough to singe his wings without the recompense of a practical victory. She had given him to understand the futility of his dominant aspiration by the telepathy of her eyes, and they had not come to words over the repulse.

"Marjory," he said one night, "you know how much I love you, don't you?"

"No, I can't say that I do," was the arch reply.

"I love you enough to make you my wife, if you'll have it that way," he went on, looking her in the eyes searchingly.

"Nothing would make me happier, milord," she replied demurely.

She was a consummate actress, and here was a situation that called her best powers into play.

"Never mind the 'milord,'" returned Lord Harry, a trifle testily, "I heard enough of that on the other side, and I thought you Americans were too democratic to indulge in it. You seem to like the title; is it the title you are going to marry, or me?"

"Perhaps neither one," she replied, smiling at him, "but if either, you. I'm an American through and through, and I care no more for a title than—that!" and she snapped her taper fingers. Then she put up her arms around his neck and continued: "It is you I love, and if you had not a cent in the world I should love you just the same. You believe me, do you not? You must believe me! I love you more than all the world beside. I should die without you!"

So it was settled that Marjory Yost, the queen of the comic opera, was to become Lady Somersby. The news was too important and too advantageous from the box-office point of view to remain secret long, and presently the newspapers were prattling over it like magpies.

To all of which the devil-may-care lord paid not the slightest attention, further than occasionally to read through a paragraph that amused him.

All of a sudden, in consequence, his lordship was brought up with a round turn. A letter came one morning with the London postmark that had a suspiciously business look. James brought it up with his lordship's breakfast.

"Read it, Jimmy," said his lordship irreverently.

"It's from your attorney's, sir," said James, scanning the missive. "It says they have heard with much interest and surprise of your lordship's matrimonial intentions, and they beg to remind your lordship of a clause in your father's will which declared that if your lordship marries beneath your rank you shall forfeit the £20,000 a year which constitutes your income from all the estates, sir. And they beg to remain your very humble servants."

"The dickens they do," said Lord Harry, for want of something better to say. Then after a silence, he broke out with:

"I'd forgotten all about that cranky business of the governor's—that is, if I ever knew it. I suppose I heard it read with a lot of other legal nonsense when I stepped into my distinguished progenitor's shoes five years ago, but since I have never had the remotest idea of ever getting married until now, it has never come up. Well, this settles it, by Jove! there's not a woman living worth £20,000 a year. The question is how on earth am I to get out of it with Marjory? Poor little girl, she loved me, and will take it pretty hard."

After another silence, about an hour in length, he called James and delivered his ultimatum like a statesman.

"James," he said, "I'll now see Marjory again. Now I've got a scheme I want you to work for me. You're a fine looking man, James, if I do say it myself, a real swell, by Jove! You've helped me out of many a scrape, and I want you to get me out of this little entanglement. Suppose you go up to Marjory's and tell her that I'm not the real Lord Somersby at all, but that you are the real bona fide blue blood, and so forth, and that out of consideration for her you have taken it upon yourself to tell her the truth. Do you see—as they say here in New York?"

"But, sir, why should I say I am the real lord? What reason could I give for the deception upon her and the public?"

"Say that you exchanged places with your valet for the sake of a novel experience. In escaping from London, where you were sick of being run after by Society, and coming to America, where you were utterly unknown, you conceived the idea of humbugging everybody into leaving you to enjoy yourself in peace and allowing your valet to pose as Lord Somersby. Ha, ha! Good story, eh? I tell you it will go! Why, I'll have it put in the newspapers. That sort of thing has been done in America, I know. You see, James, I've got to quit Marjory short off, and this does it without any sort of scene, or trouble, or talk. Twenty thousand pounds a year is at stake! Here's a hundred for you, James. Now the case is yours. I'll see that you are backed up by the newspapers. Do your prettiest, old chap!"

It was hard, of course, to give Marjory up, but evidently it was the only thing to be done. He didn't have the heart to go to her himself and break with her.

Loving him as she did, she would make it hard for him to say good-bye to her for ever. It was better to kill her love for him at a blow by making her believe that she was the victim of a cruel deception. And he would go back to England forthwith, and never see her again.

As for his love for her, and his disappointment, he would try to survive them. But he should always remember her as the one woman of all others he had met that was utterly pure and sincere.

Just how the absurd story that the Englishman who had been known as Lord Somersby's valet, was communicated to the Press, it would be hard to say. But the papers made a sensation of it.

With the first paper that contained it in his pocket, James presented himself at Marjory's well-known apartment.

He was immaculately dressed, and very imposing in appearance. Why, anybody with half an eye should have known instinctively that he was the real Somersby, all the time.

As I remarked before, this valet was perfect in his way.

That he entered fully into the spirit of the duty before him was manifested by his eager manner.

The queen of comic opera was at home.

"Poor little Marjory!" his lordship was saying, as he paced his room.

* * * * *

A few hours later Lord Harry was given a telegram, which read:

MY LORD,—The story was a perfect success. I have yielded to temptation and eloped with the lady.—JAMES.

"Well, I'll be hanged!" was all that Lord Harry could say.

The Mountebank's Love.

She was a remarkable young woman. One rumour was that she was the daughter of a famous statesman, and had gone on the stage to retrieve the fallen fortunes of the family. Another dubbed her a daughter of the slums, who had made her first appearance in an East-end gaff. Still another declared she had been married three times and divorced twice. No one knew the truth. Everybody told a different tale.

And when the summer was done and the autumn season had opened, when critics had praised her marvellous voice and the town had gone wild over her beauty, her acting, and her flawless face, Beatrix, at the summit of her career, with everyone at her feet, every wish and ambition gratified, laughed in the faces of the men making desperate vows to her, drove her manager to drink by her whims and caprices, and yawned with ennui.

"Any life would be better than this," she mused as she stood one day looking out of the window at the slowly falling snow, dropping quietly and sadly down like the tears of a sorrowing woman.

The room in which she stood was a luxurious nest, with its cushions, divans, silken hangings, perfumes and flowers Over a chair hung a mantle of fur fit for a duchess. On the dressing-table glistened the sheen of silver and the polish of ivory. An open fire gave the finishing touch of comfort, and before it was drawn a velvet couch heaped high with cushions from which she had just risen.

But instead of revelling in this delightful sybaritish room, Miss Osmond continued to stare out of the window at the snow drifting down, down into the filth and mud of the streets, where it was speedily trodden out of sight under the heels of the passers-by.

What did Beatrix see through the misty veil of those slow-dropping snowflakes?

Many things.

An old-fashioned garden choked with weeds and brambles; an old red farm house, the doors and windows of which were nailed up, two graves on the hillside on which the snow was falling—falling.

Miss Osmond gave a little start and turned from the window. The rosy firelight danced and beckoned to her, the spacious couch held seductive arms to her; the lilies on the mantel, the orchids on the table laughed and smiled at her. She paid no heed, but went over to her desk and opening a drawer, took out a time-stained envelope and carefully opened it. From it dropped two locks of hair—both grey—one short and bristling, the other, a long curling tress. She stared blindly at them for a moment, and over her pretty, painted cheeks tears slowly dropped, even as the snow was dropping down over those two lonely graves far away on a bleak Yorkshire moor.

* * * * *

Tom Bohannon, mountebank, was Beatrix's most devoted admirer. He chanced to be, for the moment, the favourite jester of the fickle populace. He was so hopelessly ugly, he was fascinating. Popular, too, especially with the gilded youth, who like to be seen in the company of well-known actors. Tom was a man of the world, unquestionably, but in spite of his stormy, reckless existence, down deep in his heart he had kept an ideal or two. From the moment he set eyes on this ravishing woman he loved her, knowing full well that his passion was absolutely hopeless.

Cupid and Tom Bohannon! Preposterous pair.

Strangely enough, however, this disdainful beauty, who spurned men's hearts like footballs, was always gentle to old Tom. His touching devotion—the devotion of a dog—moved her far more than the savage pursuits and the deliberate, skilfully directed sieges of which she was the object. Nothing delighted her more than to thwart the consummate devilry which everywhere encompassed her. The roués of the town were on their metal. All sorts of traps were set for her; all sorts of gilded propositions made her. Beatrix continued to lead her pursuers to the very threshold of love; then coolly locking the door in their faces, mocked at them from the window. But to poor old Bohannon she was always as gentle as a sister.

Tom wanted Trix to leave the stage. "You've got a great start," he was wont to say. "Your voice is superb, and your beauty has carried London by storm, but you are not one of us. You are as proud as a princess. You walk over the necks of the crowd. You must marry. I'd marry you myself, Trix, poor buffoon—mountebank that I am," with mock heroics, "were it not for the fact that I'm wedded to my art."

All this, with a glass of champagne in his hand, a smile on his lips, and an ache in his battered old heart.

One snowy March morning, as Trix sat at the piano running over some new music which had just been sent her, Bohannon was shown in, looking in his flake-strewn fur coat like a big Polar bear.

"Hallo, little girl," he cheerfully called. "Well, you are simply out of sight this morning. Gad! that's a pretty gown. Where did you get the flowers?" plunging his nose into the mass of white heather on the piano.

"I bought it myself," said Trix.

"Never!" cried Tom, "it isn't possible that you have come to that."

"Yes," said the girl, "I bought it because they reminded me of—of my old home. There was a great clump of it under mother's window."

It was the first time Bohannon had heard Trix refer to her past life, and something in her face forbade any questions or jests. But, thinking to direct her thoughts from the sombre channel towards which they appeared to be drifting, he rattled on at a lively pace, retailing the gossip of the Rialto.

"I had a deuce of a shock this morning," he said, "thought I'd struck a ghost, but it was substantial flesh and blood after all. I don't believe you ever knew him. No, he was before your time. But Lord! Lord! how he used to set the town ablaze when he played 'Armand' to Nelly Dorchester's 'Camille.' He's just back from Australia—handsomer than ever—I declare he looks like a prince of the blood royal."

"Who is this phenomenon?" demanded Miss Osmond, turning languidly round on the piano-stool, and idly drumming with one hand on the keys.

"Charlie Singleton," replied Bohannon, helping himself to a sprig of heather for his coat. "Here, Trix, pin this on for me. Did you know him?"

"Charlie Singleton," said Beatrix in a queer voice. "Tom, you must have been mistaken."

"No, child. We walked down the Strand together and had a drink—why, Trix, how your hands tremble. Good Heavens! what is it?"

He caught her in his arms, for he thought she was falling. But in a moment she recovered her self-possession, and went on fastening the sprig of heather in his coat.

"And what do you think he told me? You see Charlie never got on with his wife. That was one reason he went out to Australia. Two months ago his wife died, and he hurried home to look after the child—a sweet, bright little girl."

Miss Osmond's nerves were hammering now, and the blood was rushing to the white face. Tom gabbled on: "It seems he isn't discouraged, though, for he's going to marry again, and never could you guess the girl. It's this soubrette that's coming over to join your company—what's her name? Gwendoline Clarendon—he met her in Sydney——"

"Tom, Tom," a sharp cry of agony broke from the lips of a woman who had flouted so many lovers, "stop, stop, I can't bear it."

"Trix, what is this?"

"I loved him long ago," she said mournfully. "I broke my mother's heart—my father died insane from grief—I was only a girl—an innocent, trusting girl—Tom, he is the man who made me the woman I am, selfish, heartless, soulless."

"You loved him," he said dully, "and he spoke of you this morning. Said he had a great curiosity to see you—had heard so much of your beauty. He's going to appear at the 'Thespian Hand' benefit next week—I suppose he'll speak to you—you'll talk over old times,"—he started up fiercely at her cry of pain.

"No, no," she moaned. "Oh, Tom, dear Tom, you are the only friend I have on earth. I beg you never let him approach me—never let him touch me."

There was a gasp, a sigh, silence.

Like a lily broken from its stalk, the girl huddled in an unconscious little heap at Bohannon's feet.

* * * * *

It was a great bill that was offered that season at the annual benefit performance of the "Thespian Hand Society."

The house was packed, and Miss Osmond, as Thisbe, received an ovation. She went through her rôle as though inspired. Long after the sweet tones of her lovely voice echoed in many a heart. Never had she looked so beautiful. Her cold, statuesque, marble-like loveliness was specially marked.

"She looked like an angel," a ballet girl said afterwards.

Immediately upon the conclusion of the scene from Pryamus and Thisbe, the stage was set for the historic drama in which Singleton was to make his reappearance. The house fairly rose at him, the old idol, who had been away so long. Flowers were tossed him, and jewelled hands saluted him.

Beatrix stood on the wings watching him handsome, graceful, full of divine fire, a little older and greyer than in the old days, but, oh, how dear!

She idly marked his superb costume. It was very pretty. That lace on the sleeve was worth a small fortune. How still the hour. What was that noise? She looked up.

Singleton stood directly under the huge piece of "batting" which came crashing down from the flies. He would surely have been killed had not that slight figure rushed from the wings, pushed him on one side, and then gone, face downwards, under the heavy wooden footpiece of a drop.

A groan ran through the house as the audience half rose. There was a momentary glimpse of a motley crowd rushing from all the wings on the stage; ballet girls in flimsy skirts; minstrels pale through their burnt cork; the great actress herself wringing her hands and pouring forth French hysterics and profanity.

Then the curtain fell. The orchestra struck up a popular topical song, but ceased after a bar or two when Dick Adams, the stage manager, came before the curtain and said in a dazed sort of way that, owing to the deplorable accident which had just occurred, the performance would be concluded at once.

Behind the scenes all was confusion and chaos. The physician summoned from the audience held a limp, little white hand in his a moment, slowly shook his head and said gravely to the terror-stricken group about:

"It's all over."

There in a tangled mass of soft white draperies, whose snowy surface was stained with blood, lay Beatrix dead. Across her sweet breast was a spray of crushed white heather, whose fragrance stole softly upward. At her side, his hands clenched, his face ghastly with horror, stood the man for whom she had given her young life. He knew that young face reproaching him with piteous, sightless eyes—with a groan he stooped to lift her to his heart.

But a man with a face as livid as his own and blazing eyes, thrust him back.

"Do not dare to touch her," he said, "she asked me once never to let you touch her and—I shall keep my promise to the dead."

There is another grave in the little lonely Yorkshire burying ground behind the desolate farmhouse and the old-fashioned garden full of weeds. At its head every spring blooms the white heather, and over it falls the snow as quietly as the tears fall down a woman's cheeks.

And the only visitor this lonely grave has is an ugly-faced buffoon—a fellow of infinite jest, whose quips and gambols are wont to set the table in a roar.

THE FUTURE DUCHESS.

"Mrs. Chester!"

As the door of Phyllis's boudoir opened, and this name was announced, she sprang from her low chair, and turned paler in the gathering gloom.

"How do you do?" advancing somewhat nervously. "Turn up the lights," addressing the servant.

The visitor winced at the sudden electric glare, and shaded her eyes. She was an elderly lady, dressed in deep mourning. Phyllis wore a widow's gown, exquisitely fitting, and highly becoming to her beautiful features.

"I have heard the news," said Mrs. Chester, a hard ring in her voice.

Phyllis drew a chair forward for her mother-in-law.

"I had hoped it would not leak out," she replied.

"I should have thought you were sensible enough to know that was an impossibility. When a widow, whose husband is barely cold in the ground, becomes engaged to a Duke old enough to be her grandfather, and foolish enough to betray her secret, when out of sheer decency——"

"Spare me your opinion—and that of the world," said the future Duchess, drawing herself up proudly, though a mist of tears dimmed her eyes. "I know what it must be already."

"And when will the wedding take place?" asked her mother-in-law bitterly.

Phyllis started.

"Not yet," she said, passing her hand over her brow.

"I suppose you intend waiting the conventional year, though it hardly seems necessary. At the present moment you are living on the Duke's bounty, since my poor boy left you penniless. In the face of this, the sooner you marry the better—Society will forgive much to a duchess."

"Do not speak so harshly," replied Phyllis, looking steadfastly at Mrs. Chester. "I have suffered greatly, and the duke is good and kind—an honourable man. You think I have forgotten George—that I am insulting his memory, but you don't know—you don't understand!"

"Oh, yes," retorted Mrs. Chester, "the old story—the lust of gold—take fortune at the flood—I can imagine the thousand excuses behind which you shield yourself." As she spoke her voice shook suddenly, and the tears coursed freely down her cheeks.

A struggle passed in Phyllis's mind, as she gazed with infinite compassion on the stricken mother.

But she forced back her own emotion, combated the temptation to speak the truth, and took Mrs. Chester's hand in silence as she rose to go.

"Good-bye, Phyllis—in the future we may not meet, but I shall try to think of you only as George's wife."

"Thank you," she answered softly, re-echoing with a sigh: "as George's wife!"

When Phyllis was again alone, she paced the room restlessly.

"I dared not speak," she murmured, "it would be too dangerous!"

Another ring at the bell—footsteps in the hall.

Phyllis advanced smilingly to greet Lady Almina.

"My brother begged me to fetch you," she said. "The carriage is waiting: will you come?"

Phyllis hesitated.

It was just one of those glorious summer evenings that George had loved.

"The garden is very tempting," continued Lady Almina; "I envy Adrian his London trees. I am nearly roasted in Grosvenor Gate."

"I'll come," declared young Mrs. Chester.

A few moments later they were driving to the Duke's house.

"You did not tell me Adrian had friends with him," said Phyllis, as a group of men on the lawn caught her eye.

"Only a few 'casuals' who have dropped in since I left."

"How pale Adrian looks!" murmured his fiancée.

"Yes, he suffers terribly; his health is a perfect scourge."

"Ah! Phyllis," he exclaimed, hobbling forward with the aid of a stick, "as fresh and charming as ever!"

His companions scanned the future Duchess critically. She was divinely fair—too fair to sell herself for wealth and position. One man advanced, and held out his hand to Mrs. Chester. At sight of him her lips blanched, a sudden indefinable terror crept into her eyes

"You have not forgotten me," he said slowly.

'No," she replied, with a forced smile.

"I only returned from America yesterday," he vouchsafed.

"You have met Mr. Vincent before?" cried the Duke.

"Oh! yes," answered Phyllis, then in a lowered tone, "he was a friend of my husband."

"James is bringing my bath chair," said the old man, "and I am going round the grounds. Don't trouble to come, Phyllis, you look tired. These gentlemen wish to make a tour of inspection."

"I will stay with Mrs. Chester," said Mr. Vincent. "It will be pleasant to talk over old times."

Phyllis shuddered. As they moved away, she faced John Vincent defiantly.

He was the first to speak.

"What does this all mean?"

Scorn and contempt rang out in his tone.

Phyllis bit her lip.

"I can explain, but for mercy's sake don't betray me! you know how I have suffered—the secret of my life is in your hands—I despise and hate myself—what I am doing is loathsome and repugnant to my whole nature—but the sacrifice is for George!"

"For him! Good gracious, Mrs. Chester, I did not expect to hear you joke at such a moment."

"You don't believe me?"

"How can I, when I find you here, the affianced wife of my host, knowing as I do that your husband still lives."

"Be careful what you say!" glancing round anxiously, "and I will explain everything."

He smiled sarcastically.

"Go on, I am most interested."

His tone of superiority aroused Mrs. Chester's ire.

"It was through you," she began, in a low vibrating voice, "that my husband first got into trouble. He was easily led, and your bad influence took hold of him; you dragged him down to your own wretched level! George and John Vincent were in the mire together, only he sank and you swam. Where would you have been now if your uncle, Lord Ivison, had not died opportunely and left you a fortune? He, poor fellow, had no such good luck to help him out of overwhelming difficulties, and so he is still in hiding, while the world believes him dead. I dare not go to him, but soon he will return to me."

"How so?"

"Listen. The Duke, as you know, is fabulously rich; he gives me everything I desire—money, jewels. Bah! it sickens me to talk of it."

"Yes, yes."

"Don't you follow me? Can't you see that in this way I am saving my husband? Adrian's money will restore him to life and freedom!"

"But the price?" whispered John Vincent.

She turned to him with flashing eyes, no trace of shame was there, only the martyred love that memory kept green.

"I am paying it now, in this miserable living lie."

"How long is it to last?"

"Only a short while. George," with a vivid blush, "knows what I am doing, and before the wedding day he will return unexpectedly from the dead. We have invented a story that may be believed, but it matters little then one way or the other."

There was a strange expression in her listener's eyes; he spoke banteringly.

"Oh! George's reported death can be easily explained; they had a detailed account of mine in the paper last week after a carriage accident. Say he has been dangerously ill for months in the wilds of America; work it out like a plot in a novel."

He laughed harshly, and the sound was strangely horrible to Phyllis Chester.

"So you comprehend at last?" she said.

"Yes, only too well! But you hardly seem to realise how you are degrading your womanhood."

"People take different views of right and wrong. If it is sin, think what I am doing? By this means I can release my husband from that which is worse than death."

"By practically robbing the Duke. Ah! you ignore, Mrs. Chester, the injury wrought on your miserable decoy. I am his friend, and therefore in duty bound to defend him."

She started visibly.

"You will never betray me, after I have worked and striven; you could not be so cruel."

He rose, and towered above her, with set lips and glittering eyes. "Have you forgotten the past—Phyllis—the old score?"

"No, you loved me once, in the name of that love I implore you——"

"Enough!" He held up his hand warningly. "For seven long years have I smarted under the sting of that old wound. You betrayed my confidence then, forsook me for my friend, worked as you are working now, to harm me for his sake. You never grumbled at my gambling, so long as I won money enough to pay your lover's debts. When that failed, you cast me aside like a broken toy. It was then I grew to hate where I had loved. These things are not allowed to happen twice in a lifetime. I do not intend to stand quietly by and see another man outraged as I was."

Her face was set and motionless, she tried to speak, but her voice died in a strangled sob, approaching voices warned her to keep calm.

Her enemy gazed remorselessly into her frightened eyes. The game was up, she shivered, as if with sudden deadly cold.

* * * * *

The Duke fell dangerously ill. John Vincent did not know that he had suffered before from a paralytic stroke, when he dealt him the blow that brought on another. For weeks he lay helpless, unable to raise a hand, or speak, while Phyllis watched by his bed-side night and day in an agony of remorse and self-accusation.

Sometimes he gazed at her with such a depth of misery in his eyes, that she would break down and sob at his side, till his pitiful expression forced her to control her emotion.

One day he rallied, his senses returned to him, clear as before the fatal malady.

"Phyllis," he said, a wan smile flickering over his tired face, "come nearer, give me your hand—I want to speak to you."

"Adrian, I am listening."

"I made a will in your favour," he murmured, "I shall not change it. I am dying, Phyllis, with the stain of this money on my soul—the wealth that might have done so much good. I want you and your—your husband, to start life afresh, and try to compensate for my failure. Let me kiss you—once."

The woman bent down and laid her burning cheek upon his frozen lips.

LEGENDS OF WOLFVILLE.

BY "DAN QUINN."

Wolfville is a Cattleman's Settlement in Arizona, and the Characters in these Legends are Cowboys.

No. 12.—Taught by Texas.

"MIGHTY likely it's a week after Rainbow Sam dies off," said the old cattleman, in a tone of confidence, "when the camp turns in an' has a little jest with the Signal Service sharp. You see, we're that depressed about Rainbow cashin' in we needs relaxation that way, so we all nacheral enough diverts ourse'fs with this signal party who comes trailin' up all handy.

"Wherefore I ag'in remarks that Wolfville is a proper peaceful place, an' its little joke with the Signal Service party needn't be inferred against none as its daily programme.

"This yere gent has been goin' about casool ever since the stage comes in, an' his air is soopercilious like he looks down on the entire camp; an' it's all a heap irritatin'. He's been pesterin' an projectin' about the post-office for mighty like an hour when all at once he crosses over to the 'Red Light' an' fronts up to the bar. He don't invite none of us to likker; jest himself, which bad manners is shore received invidious.

"'Gimme a cocktail,' says this Signal sharp to the barkeep.

"As they ain't mixin' no drinks at the 'Red Light,' for man or beast, nor yet at 'Hamilton's Hurdy Gurdy,' you can begin to suspect that this sport in the blue uniform don't get no cocktail.

"'Can't mix no drinks,' says the barkeep.

"'Can't mix no cocktails?' repeats the Signal Sharp. 'Why, what a band of prairie dogs this yere hamlet is! What's the matter with you all, you can't mix no cocktails? Don't you know enough?'

"'Do we all know enough?' says the barkeep some facetious that way. 'Stranger, we simply bulges an' suffers with what we knows. But that's a law agin cocktails and all mixin' drinks. You see, a Mexican female over in Tucson is mixin' drinks for a gent she's a-harborin' idees agin, an' she rings in the loco on to him, an' he goes plumb crazy. Then the Legislature ups an' makes a law abatin' of mixed drinks. This yere bein' Gospel trooth, you'll have to drink straight whisky, and drink it outen a tin cup, too.'

"As he says this for a balzer, the barkeep, which it was Sandy McAuliffe, sets up a bottle and a tin cup, an' slams a six-shooter on the bar at the same time. Whereupon the Signal Sharp takes a gulp or two of straight nose paint an' don't say nothin' more of cocktails. But he looks skeered an' ugly.

"'Whatever is the damage, anyhow?' he says to Sandy, as soon as he quits gaggin' over the whisky, which tastes some raw an' vicious to him, an' him with his ladylike throat all ready for cocktails instead; 'what's thar to pay?'

"'Nary cent,' says Sandy, moppin' up the bar plenty complacent, 'not a sou, markee. That drink's on the house, stranger.'

"When the Signal sharp goes out, Enright says he's got mighty pore manners, an' he marvels he's still walkin' the earth.

"'However,' says Enright, 'I s'pose his livin' so long arises mainly from stayin' in the East, where they don't make no p'int on ettyquette an' bein' polite, an' runs things looser.'

"'Whatever's the matter of chasin' this insultin' tenderfoot around a lot?' asks Texas Thompson, an' havin' fun with him. 'Thar ain't nothin' doin', an' we oughter not begretch half-day's work educatin' this party. If something ain't done forthwith to inform his mind on the subjects of his social dooties while he stays in Arizona, you can gamble he won't last to go East no more.'

"As what Texas Thompson says is correct, it ain't no time before there is a general desire to enlighten this yere Signal party. As Thompson suggests the idee nacherally he goes for'ard to begin its execution.

"'But be keerful, Texas,' says Enright, 'an' don't force no showdown with this Signal gent. Attainin' an education is one thing, an' bein' killed that way is plumb different; an' while I sees no objections to swellin' the general fund of this young man's knowledge, I don't propose that you all's goin' to confer no dieploma an' graduate him into heaven on high with a gun at one an' the same time.'

"'None whatever,' says Texas Thompson. 'We merely toys with this tenderfoot, an' never so much as breaks his crust or drors blood the slightest morsel. He's taking life too trivial; an' all what we all p'ints out to do is to sober him up an' teach him decorousness some.'

"So Texas Thompson goes sa'nterin' up the street so as to cross the trail of this Signal party, who's headed down. Jest as they passes Texas turns as ferocious as forty timber wolves, an' clasps his hand on the shoulder of the Signal party.

"'How's this yere, I demands to know?' says Texas, shakin' back his long hair. An' he shorely looks bad and hardened.

"'How's that?' says the Signal man, some astonished.

"'You saveys mighty well,' says Texas. 'You fails to bow to me, aimin' to insult an' put it all over me in the presence of this yere multitood. Think of it, gents,' goes on Texas, beginnin' to froth an' a raisin' his voice to a whoop, 'think of it, an' me the war chief of the Texas Panhandle with forty-two skelps to my credit, to be sot on an' insulted by a puny shorthorn like this. It shore makes me wonder be I alive.'

"'Stranger,' says Texas, turnin' to the Signal party an' his hand on his gun, 'nothin' but blood is goin' to do me now. If I was troo to myse'f at this minute I'd shorely split you like a mackerel, an' leave you on both sides of the road. But I restrains myse'f this far; I don't notice no gun on you. Go, tharfore, an' heel yourse'f; for by next drink time the avenger 'll be ha'ntin' your trail. I gives you half-an-hour to live. Not on your account, 'cause it ain't comin' to you; but merely not to ketch no angels off their guard, an' to allow 'em a chance to organise for your protection. Pendin' hostilities I shall rest myself in the "Red Light," permittin' you the advantages of the dance hall, where Hamilton 'll give you pen, ink, and monte table, whereby to concoct your last will. Adios.'

"By the time Texas gets off this long, big talk, an' starts over to the 'Red Light,' the Signal man is lookin' a heap perturbed. He's shorely alarmed.

"'See yere, Amigo,' says Dan Boggs, breakin' loose all at once, as Texas p'ints out for the 'Red Light,' 'you're a plumb stranger to me, but I takes a chance and stands your friend. Now, here's what you do. You frame yourse'f up with a Colt's 44, an' lay for this Texas Thompson. He's a rustler, an' a hoss thief, an' a murderer, who, as he says, has downed forty-two men, not countin' Mexicans an' Mavericks. He oughter be massacred; an' now as it's come your way prance in an' spill his blood. This camp'll jestify an' applaud the play.'

"'But I can't fight none,' says the Signal man. 'It's agin' the rools an' regulations of the army.'

"'Which I shore can't see none now you're goin' to renig,' says Dave Tutt. 'This felon Texas is due to shoot you on sight. Them army rools shorely ought as permit a gent to scout off to one side the strict trail a little when it's come down to savin' his own skelp.'

"One way an' another Tutt an' Boggs makes clear to black paint to the Signal sharp that thar's only two cards in the box; either he downs Texas Thompson or Texas gets him. The Signal party says it is what he calls a dread alternative.

"The Signal party says he's thankful he's found friends in Boggs an' Tutt, an' tharupon they all lines out for the dance hall, where they gets drinks, an' the Single man, who's some pallid, puts it up he'll write some letters an' some other papers, an' sorter straighten up his game. Boggs observes this is a good move, an' that Tutt an' he'll take an occasional drink an' ride her herd on his interests while he does.

"Tutt and Boggs has got their brands on mebby two drinks, when over comes Doc. Peets plenty severe an' says:

"'Who all represents for this gent who's out for the blood of my friend Texas Thompson?'

"'Talk to me an' Tutt,' says Boggs, 'an' cut her short; 'cause it's the opinion of our gent this criminal Thompson infests the earth to a p'int where it's a case of over-play an' he's longin' to begin his butchery.'

"'In five minutes, then,' says Peets, 'you all organise your gent an' come a-runnin', I must canter over to see how Thompson's linin' up. He's that fretful a minute back when I leaves him he's bitin' hunks outen a white-ash card table like it's ginger cake, an' moanin' for blood. Old Monte's ridin' herd on him; but I better get back, as he might in his frenzy that away fetch loose any moment, an' come a-curvin' over yere an' go to killin' your gent without orders; which the same would be onelegant an' no delicacy to it.'

"As soon as Peets is started for the 'Red Light' agin, Tutt turns to the Signal party, who's settin' there lookin' he'pless an' worried like he's a prairie dog who's come back from visitin' some other dog, an' finds a rattlesnake's done pitched camp in the mouth of his hole while he's out.

"'Now then, stranger,' says Tutt, 'if you all has accomplished that clerical work me an' Dan 'll lead you to your victim. When you gets to shootin' aim low an' be shore an' see your hind sight every time you cuts loose.'

"The Signal party looks some grey an' haggard, but not seein' no other way gets up, an' after stampedin' about a trifle nervous, allows, since it's the best he can do, he's ready.

"Old Monte has spread a blanket over in front of the 'Red Light,' an' as Tutt an' Boggs starts out with their Signal party thar's a yell like forty Apaches heard across the street.

"'That's Thompson's war yelp,' says Boggs, expoundin' of the noise to the Signal party. 'Which it would seem from the fervor he puts into it he's shorely all keyed up.'

"As Doc. Peets comes out a-leadin' of Thompson it's noticed Thompson's got a tin cup.

"'Whatever's your gent a-packin' of that utensil for?' demands Tutt, mighty truculent. 'Is this yere to be a combat with dippers?'

"'Oh, no,' says Peet, like he's tryin' to excuse something, 'but he insists on fetchin' it so hard that at last to soothe him I gives my consent.'

"'Well, we challenges the dipper?' says Tutt. 'You all will fight on the square or we remove our man.'

"'Don't, don't,' shouts Thompson, like he's agitated no limit; 'don't take him outen my sight no more. I only fetches the cup to drink his blood with; but it's nothin' but a small detail which I relinquishes readily before ever I allows my victim the least loophole of escape.'

"When Peets goes up an' takes Thompson's cup the two debates together in whisper. 'Thompson's gettin' mighty hot an' furious,' at last Peets says to him, 'which I tells you such a proposal is irregular an plumb to one side of the trail. But since you insists, of course, I names it. My gent yere,' goes on Peets to Boggs an' Tutt, 'wants to agree that the survivor's to be allowed to skelp the deceased. Does the bluff go?'

"'It's what our gent's been urgin' from the jump,' says Boggs, 'an' therefore we consents with glee. Round up you man now an' let's get to shootin'.'

"I don't reckon I ever sees anybody who seems as fatigued as the Signal sharp when Boggs an' Tutt starts to lead him up to the blanket. Thar's a expression in his face like he don't think it's a game worth comin' to Arizona to set in to. While they're standin' up their folks Texas Thompson breaks loose ag'in, because it's a fight over a blanket an' not a handkerchief, as he calls for.

"'What's the meanin' of a cold an' formal racket sech as this?' he howls, turnin' on Peets. 'I want to go close to my meat, I tells you, where it is warm.'

"But they don't proceed none. As Tutt turns to his Signal sharp, who's all but locoed by the shoutin' an' has to be detained by Boggs from runnin' away, Jack Moore comes chargin' up on his pony, an' throws a gun on the whole outfit.

Digitized by Google

"'Hands up, yere!' he says, sharp an' brief, 'or I fixes the coyotes for meat for a month to come.'

"Everybody's hands goes up, an' it's plain Moore's comin' ain't no disapp'intment to the Signal person. He's that relieved, he shows it.

"'Don't look so tickled,' growls Boggs to him, as Moore heads the round-up for the store. 'Don't look so light an' gay about it; you mortifies me to death.'

"Moore takes the gang over to the store, where Enright's settin' as a jedge. He allows he's goin' to put 'em all on trial for disturbin' of Wolfville's peace. The Signal sharp starts to say something when Peets interrupts, an' that brings Boggs to the front, an' after that a general uproar breaks loose like a stampede.

"'Gimme a knife, somebody,' howls Texas Thompson, 'an' let me get in on this play. Am I to be robbed of my prey like this?'

"But Enright jumps for an old Spencer seven-shooter, an' gives it out cold that he's goin' to down the first gent that opens his mouth or talks back to him a second time. This ca'ms 'em, an' the riot sorter simmers.

"'Not that I objects to a street fight,' says Enright, discussin' of the case, 'but you all talks too much. From the jabber that was going on over that blanket out thar, it shorely reminds me a mighty sight more of a passel of old women at a quiltin' bee, than an outfit of serious gents who's pullin' off a docel. To cut her short, the public don't foster no sech rackets as this, an' I yereupon puts Texas Thompson an' his Signal party under 50,000 dol. bonds to keep the peace.'

"Texas Thompson is set loose with Peets an' Cherokee Hall on his papers, but the Signal sharp, bein' a stranger in town can't put up no bonds.

"'Which, as thar's no calaboose in camp to put you into,' says Enright, when he's told by the Signal party he can't make no bonds, 'an' as it's plumb against the Arizona constitootion to let you go, I shore sees no trail out but to hang you; I regrets the necessity which leads a poor tenderfoot like you all to the halter, but you see yourse'f the Union must and shall be preserved. Mr. Moore, go over to my pony an' fetch the rope. It's a new half inch manilla, but I cheerfully donates it to jestice jest the same.'

"When Moore gets back with the rope an' everybody's lookin' plumb serious that away, it shakes the Signal party to a degree he has to camp down on a shoebox an' allows he needs a drink. Boggs says he'll go after it, when Tutt breaks in an' says he's got a bluff to hand up; which that done, the same bein' agreeable he at once makes good.

"'If I was dead certain,' says Tutt, surveyin' of the Signal party a heap doubtful, 'if I was shore how this gent wouldn't leave the reservation none, I'd go his bond myse'f. But I'm in no sech fix financial as makes it right for me to get put in the hole for $50,000 by no stranger, however intimate we has been. But yere's what I'm willing to see go. If this Signal sharp wears hobbles (chain with cannon balls attached) so he can't up an' canter off none, rather than see a young gent's neck made a foot longer, why, I goes this bail myse'f.'

"The Signal party is eager for hobbles, an' he gives Tutt his word to sign up the documents, an' he won't run away a little bit.

"'Which the game bein' now settled all congenial an' legal,' says Enright, when Tutt signs up, 'Moore'll he'p the gent on with his hobbles, an' the court will stand adjourned till further orders.'

"After he's all hobbled an' safe, Tutt an' the Signal party starts over for the post-office, both progressin' some slow an' reluctant, because of the Signal party's hobbles holdin' him down to a shuffle. As they toils along, Tutt says:

"'An' now that this affair ends so successful I'd shore admire to know what you and that cutthroat Thompson takes to chewin' of each other's manes for anyway. Why did you refuse to bow?'

"'Which I never refooses once,' says the Signal party. 'I saloots the gent with pleasure, if that's what he needs.'

"'In that case,' says Tutt, 'you make yourself comfortable leanin' agin this buildin', an' I'll project over to Thompson an' see if this imbroglio can't be reconciled a lot. Mutual 'pologies an' whisky looks like it ought to repair these dissensions easy.'

"So the Signal party leans up agin' the front of the post-office and surveys his hobbles some melancholy, while Tutt goes surgin' over to the 'Red Light,' to look up Texas Thompson. It ain't no time when he's headed back with Thompson an' the balance of the band.

"'Give us your hand, pard,' says Texas Thompson, as he comes up to the Signal party. 'I learns from our common friend, Dave Tutt, that this yere's a mistake, an' I tharfore forgives you freely all the trouble you causes. It's over now, an' plumb forgot. You're a dead game sport, an' I shakes your hand with pride.'

"However, we rips off his hobbles, an' then the outfit steers over to the 'Red Light,' to be refreshened an' regaled after all the hard work."

A MAN and a woman. A pathway white with the red as those roses sleeping within reach of her fingers, the shadows hid her white gowned figure, and she was bereaved.

The man gazed rapturously on the beauty of her face. But the fire of love burnt still in his soul, and at last speak, but his voice was choked by emotion. This was the woman's husband.

Lovers. Oh, yes—or why was her cheek stained yellow in her hands. She was beautiful in death as in crumpling her lover's letter with suppressed passion.

"I shall remember," she whispered, "always! You have been all the world to each other—you and I.'

"I have gone where no one will discover me. Justice and I have been more than all the world to each other, more.

The woman untangled her fingers, and passed them to Er gland, to lose my soul in yours. I return to-morrow, a shudder.

Yet, good or evil, he loved her; and the fragrance milky pallor of the moon. Shadows lurking on every falsehood and treachery. Let them love there, if they embrace.

"If you love me, why in the name of——"

The woman raised her eyes, her lips, and the anguish over her brow.

She had found what she sought, rest and repentance! which were locked in the man's palm? He tried to addressed to his dead wife in her maiden name. He had side, emblematical of their two lives.

Between his trembling fingers he held a letter, of parting was forgotten in the ecstasy of a long life.

The grass was wet with dew, and there were drops of the crime, written by the slayer's hand, telling them How pure it looked in the pale light! What a mask has been done, that is enough——"

"You have come for my wife," he said slowly, "she it is inevitable. I have two things to seek, Heaven only gave and denied. Remember your own words: 'We knows if I shall find them."

One word broke hoarsely from her lips: "No!"

These three words were repeated in lingering accents, lost in mystery.

"And age spells death," murmured the woman with agony upon her forehead.

"What?" he questioned.

But she clasped her hands, intreating silence.

"Why must you go?" he asked fiercely, "you have beauty horrible in his eyes. Vengeance was turning his feet."

"Ask for no explanations. Would I had never come to the earth.

The lover staggered back, and fell heavily with a groan and one hand stretched across his face hiding the wife."

As she spoke she broke away, rushed wildly on, till he wrote to the woman who had said, "No."

"Stay," he answered passionately, "life is only an address in New York City.

"I must follow you" (he penned the lines feverishly) where to find the murdered man.

* * * * *

Two men stood face to face. A lover and a husband.

A woman was lying dead, with roses white and what a mockery!

Beside her still image sat her husband, his head bent, that faltered and ended in a sigh.

That morning's mail made the cold form of marble shrivel up, and we shall be old."

Only a cloud of smoke rose between his body and you and I!"

The following day she sailed, and the man saw her no sinewy hand seemed bursting through the flesh, while the seas will bring me, I will come to kneel at your good-bye.

"He shall follow her to her home," he muttered, his parted lips were dry and bloodless.

He only treasured a few parched rose leaves, and her soul to gall, mingled with the awful jealousy of the can."

"Rest and repentance!"

* * * * *

No horror crept through the murderer's veins.

Two days later the police received a detailed account of his wrongs.

"They are together now," he said, "in the land of woman's home before she marries? Stay, and be my awful expression thereon. But the veins on that hour; take all that it can give while love is in your soul. Cable me the single syllable, 'Come,' and as fast as To-morrow the summer may be over, the flowers will only just opened it.

One with hope in his heart, the other maddened by no tie in New York! Your home? Bah! What is a the woman had deceived were buried in oblivion.

"You need not seek for me," he wrote in conclusion. of the summer night was creeping into his very being; everything spoke of hitherto undreamed is not here, but you shall go to her."

Here the writing ceased abruptly, and the two men "to your home, dearest, and plead again for the love you possibilities.

Then he wrote the cable: "Come!"

In - Beauty's - Guise.

For a moment he stared in dazed wonder at a pair of fat cherubs pictured on the canopy stretched between the four tall posts of the old-fashioned bedstead on which he lay. The room was in semi-gloom, but the cherubs stood out in bold relief from their white background. Then he looked about him and endeavoured to collect his thoughts.

Eagerly he groped back after straws that would direct his puzzled memory, and presently, his eyes becoming more and more used to this dim half-light, he caught sight of a red coat, torn and muddy, lying across the back of a great armchair near the door. With this there suddenly came to him a vivid recollection of a scene; far off, it seemed in the years long gone, but sharp, clear, and well-defined.

A rough stubble-field, over which a score of horses, each mounted by an enthusiastic huntsman, are madly flying at the top of their speed. Himself in the front, he hears the others following him closely, while just ahead there is the chorus of the hounds in full cry, and the fox itself may be seen darting across the open, not fifty yards in advance of the foremost of its pursuers.

One hedge more to take and the hunt will be over. The brush will be his. It is but an instant, and he feels the horse beneath him leave the ground.

Up, up, he is going as though he never meant to stop, and then—a sudden breath-taking plunge forward. Even as he braces himself for the shock, in less than a heart-beat, he knows that the animal has stumbled; that the horse and he are falling together, and he instinctively struggles to free himself from the stirrups.

Then darkness, black as Egypt, and after that—the fat cherubs on the canopy of his bedstead.

The torn, mud-spattered red coat on yonder chair told him that he had been brought to this room directly from the field, and with this link forged he began to run along the chain and to try to read the story of others.

He wondered as to the time that had elapsed since the accident; whether his injuries were serious; to whose house he had been carried; under whose care he had been placed. He made an effort to raise his head to look about him, but as he did so, a sharp pain, excruciating and cruel, shot through every nerve of his being, and he cried out in the fierce agony of the moment.

Then he became conscious that a woman had risen from a place close by his bedside, and was standing, looking down at him, with great, dark lustrous eyes, in the depths of which he descried an unspoken passion. Tall, slender, and with a dignity that was regal, she seemed to him the quintessence of feminine grace and queenly beauty.

Her face was pale as marble and stern as Fate; but in her wondrous eyes was a longing that wooed him; that brought his breath in quick, convulsive gasps; that made his heart beat faster, and that spread over the pallor of his cheeks a flush that burnt like fever. He stretched forth his hand and clasped her long, taper fingers and held them, cool as stone, in his feverish grasp.

When, some time after, the doctor came in to rearrange the bandages on his injured head, and found him with his eyes open, gazing, a pleased smile on his lips, and his fingers nervously reaching out for the hand which had suddenly eluded him, the professional man looked grave, and a tear trembled for a moment on his lashes.

"Doctor," the patient pleaded, in a voice so weak as to be scarcely heard even in the stillness of this darkened room, "tell me her name. She is my nurse, is she not? She will not leave me. Not for a moment, doctor. Don't let her go from me."

The doctor, in kindly tone, humoured him as best he could.

"She will be with you always," he said, and then his face grew still more grave, and other tears followed the first, rolling down his furrowed cheeks, and dropping on the counterpane.

When at last the doctor withdrew into the curtained embrasure of one of the windows to await the end, which now appeared to him inevitable, she returned and knelt by the sufferer's bedside, listening eagerly to the murmured love passages which he addressed to her, to snatches of amorous verse and quotations from the prose and sentimentalists of all times and all climes.

"Tell me your name," he urged, as he pressed his lips to her chilled hand and stroked her long, shining black tresses; "tell me that I may rhyme it with tender words of true love and deepest devotion."

She smiled as she denied him.

"No, no," she said, "do not ask me. It is because you do not know me that you care for me."

But her refusal made him all the more eager. His voice had become still weaker, but in disjointed sentences he continued his pleading. His hands were reaching now nervously towards her face, which he longed to caress.

"Come closer," he whispered, "closer—and tell me—your name—and that you love me."

She moved nearer to him, the passion in her eyes blazing, her thin cold lips parted. About his racked and bruised body she stretched her long white arms, enfolding him in her strong embrace. Her mouth was close to his.

"I love you," she said, and the words sounded to him like sweetest music.

"I love you," she repeated, and her lips were on his.

His frame quivered under the fury of her caress. His breast expanded with a long, deep-drawn breath; in his eyes was the staring frenzy of mad desire.

"And my name," she went on, as she clasped him still more closely in her long, ravenous arms, "and my name is——"

The doctor finished the sentence. The deep-drawn breath had reached his listening ears. He had risen from his place in the curtained embrasure and had approached the bed.

"Death!" he said.

CHAPTER XXI.

Concerning Mr. Beaumont.

"I have found out something this time!" cried Harold, as Mr. Daunt rose to greet him.

The lawyer looked grave when he heard what the young man had to tell. "I can't say I think your news is favourable," he observed. "Don't you see that Miss Unwin and your friend are now brought together again, just when it seemed as if we had succeeded in separating them? It seems as if your friend left the girl temporarily, intending to rejoin her when he and Beaumont had said all they wanted to say to each other."

Harold's face fell, and for a minute or two he was silent.

"I can't understand Vere's getting tipsy," he said at length. "A more temperate man, as a rule, never lived."

"The knowledge of what he was about to do—break his sweetheart's heart and disgrace himself beyond redemption—was enough to make him drink," observed the lawyer.

"Or he may have been drugged," suggested Harold.

"Possibly. But dinner is waiting. I, too, have learned something. But it will keep. Dinner won't keep. Therefore let us have dinner."

Kenyon would infinitely have preferred to reverse this order of things; but he curbed his impatience, made an excellent meal, and afterwards lit a first-rate cigar with which his host provided him.

"Pull in your chair," said Mr. Daunt, drawing his own chair up to the fire, "and I'll tell you what I've heard about this young man Beaumont. To put it shortly, I've heard no good of him. He was articled, rather late in life, to a Mr. Rogerson, of Rogerson and Payne, Old Bailey—not a first-rate firm, by the way. The young man was a good deal addicted to cards and such like follies; but just before the end of his articles he did something, or was mixed up in some disreputable transaction, which made old Rogerson refuse to sign the young fellow's papers. It must have been something pretty bad, I can tell you, to have such an effect on Johnnie Rogerson, whom I have known aforetime. But eventually the old gentleman consented to sign, rather than have certain other matters brought out; and the scandal was hushed up.

"I tried hard to penetrate a little deeper into the matter, but I could only learn this:

"Among Rogerson's clients was a wealthy old man, who lived in a large house near Richmond, a man named Pascoe——"

"Pascoe!" interrupted Kenyon; "where have I heard that name? Heard it lately, too. I have it, sir! That was the name of Mrs. Unwin's employer—Jane Unwin's mother's master! It was at Mr. Pascoe's house that Jane and my poor friend Vere met each other. Isn't that rather singular?"

Kenyon had sprung to his feet in his excitement.

"Just sit down again, and let us look into the thing quietly and soberly," said Mr. Daunt. "We don't know that the girl Unwin and this man Beaumont were even so much as acquainted. Mrs. Unwin will be able to tell you that. But I did find out that this Mr. Pascoe had a nephew called Abbot, a young man who was supposed to be his heir."

"Mrs. Unwin mentioned him, I think," said Harold; "and I'm sure Vere has spoken of him in his letters to me—but I beg your pardon, sir."

"Well, this Abbot was a scamp; and by and bye the old gentleman found this out, and cut him off—not exactly with a shilling, but with a comparatively small sum of money. And then began the devilment. It was said that Beaumont had allowed Abbot to make use of him to play some trick about the new will which Mr. Pascoe intended making. What the trick was I could not learn; and I don't think it matters. Whatever it was, it was something very rascally, for the old man turned his nephew out of doors; and Beaumont was for a time under a particularly black cloud, as I told you. Pascoe finally made a new will, leaving his property to those who should prove to be his next of kin, excepting Joseph Abbot."

"And to whom did the money go?"

"Some cousin's children are claiming it, and I suppose they will get it."

"I don't quite see how this bears on Vere," said Harold, after a pause.

"Not directly," answered the lawyer; "but at least we know this—that Beaumont and Jane Unwin may have been, probably were, acquainted with each other, and that Beaumont was a man who was willing to join in a nefarious project."

"I hardly see how this girl could have bribed him to help her."

"I don't suppose she bribed him with money. But he may have had some interest that coincided or harmonised with hers. It may have suited them both that Vere should have disappeared for a time."

"Vere couldn't have been a relation of Mr. Pascoe, do you think?"

"I should say not; but on that point also Mrs. Unwin will be able to give you information. I don't quite see how it matters, for whoever might get the old man's money, Joseph Abbot could not possibly touch it."

"It was a hard fate," said Harold. He was thinking of Abbot.

"I fancy it was richly deserved," said Mr. Daunt. "But what is your next step to be?"

"I shall go to Mrs. Unwin," said Kenyon promptly, "and try to find out whether there was any love making, or even ordinary acquaintance, between her daughter and Beaumont. Perhaps, also, she may be able to tell me whether my friend and her late master were related to each other. It is just possible, too, that she may be able to tell me where Beaumont's friends live, or put me in the way of tracing him."

"You are very sanguine to expect so much as that," said the lawyer, smiling. "Still, she may be able to give you some information worth having; so I advise you to see her as soon as you can."

"You may depend on it, sir, that I will," answered Harold, as he thanked his host warmly, and bade him good-night.

CHAPTER XXII.

What Mrs. Unwin had to Tell.

There was no difficulty in finding Mrs. Unwin. She had said at the inquest that she was now employed as housekeeper by a gentleman who lived in the neighbourhood of Hampstead; and the tragic occurrence had made some stir in the district, so that she was rather a notable person.

The widow received Kenyon in a small, cheerless room, which looked into a courtyard. It was plain that she was a woman of strong passions. Her large dark eyes looked boldly into those of her visitor, as if challenging him to say one disrespectful word of her daughter.

Nothing, of course, was farther from Harold's mind. But he found it difficult to begin the conversation. How was he to ask the mother of the murdered girl to aid him in establishing the innocence of the man who was believed to have murdered her?

"I suppose you don't remember me," he began; "I gave evidence at 'The Spaniards.' It was I who was so unlucky as to find the revolver case."

A dry suppressed chuckle escaped from the housekeeper. She put her right hand on her knee, palm downwards, and placed her left hand over it.

"As to the revolver," she said, smiling grimly, "I might have given them a hint about that, if they had asked me."

"I'm afraid I hardly understand," said Harold.

"Well, a young gentleman may have two revolvers, or half-a-dozen, for anything I know; but I remember Mr. Vere leaving one behind him at Mr. Pascoe's."

"But the one found on the Heath may have been that very one!" cried Harold.

"I should say it was very possible."

"And why did you not tell this to the coroner? Why allow an innocent man to be charged with murder?"

Harold had risen to his feet. Mrs. Unwin followed his example.

"Innocent!" she cried, her dark eyes flashing, and her voice ringing with scornful indignation. "First he ruins my poor child, then he murders her. And you call him innocent!"

At that moment a new idea occurred to Harold; an idea which might prove important. But it was not yet time to bring it forward. He must first try to calm the mother's angry feelings. He sat down again, and spoke looking up at the indignant woman.

"It seems to me," he said, "that you are unjust to your daughter, as well as to my friend. How do you know that the relations between them were not innocent enough?"

"Because he killed her to get rid of her."

"But how do you know it was he that killed her? The Coroner's jury relied on the evidence of the revolver. But you have just told me that he left a revolver at Richmond. He was not likely to have a second one. So you see, it is not proved, or anything like proved, that my friend is responsible for your daughter's death."

Mrs. Unwin had never heard of reasoning in a circle; but she was clever enough to see that the case against Vere was not so strong as she had supposed it to be. Yet she was not convinced. She felt puzzled and uncertain.

"If he did not do it, who did? There was no one else to do it. Don't tell me," she burst out suddenly, "that Jane took her own life! I won't have it! I won't believe it!"

"You remember the doctor said that if she herself had fired the pistol, her dress would have been scorched," said Harold calmly.

"So he did—so he did. And there was no one but your friend to harm her."

"Are you sure of that? Do you know a gentleman named Beaumont?"

"Mr. Beaumont? Yes. What of him? Is he mixed up with it?"

"I am certain that he is. And what I want to know is—were he and your daughter acquainted with each other?"

"There was a Mr. Beaumont came down sometimes to the house at Richmond," said Mrs. Unwin after a pause. "He was a friend of Mr. Pascoe's nephew. I won't say he and my daughter never met. It may be they knew each other by sight. But I'm certain they never were intimate."

"They may have become intimate after your daughter left you."

Mrs. Unwin shook her head.

"When Jane left Richmond, she went straight to Devonshire," she said.

Harold had been building many hopes on the supposition that Beaumont, not Vere, had been Jane's lover. But it did not seem as if the idea was borne out by the facts. There remained, however, a second alternative, one that had occurred to him within the last few minutes.

"I don't see," he said slowly, "why we need suppose that your daughter and Mr. Vere were living together during the time that elapsed after she left Wythecombe."

Mrs. Unwin looked hard at her visitor, and her face worked strangely.

"If you could prove to me, sir," said she, "that my daughter died an honest woman, even though she fell under the power of a villain who took her life, you would do me the greatest kindness a——" She stopped, steadied her voice, and went on—"the greatest kindness a heartbroken woman like me could receive."

"Well, let us begin by thinking that your daughter was pure and good. There is really no reason, no sufficient reason, for thinking anything else. Suppose she simply wanted to live very quietly for some time, to what friend do you think she would betake herself? Whose house would she go to?"

Mrs. Unwin pondered a moment, and then shook her head.

"She would go and live in lodgings," she replied, "the first that might turn up. She was always very reserved, was Jane. She had no young lady friends. She might have gone—no. Surely she never would go there."

The last words Mrs. Unwin uttered in a whisper, as if speaking to herself. All the more, therefore, they attracted Harold's attention.

"Had your daughter no cousins?" he asked. "No uncles or aunts?"

"No, none."

"What, then, did you mean when you said she would never go there?"

For the first time during this interview Mrs. Unwin hung her head.

There was some discreditable relation in question, Kenyon felt sure. Suddenly he had an idea.

"I remember your saying you were not really a widow, Mrs. Unwin. Do you mean that your daughter might have been staying with her father?"

"I didn't mean that she might have been there. I said it was impossible. She wouldn't demean herself so far."

"Demean herself!" Harold could not comprehend the woman. "If you want to see your daughter's name cleared of the stain that rests on it," he cried, "you will tell me your husband's address."

Mrs. Unwin gave a convulsive start, but said nothing.

"I will simply inquire whether Jane, your daughter, had been living under his roof, or under his protection, for the few days that preceded her death. There can't possibly be any harm in that."

"Promise me," she said, "that you will not betray me to my husband, that you will not let him know where I live."

"Certainly I will not."

"Then you can go to the 'Black Swan' at Deptford and ask—ask for Robert Teagle."

"Isn't his name Unwin?"

"That was the name I was married in; and I believe it is my husband's true name. But he's generally known as Teagle. If he's not at home, ask for Ralph Masters, his nephew. Now, I've put my reputation, it may be my life, in your hands."

"I will be careful of the trust," said Harold gravely, "and if I find that your daughter has had less than justice done to her, you may be sure I will do my utmost to restore her good name."

In less than half-an-hour, Kenyon was on his way to Deptford.

CHAPTER XXIII.

At the "Black Swan" Inn.

It was without any clearly defined plan of campaign that Kenyon went to Deptford. It seemed natural to make inquiries at the house of Jane Unwin's father. It was possible enough, he thought, that these inquiries might end in clearing away the cloud which had rested on Jane Unwin's good name ever since her disappearance. And in that case Vere's character would be cleared also, to a certain extent. But he had little hope of finding any evidence that would tend to clear his friend of the more serious charge of murder.

Arrived at Deptford, Harold proceeded at once to the "Black Swan."

He found it a large rambling house, which had evidently been in its best days a hostelry of some importance. Long since, however, it had fallen into decay. Two rows of blank, curtainless windows faced the street; the whole place had an unmistakable air of disrepute and neglect; the ground floor seemed to be neither more nor less than a common pot-house.

Altogether the "Black Swan" looked so very black, that Kenyon thought a few preliminary inquiries could do no harm.

He went, therefore, to the best hotel which the place afforded, and ordered luncheon. Having satisfied his appetite, Harold told the waiter that he wanted to ask a few questions about the old inhabitants of the town, and said he would be glad to hear of anyone that could answer them. The waiter advised that recourse should be had to Long Joe, the ostler, a man of wide and varied information.

It was not long before Long Joe was found; and a little hospitality expressed in terms of current coin made it easy for him to speak. The substance of what he said was this:

The landlord of the "Black Swan" was a very doubtful person—more than doubtful, indeed, seeing that he had been "away" for some years—in other words, had been in penal servitude. Before that happened he had married, and had had a child; but his wife and he had not agreed—some folks said he ill-used her badly—and the end of it was she left him, taking the child with her; and no one knew what had become of them. That was before he was sent away; but no doubt his wife knew he was a thief soon after she married him.

When he returned from penal servitude Unwin changed his name; and, managing to conceal his past history, obtained the post of manager of the "Black Swan." He had lived there many years. His wife's name never passed his lips, but he had been heard to speak of his daughter. He had a nephew named Masters, who acted as barman at the "Black Swan."

For some months, however, Teagle, or Unwin, had been showing signs that his days, whether for good or evil, were numbered. He had not been able to do more than potter about the place, and prevent his nephew from transferring the contents of the till to his own pocket.

Such was the account Harold received of the "Black Swan" and its occupants; and he saw pretty clearly that it was Masters, rather than old Unwin, to whom he must address himself.

Entering the tavern, Harold called for a pint of bitter ale. It was handed to him by a stout young woman, and Harold immediately asked for Masters. The girl replied by ushering him into a kind of parlour boxed in between the outer bar and the real parlour of the establishment. Here a loutish young fellow was sitting, poring over a greasy account-book.

"Are you Mr. Masters?" asked Harold.

The young man eyed the stranger as boys at a fourth-rate school eye a new boy of doubtful aspect.

"Yes," said he. "What do you want with me?"

"Is this where Miss Unwin stayed, about a week ago?"

The man's jaw dropped, and he stared at the stranger as if he had seen a ghost.

"I see this is the house," said Harold quietly. "Can you tell me when she left?"

"No! I know nothin' about it. Never heard such a name i' my life."

"That is not true. Your uncle's name is Unwin, and Jane, his daughter, is dead. Did you not know that?"

"No; and I don't believe it. I never knew he had a daughter. Come, get out o' this, or I'll chuck y' out. Wot ye comin' here questionin' an' spyin' on honest folks for? Get out."

"Will you tell me when Jane Unwin came here, whether she came alone, and when she left?"

"No!" roared the human animal at the table, and starting up he sprang on his questioner like a wild beast.

Harold was ready to knock the fellow down; but recognising that a row in a low tavern could do no possible good, and could only bring disgrace upon him, he hastily opened the door and stepped back. It was the wrong door, as it happened; but at the end of the passage into which it opened there appeared the light of day. It mattered nothing to Harold which door he left the tavern by, so he went straight on, meaning to return later in the evening and question the old man or the barmaid.

He had barely reached the outer air, when he heard a shout behind him.

"Come back, you——!" yelled Masters.

Kenyon paid no attention to him. He had crossed the threshold and found himself in a small disused court, used to give light to the bedrooms in the rear of the building.

He was looking about to find a means of exit from the court, when he happened to throw his eyes upwards.

Next instant a cry, half shriek, half roar, echoed through the empty court; and Kenyon had turned, dashed into the passage, floored the barman with one blow of his fist, found the main staircase, and had mounted to the second floor before Masters had risen from the ground. For there, in one of the upper windows, Kenyon had seen the pale, spectre-like face of Launcelot Vere!

"Vere! Vere! Where are you?" cried Harold, pounding at one locked door after another. At last a weak voice answered him. Harold rushed to the door and tried to open it. It was locked. Kenyon threw himself on it, once—twice, and the lock gave way.

"Vere, my poor fellow, what madness has caused you to hide yourself away like this? Why, how ill you look! You are worn to a skeleton, and you are trembling from head to foot!"

Vere was indeed a pitiable object, his clothes dirty and disordered, his face unwashed, thin, and hollow-eyed.

"Get your things at once, and come with me," said Kenyon.

"I—I don't think I can quite go with you to-day, Harold. But to-morrow, perhaps, or next week, when Jane comes back——"

Kenyon started.

"Could the poor fellow be mad? Could the cruel imprisonment have affected his brain?"

He looked at the colourless face more closely, and as he did so he became conscious of a peculiar odour in the room.

"Launcelot," he said gravely, "you never told me you were fond of opium. You have been smoking opium ever since—never mind. You can explain later. Come with me now."

"You leave that gen'l'man alone. He's soft in his head and we take care of him," said a hoarse voice at the door. It was Masters.

"Indeed? Then you have laid yourself open to another charge, and a very serious one, I can tell you. Let me pass, fellow! Can't you see that the game is up?"

With a hearty curse Masters saw them depart.

In less than twenty minutes he was an inmate of a cell at the police-station; and detectives were searching the "Black Swan" from top to bottom.

Kenyon's first care was to place Vere under proper medical supervision. It was some days, however, before he was able to give a full and satisfactory account of what had befallen him. What he then told Harold was a strange, yet evidently a true story.

"About three years ago," he said, "I was much troubled with neuralgia, and took a great deal of opium. I was ashamed of the weakness, and hid it even from you. Beaumont knew of it, however, for he had surprised me in the act of smoking the stuff. He encouraged me to try and do without it; and in the long run I did break it off. In fact, I was cured—never touched it for two years and a half.

"I must also tell you that about two years ago, I had a—well, a flirtation that threatened to become serious, with the daughter of my patron's housekeeper. She sat to me as my model. You know the sort of thing. I behaved badly, no doubt. At the same time Jane Unwin—that was her name—was quite old enough to take care of herself; and if I did wrong I have been well punished for it. You have seen Miss Denvers. You know what I have lost.

"Two days before the day fixed for my marriage I got a bogus telegram, asking me to meet Winnie at Paddington. Of course I went. Instead of Winnie there appeared Jane Unwin, who said a great deal I need not repeat. She threatened to kill herself at the church door as my bride and I passed out of the church; and I was horribly afraid she would do it. I walked about with her for a time trying to calm her. At last I saw Beaumont, with whom I had an engagement for that evening, so I made an excuse to Jane, who went off more readily than I expected, and I joined Beaumont.

"We dined together somewhere, and then we went to his rooms. He gave me a cigar and a cup of coffee. One or both of them must have been drugged; for I don't even remember falling asleep. I was conscious of being taken a long drive in some vehicle, with Jane Unwin at my side, as I thought.

"When I came to myself I was in a large, bare, badly furnished room—the place you found me in, and I have been kept a prisoner ever since. Jane was constantly at my bedside. She was very tender and loving to me—said she would help me to escape, and we would go to Italy and get married, and all that—but she was constantly dosing me with opium while she pretended to nurse me. The fact is, I often hardly knew what I was saying or doing. I believe on my honour her idea was to weaken my will till I should consent to do what she wanted, apparently of my own accord. She was always taunting me with the fact that Miss Denvers would have nothing more to do with me; and——"

"Don't be too sure of that, Lancelot," interrupted Harold.

"Do you mean that there may be a chance for me yet?" cried Vere, springing to his feet.

"I do. Only prove that you have quite shaken yourself free of that detestable drug, and so far as Miss Denvers is concerned, I should say there is good hope for you."

"She is an angel! You may imagine how I got to hate Jane Unwin. At last I think she came to get tired of her task, for she left me."

"Why did you not try to get free?" burst in Harold. "Why not shout, struggle?"

"I did so, my dear fellow, when I was not under the power of morphia. But no one ever heard me. I would have burst open the door, but it opened inwards, and was very strong itself. And I was sadly weakened by the opium. Sometimes, I confess, I smoked it, oftener they gave it me in my food. I got quite afraid of my gaolers; and I fear my will to escape had been worn out for some time. I could not make an effort for my release. That cub and I have a fine account to settle when I get back my strength. As for Jane Unwin, if ever I see her again, which is not very likely——"

"Vere! Don't you know? The poor creature is dead."

"Dead!"

"She was found on Hampstead Heath with a revolver bullet in her heart."

"My God!"

Vere shuddered and covered his face with his hands.

"And you, Vere, stand charged with murdering her!"

SUMMER HEAT AND OBESITY.

"Summer heat, with the out-door enjoyments which come in its train, is a source of unmixed delight to all whose physical condition is sound. The full feast of pleasure to which hospitable Nature at this season invites mankind is not, however, for those whose infirmities forbid them to undergo, without serious discomfort, a considerable amount of bodily fatigue. To those in particular who are the victims of excessive corpulence, the arrival of the genial summer warmth serves chiefly as a painful reminder that, for them, the delights of long woodland rambles, the climbing of mountain tops, and all the adventurous ways of flood and field are prohibited joys. The palpitating heart, the reeling brain, and the possible deadly sunstroke, which are the concomitants of obesity, banish all the pleasant anticipations which once came with the advent of the glad summer tide How much of this deprivation of enjoyment and positive misery is absolutely and easily avoidable may be learned by consulting Mr. F. Cecil Russell's 'Corpulency, and the Cure' (256 pages), a little work whose popularity is proved by the fact that its eighteenth edition has just been issued. This fact, too, indicates, in some degree, the wide area now covered by Mr. Russell's wonderful success as an expert in the reduction of excessive fat. His process, which is absolutely safe and pleasant, is so rapid in its operation, that any over-corpulent lady or gentlemen can easily get rid of all unnecessary weight in a very few weeks, so as to be able, before the autumn is with us, to enjoy the delightful feeling (and the appearance too) of renewed youth and energy. Mr. Russell makes no mystery of the nature of his curative preparation—apparently miraculous as are its effects in simultaneously reducing weight and increasing appetite—the consequently larger amount of food being consumed with impunity. He prints, therefore, his recipe in his singularly suggestive book, which may be obtained post free, by sending two penny stamps to his offices, Woburn House, 27, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C."—Gloucester Standard.

CURIOUS EFFECTS IN THE TREATMENT OF CORPULENCY.

"The old-fashioned methods of curing obesity were based upon the adoption of a sort of starvation dietary. Would any reader now believe that by the new orthodox treatment a stout person can take almost double his usual quantity of food, and yet decrease one or two pounds of fat daily for a time? This is very singular, and directly hostile to previous opinions held by medical authorities, yet it is a fact. The author of the comparatively new system in question explains that the person under treatment is restored to a healthier state in the small space of twenty-four hours, having lost probably 2lb. of superfluous deposit, the organs display great activity, and more food is required. By standing on a weighing machine the proof of reduction is incontrovertibly shown daily. In serious cases a pound to ten pounds weekly loss is registered until the person approaches his or her normal weight, then the diminution becomes less pronounced, the muscles firmer, the brain more active, less sleep is desired, and finally a cure effected. Compiled reprints of medical and other journals, and interesting particulars, including the book entitled 'Corpulency, and the Cure' (256 pages), containing the 'recipe,' which is quite harmless, can be obtained post free from Mr. Russell, of Woburn House, 27, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C., by enclosing two penny stamps."—Dublin Weekly Freeman.

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 394.] For the Week ending July 18th, 1896. [ONE PENNY

In the Moment of Triumph.

ONE evening in June, in a large house in one of the fashionable streets of London, a big entertainment was going forward. It was a concert, and one of the most perfectly carried out in all its details that the London world had enjoyed that season.

The long, brightly-lighted and flower-decked drawing-room ended in a cool and shadowy conservatory in which two women were sitting on a sofa, under the palms, screened from the view of the multitude. The liquid notes of a beautiful voice floated across to them from the music-room beyond—rose, fell, and died into silence.

"Ah!" said the younger of the two, with a deep breath of longing—a young girl with the bloom of youth on her flushed and rounded cheek, and the sparkle of enthusiasm in her bright eyes—"to sing like that! To give pleasure such as she has given me! To stir the emotions of one's fellows. That is life!"

The elder woman, whose delicate, sensitive face betrayed more of a yearning pain than pleasure as she sat listening, turned curiously to look in the face beside her. "And you wish for 'life' as you call it, of that kind?"

"Wish?—that is a poor word to express what I feel. Even to know personally a few of the people in the world who have done something with their lives, people who write the books that move us! That would be best of all."

"I know some of them. In my wanderings to and fro I have come across more than one celebrity of the book world."

"Have you?" said the girl eagerly, "do tell me about some of them. I have always wondered," she went on, after a short pause, "what the feelings of an authoress would be in the moment of triumph—when, after much struggling, she has attained her first success—has awakened to find herself famous in fact, such as the author of 'The Dark Sea,'" alluding to a book by an, as yet, unknown writer which had lately taken the world by storm.

"What they feel at the moment that fame comes to them," echoed her companion with the worn face, dreamily.

A sudden light flashed into her eyes, and she said:

"I can tell you if you like."

"Oh, please do. How I envy you meeting the interesting people that you do!"

"Yes," was the answer, in a curiously constrained voice, "I am an enviable person, I suppose. I know the authoress you speak of particularly well, and will tell you how she attained success, if you care to listen."

The conservatory led into a square walled-in garden beyond, and the doors dividing the one from the other were wide open to the warm June night. Outside sat two men smoking cigarettes, and carrying on a desultory conversation. As the elder woman began to speak, one of them stopped short in the middle of a sentence and remained silent until her voice ceased also.

"She is over thirty now," she was saying, "an age when success, if it comes and she is a lonely woman, makes her feel lonelier than it found her. Almost from a child she had had it in her to write, and, long before she had conceived any definite idea of writing a book. she had made a habit of putting down on scraps of paper, describing as well as she could anything which made her feel—a beautiful view, a sunset, a child's face—any strong emotion she experienced

"After some years of a more or less happy girlhood she met a man, younger than herself, who, in his boyish, urgent fashion made love to her and—well, none of that is to the point, or will interest you. Nothing came of it except—except that it broke her heart." Her lip quivered, and the unshed tears brimmed her eyes. Someone was singing in the room beyond,

Douglas, Douglas, tender and true, that old song which has a power to reach our heart always; and, set to Lady John Scott's exquisite music, "does bring the tears unbidden to our eyes."

She went on: "Troubles followed thick and fast after this, and to cut the story short, she at last found herself in London, living on a pittance—her portion from the wreck of her father's fortune—and with her face set steadily towards making a name for herself in literature; uphill work as all know who have tried it. From the smart house, the many servants, the clothes, the enjoyments of the life that had been hers, she passed by short transitions, after eating for a time the bitter bread of charity, to the one-garret life that is the fate of so many breadwinners. She was not thirty then, and the hopes of youth, and the longings of youth, were not quite dead within her; they still made themselves felt from time to time in spasmodic jerks and tremblings—on lovely spring days when she allowed herself a rest from her labours to stroll through the lilac-scented paths of the Park, too exhausted from semi-starvation and over-work to think very deeply of anything connected with the future that lay so dark in front of her. Rather she let her thoughts wander back into the past—her steps straying over the burnt-up grass, to the glinting Serpentine beyond—to the long-ago evenings when she and her brother had so often drifted lazily down the river in the sunset glow.

"But she did not completely give up society in those days of dreary monotony, nor clothe herself in the hopeless eccentricities so much affected by all grades of artists and writers. She did what she could to keep up her friends, often going without food to buy herself a decent pair of gloves, or a new hat."

"Do you really mean," interposed the girl, with wide eyes and lowered voice, "that—that she really was hungry?" In her sheltered life it seemed so strange and so monstrous a thing that another girl, a lady like herself, should want actual food.

"Yes,"—and the woman's eyes shone—"she used to try to live upon a shilling a day, and you don't know how difficult that is to a girl brought up daintily as you or I have been—till you have tried it! She could not eat what those in a lower class would have fattened on—coarsely cooked, unappetising food. Her one room was very small, and dark—hot in summer, freezing in winter, when she sat in all the warm things she possessed, to save a fire, and wrote and mended. And most nights she felt very empty and hungry and solitary when she went to bed."

"How terrible!" said the girl gently.

"But it was not like that all the year. Sometimes in the autumn she paid visits in the country, and there she met people who interested her and kept her life from stagnating. She had a certain charm of her own which men felt; and in her, as in every other woman that ever was born, the craving for sympathy and protection and the strength that the love of a man gives to a woman was strong in her—apart, if you know what I mean, from the longing for the particular love of any one individual. It was the natural instinct every woman feels to lean on someone stronger than herself. All this she put aside, in the instances where it might have developed itself into the thing she craved, until her purpose should be accomplished.

"Once it went very hard with her and she almost succumbed to the temptation, for as such she viewed it, having vowed a vow unto herself.

"He was a very different man from the other; he was tender, chivalrous, gentle with women as towards something to be shielded, protected, cared for; and his wonderfully keen perceptions enabled him to see further into her complex nature than anyone had ever taken the trouble to see before. I know, because he has since told me so much about those days; he often says that the first moment he looked in her face he loved it for the tale of repressed suffering he read in it."

"And she?" asked the girl quickly.

The man who was listening so intently in the dark garden, where the few stars twinkled down through the whispering leaves of the big lime, threw away his cigar and turned his head towards the open door where the cool tinkle of the miniature fountain broke the waiting silence, and waited for the answer.

"I have said," replied the woman, "that she had a purpose, and, wisely or foolishly, perhaps she herself did not know, would think of none of these things till her purpose was accomplished. All that was best within her rose up and responded yearningly to the unspoken feeling he had for her. But, long ago, she also had gauged the depths of an even more complicated character than her own, and in the midst of her misery had seen, clear and certain, the one dominant fact that that which would have power to move him, and that alone, would be the accomplishment of something that the world would applaud to the echo, and which, further, would place her beyond his reach.

"She was always conscious of a strong instinct which told her he and she would meet again—that in some way her book would bring them together and also that then, and not till then, would the last scene of the play be played out, and who knows," she went on dreamily, "what that scene will be?

"Do you think," she continued after a pause, "that every time she looked in the glass and traced the new faint lines that privation, cold, suffering and anxiety were drawing round her eyes and mouth, and saw still another grey hair added to the number that already streaked the dark, that it did not further her determination to succeed in the task she had set herself?" There was a bitter ring in the woman's voice as she proceeded. "She had not striven so hard and so long to give in for the first strong temptation that assailed her.

"After this episode she went back to London and her garret, and all through the long cold winter, when food was scarce and fuel scarcer" ("Good God!" murmured the man in the garden, under his breath, his deep set eyes gleaming like the stars above, under the broad band of his dark eyebrows) "worked on at her book, which was her life, and was written, to use a true, if, perhaps, highflown metaphor, with her heart's blood. It had not been without a struggle that she had elected to make 'copy' of her most sacred feelings, her bitterest agony; but she guessed rightly in her inexperience, that it is truth alone which makes the only real success in the literary world, though ephemeral shams may endure for a night.

"With what a sinking of the heart she saw, time after time, the return of the 'rejected manuscripts' of some of her small magazine ventures you may imagine when you reflect on the loneliness of her life at that time.

"She almost persuaded herself of the fallacy of this truth which she had deemed so all-important a factor of success, for these small attempts were also written from her heart, things she had known and seen around her in the life she had done with and yet the editors would have none of them. 'Too fantastic,' 'unreal,' were some of the criticisms bestowed upon them by the kinder members of the brotherhood, those who had at least given them a reading.

"At last one wrote: 'There is so much that is good in your articles and yet they are not altogether what will "take." I would advise you to try your hand at something that shall be simpler, less full of the workings of manifold and complex emotions in your characters, fuller of the common surface—details of the ordinary story-teller.'

"The evening that she received this was thundery, and the heat of her small room intolerable. All through the long hot night she sat at her little table writing; her feet like stones, her head burning; and as the red sun stole up the summer sky the last word was written of the commonplace article that was to begin the work of her initiation into the world of print."

"Oh, I am glad!" broke in the girl, "I am glad she succeeded in the end. But, tell me, what became of the man, the first one—did he marry?"

"He married," answered the woman, in a toneless voice, and her eyes wandered into the dark of the garden.

"And did she ever see him again—has she seen him since she became famous?"

"To the best of my knowledge she has never seen him since," replied the woman again mechanically.

"But to go back to our original starting-point, what are her feelings after so much trouble and so much hard work, on becoming famous?"

"It is not many days since she said she felt only a strange and indefinite sense of waiting—waiting——"

The last long-drawn-out notes from under Wolff's wonderful magical fingers in the far room are sobbing through the vibrating silence. The distant hum of London echoes faintly as from a long way off. A dark shadow fills the open doorway. The woman starts, and a sudden horror as of a deadly fear, dilates in her grey eyes as they meet the sombre fire in the man's. He comes quickly forward and drops into a seat beside her. His companion saunters on into the drawing-room, and the girl looks from one to the other and keeps silence.

The slow flush that travels painfully over the woman's worn sweet face, fades and leaves her pale.

"I hope you will forgive an old friend's unconscious eavesdropping," he begins lightly, but with evident effort in the constrained tones as he proceeds. "You tell a story well, and I grew so interested that I quite forgot that such an unpleasant word might be applied to me, therefore I came in to make myself known. Please go on. She was waiting—waiting, for what?" The fire in his eyes deepens, his voice has a ring of command, but the ghost of a smile hovering over his finely-cut lips makes the dark face a very beautiful one.

Her eyes do not move from his, and the life of all her face is concentrated in them; he can see, as the hanging lantern above their heads casts its dimly religious light on her white cheeks.

"I said it was some days ago that she felt like that. You must remember fame is short-lived, and all its stages ephemeral. I believe she no longer has that strange feeling. It has reached the stage beyond—the last scene."

"Yes? you interest me. What do you suppose would occur if, when they meet again, she should learn that the wife he married almost in his boyhood, as you said, had left him soon afterwards for a better world, to mourn her loss in the pitiless light of a disillusion which the short experience of married life had furnished?"

The girl, sitting there beside the two, apparently forgotten by both, noted the faint flicker of the heavy eyelids over the steady grey eyes, as the man's voice ceased—no heightened colour came again to mark another high-tide of emotion.

"She would pity the man, I believe."

"Pity him—pity him—only?" In the low tones there lay a passion that seemed altogether superfluous to the quiet tenor of the conversation.

"Men make mistakes," he went on. "Do you mean that the woman who could write 'The Dark Sea,' and feel all that she had written, would yet have nothing more than pity, after all those long years of her lonely faithfulness, to give the man who had caused her all that sorrow;" (she shivered; he had struck, with, maybe, unconscious cleverness or intuition, a sensitive chord in woman's nature, and one which seldom ceases to vibrate in every true woman's heart) "the man who knew that once he had made a great mistake."

The stars were paling, the dawn was rushing gloriously up the palpitating sky. Its rays fell full on the tired face, almost haggard now in the pure and lovely new day, as the man's senses were quick to note, and yet—a great hunger grew in his strange eyes, a strong agony crept into his dark face. Her hands lay still in her lap, but the fingers were strained over one another. She neither raised her voice nor altered its tone as she answered slowly: "There are, in heaven and in earth, mistakes which never can be rectified—mistakes which have gone too deep for tears or—for restitution. Come," she added, suddenly to the girl at her side, "your beauty sleep as well as your chaperon will be waiting for you, and I am sure you must be tired of my long story; but I can tell you the end before we go in to the others if you like," standing up with her face to the radiant dawn—her pale sad face in which, also, a new day had dawned, so that the old day could never reign again. "The moment of that woman's triumph arrived—the moment for which she had starved, and striven early and late; the moment that had eaten up her youth in its advent—it came in actual detail as she had always known it would, and, coming, found her—desolate. Come." And they moved together into the lighted room, leaving the man alone, looking up at the day which had dawned for him also.

ARABIAN NIGHT'S ENTERTAINMENT, No. 102.

One morning the harem guards, on opening the garden gate of Razhib Pasha's magnificent palace on the shore of the Bosphorus, were alarmed to find the dead body of a handsome youth propped up against the portal.

Examination of the body elicited the following facts:

The youth had been stabbed with some pointed, sharp-edged weapon, apparently a knife or dagger, for two wounds were found in his left side, both evidently caused by the same weapon. One of the wounds was a flesh wound, and by no means dangerous, as if some weak and unskilled hand had dealt the blow; the other went straight through to the heart, and must have proved fatal on the instant. In addition to these terrible marks there was, on the neck of the dead youth, the deep impression of two rows of human teeth—two sharply defined rows, without the slightest blur or defect visible.

In the belt of the murdered man were found his pistols, their ivory butts handsomely inlaid with silver, and his dagger, with hilt of mother of pearl, sheathed in a richly jewelled and enamelled case. On his fingers sparkled costly rings, and in his turban was his purse, containing five-and-twenty gold zechines.

Evidently this was not a case of robbery, but of murder, actuated by hatred or revenge.

The murdered youth was recognised as Alnuman Aga, only son of the great general, Razhib Pasha, and was known throughout the city as the flower of Turkish gallantry, the petted favourite of the ladies, the pride, hope, and comfort of his proud and ambitious father.

During three whole days trumpets were sounded and drums beaten in streets, squares, and market-places, and town-criers gave notice to the populace of Stamboul that whoever should denounce the murderer of Alnuman Aga, or give him up to justice, would receive ten bags of money and a free pardon for all complicity in that or any other crime committed, as well as protection against all danger arising from his denouncement of the principal murderer.

One bag of money meant one thousand piastres; accordingly ten bags, ten thousand piastres; and at that time the piastre was worth sixteen times as much as it is at present. Verily, a goodly price for a single word—the name of one man.

Of yet weightier consequence than the promise of money was that second promise of free pardon to any accomplice in the deed; for, no doubt, there was an accomplice. A single man could not have killed Alnuman Aga, who was a sturdy youth, well built and muscular, highly trained in all bodily exercise, and brave and skilful in fight.

But the surest proof of the existence of an accomplice was found in the ugly mark on the neck of the dead man. Assuredly there had been two—one who bit fiercely and stabbed weakly, and the other who thrust home with one fatal blow.

It is an old saying, and generally found true, that a secret shared by two is no secret at all, for sooner or later one of the accessories is sure to betray it. Moreover, here was the double inducement of pecuniary gain and immunity from punishment. Surely, whenever those two look at each other, the one cannot help considering how much the other's head is worth to him, while the other suspects the thought, and naturally tries to anticipate the action in order to save himself.

Yet, in spite of that clear calculation, in spite of drums, bugles, and town-criers, the murder remained a mystery, for it had never entered the head of the wise speculators that there exists in life a tie which unites two individuals in one. Husband and wife, although two in person, are in soul and mind but one.

The quarter of the Seven Minarets is the chosen settlement of the Armenian residents at Stamboul. Of the celebrated seven minarets at present only four remain standing, three of them having been destroyed by an earthquake; but the azure-coloured copper globes of the remaining four shine far out into the distance, as the rays of the setting sun fall upon them.

In the vicinity of these slender minarets, the Armenian church stands, a plain, modest, unassuming edifice. It has no steeple, no sculptured images of saints, nothing to adorn it save coloured painting within and without.

Attached to the church is a smaller stone building, the residence of "The White Priest," the pastor of the Armenians.

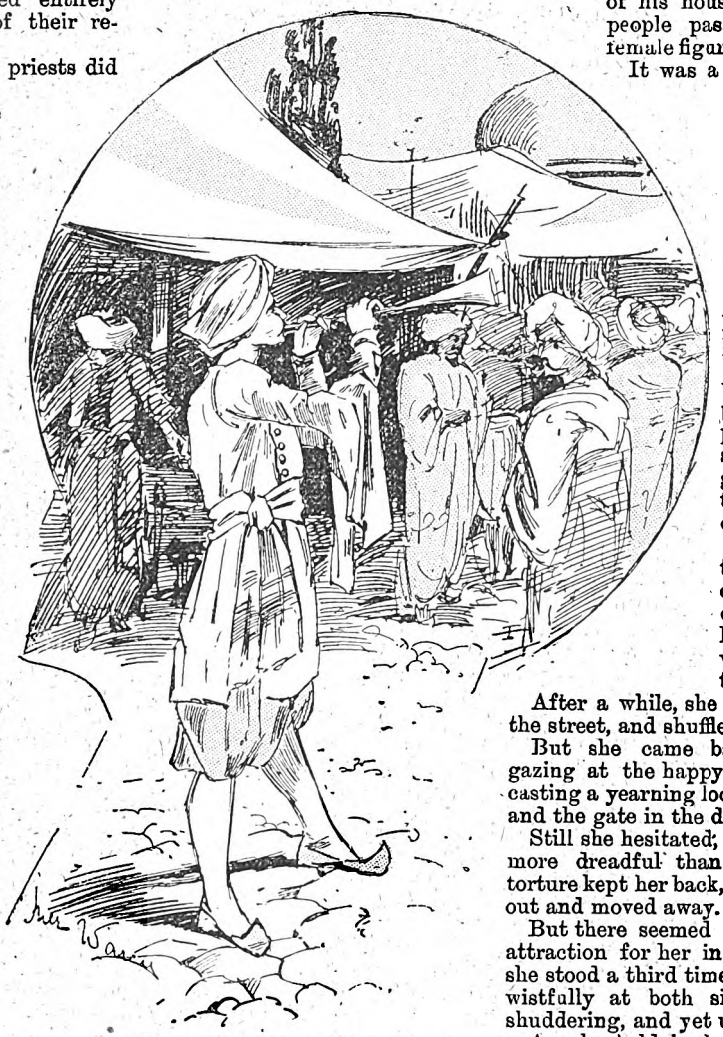
The Armenian church was poor, and had no worldly possessions whatever. No tithe was paid to the priest, no fee was due to him. He had no other income than the voluntary offerings of his flock to their shepherd, and his worldly welfare rested entirely upon the strength of their religious ardour.

Still, some of these priests did very well, as, for instance, Makarios, the white priest of the district of the Seven Minarets. Not only was this district one of the largest and wealthiest, holding the most prominent and prosperous Armenian citizens of the town; but, as a priest who was keenly alive to the duties and the interests of his vocation, Makarios had found means to make his holy office an unceasing fountain of gain; so much so, indeed, that there soon was not one sheep in his flock which was not sorely aware of the religious zeal of his shepherd.

This ingenious man had impressed upon his parishioners the urgent necessity of yearly consecration of their dwellings, for which ceremony a certain sum of money had to be paid to the officiating priest. Marriages, christenings, funerals, etc., had each a complicated number of new rites and observances, for the execution of which the priest was duly paid. Masses for the benefit of the departed souls were read, messages to heaven or purgatory accepted and dispatched, responses given—and all for a pecuniary consideration, which was levied in accordance with the means of employer.

Of course, the fee for absolution was in accordance with the sin committed, and with the wealth of the sinner. With a poor man, a great crime became an insignificant matter, whereas, with rich folks, a small error grew into a horrid sin, which could not be bought off too dear.

From the sky-blue cupolas of the remaining four minarets the last glimmer of sunlight had faded away.



Trumpets were sounded.

The noise in the streets had ceased, the whip-cracks of the camel drivers, and the shrill cries of the water sellers gave way to the barking and howling of the stray dogs which infest the streets of Stamboul at night; and the sand of the streets, disturbed by busy passers, and whirling about in clouds, began to settle down again—the sure forerunner of night.

Makarios, the white priest, was looking out through the grating of his iron gate into the vault-like entrance of his house, and watching the people pass before it, when a female figure caught his attention.

It was a most striking figure, remarkable for ugliness.

The woman's gait was halting, and she leant heavily on a stout stick she carried; evidently she was very lame.

Over one of her eyes she wore a big, black patch or plaster, showing that she was half blind, and her face was marked with the purplish scars of small-pox, while her scanty, soiled and tattered garments showed her to be poor almost to destitution.

She stood before the paintings on the entrance wall shuddering visibly as she looked at the wretches writhing in purgatorial flames.

After a while, she sighed, turned out to the street, and shuffled away.

But she came back again, this time gazing at the happy lot of the redeemed, casting a yearning look at the confessional and the gate in the dark background.

Still she hesitated, as if something yet more dreadful than fear of everlasting torture kept her back, and again she limped out and moved away.

But there seemed to be some powerful attraction for her in these paintings, for she stood a third time before them, looking wistfully at both sides, trembling and shuddering, and yet undecided.

As she held in her hands a couple of fowls tied together with a piece of twine, she was evidently contemplating confession, for poor people pay for their shrove-tickets with poultry; but her hesitation showed that her conscience was burdened by some heavy sin, and that she was afraid of the penance.

As she stood thus, undecided whether to give way to her conscientious scruples, or to listen to the cautioning of policy, one of the cocks which she held in her hands began to crow, and, startled by the sound of St. Peter's warning, her resolution was confirmed.

She drew herself up slightly, sighed, and then went boldly towards the grating to crave admittance of the priest.

Makarios had hastened to his box, and was already waiting for her when she limped in, and knelt down before him.

"What sin burdens you?" asked the priest.

"I have taken human life," sobbed the woman.

"Wilfully or accidentally?"

"Wilfully."

"A man or woman's?"

"A strong man's."

"What was your motive—revenge or robbery?"

"Self-defence. He assailed me, and I killed him to free myself."

"Have you known him long?"

"He was my constant persecutor."

"Was he a Christian or a Jew?"

"Neither; he was a Turk."

"And do you think that such a heinous crime can be absolved for a couple of cockerels?"

"I am poor. My husband is a porter in the bazaar, and I sell soup at the corner of the Médres. Still, I have some savings, and have brought them with me in this purse. Pray, take it."

Makarios took the soiled and worn purse, and emptied its contents in his lap. The piastres, as they lay on his white robe, looked strikingly red.

"This is all counterfeit money," said he to the woman.

"If it is I did not make it," said she; "I got it, as it is from my customers."

"So you sell soups? Did you say at the corner of the Médres?"

"I said so."

"Then you told me a lie. The breath of the woman who sells soups at street corners is foul with the smell of garlic, and not sweet with the odour of roses, as yours is. The wives of bazaar porters and carriers do not eat rose-confections to perfume their breath. It is the habit of rich women, and you are one of them. You meant to deceive me, but you have deceived yourself; for, if I had listened to your confession, and absolved you in your disguise, that poor, lame, blind, ugly woman at the corner of the Médres, whom you have painted yourself to resemble, would have been admitted into Paradise and feasted with St. Basil, while you would have gone to the purgatorial flames. Therefore, if you are really repentant, and wish to be purged of your sins, go you to the well in the courtyard, wash off those painted scars from your face, take off those black patches from your eyes, and leave off your pretended limp. Then, if you return to me, I shall listen to your confession."

The woman did as he directed. She went to the well as an old, ugly, crippled hag, and she returned as a young, fair and graceful woman, proud in bearing, and conscious of her beauty.

"Now I know you, my daughter," said Makarios, recognising the fairy in rags; "you are the handsome Zabella, wife of the wealthy Tafruj, who could call himself a Zariadri, if, by bearing the famous old name, he did not fear to offend the Turks. Now, kneel down, and tell me your tale. You have murdered a man—a Turk. Who was he?"

"His name was Alnuman Aga, and he was the only son of the mighty Grand Vizier, Razhib Pasha."

"H'm! h'm! Alnuman Aga, indeed! But how did it all happen? Stay, let me question you. If I am not mistaken—and I certainly am not—you sell plate, jewellery, and costly weapons in the bazaar, and your beauty serves you as a bait to lure youthful and gallant buyers to your stand? Confess truly; Alnuman Aga was drawn on by your sparkling eyes, and the smile which showed him your pearly teeth. You pressed his hand, and whispered to him, so that he would buy your precious wares without haggling over your prices. Don't shake your head, for you cannot deny it. You left a printed copy of your sharp-edged teeth on the neck of the murdered youth, when you sucked his life-blood, you vampire!"

"As God is my witness," sobbed the woman, "I tell you the truth. I never lured Alnuman Aga to our shop—never noticed him at all. He sent an old woman with the naame to me, before I ever set eyes on his face."

"Aha, the naame!—the embroidered purse full of dried flowers, which speak in their own language to fair women, and are understood. You picked out those you wanted to keep, and returned the rest as an answer?"

"No; I returned the naame without breaking the seal, and I told the old woman never to come to me again. But Alnuman Aga did not take that for an answer. He watched for my husband's departure from the bazaar, and then he came and began to recite flower-rhymes and love songs to me."

"And you listened with delight?"

"I made the sign of the cross, and said: 'Begone from me, Satanas!' But he laughed, and tried to win my favour by presents of corals and pearls, sparkling gems and rings, set with precious stones."

"Which you accepted, and hid from the eyes of your husband?"

"Which I threw at his feet immediately. I even tried to spoil my beauty, so as not to attract him."

"You acted foolishly. You should have accepted all his presents, and brought them to me, your confessor. The gift of the libertine would thus have become the offering of an ardent soul."

"He threatened me; he told me that if I would not accede to his wishes he would kill my husband; and my Zariadri is such a gentle, tender-hearted man that he could not kill an animal, much less do harm to a human being. I am sure that if a thief should steal his money he would not find it in his heart to have him prosecuted for the theft."

"You mean to say that he is a coward?"

"He is as brave as the best of men, but his heart is kind, and his disposition gentle. When Alnuman Aga threatened to kill my husband, I told him I should go to Razhib Pasha and tell him of his son's wishes and intentions."

"Razhib Pasha would have served your impudence rightly if you had dared to carry out your threat."

"Razhib Pasha loves my husband."

"Yes, as I love these nice fowls. Go on with your confession."

"Alnuman Aga laughed again, and said he would come to visit me when my husband would be absent from home. I told him that in such cases my husband locks the house and takes the key with him, and that I was not one of those women who keep rope-ladders for the accommodation of lovers."

"Don't praise your virtues to me: I sit here to listen to your vices."

"Four days ago, in the evening, I was at home alone, I was standing at the window of my room, looking out into the garden. I watched the butterflies hovering round the pomegranate blossoms, and my mind was so pure and tranquil that I am sure I had not one sinful thought."

"Thou art never sure of that, daughter. Watching butterflies is in itself sinful in woman."

"If so, I have heavily atoned for the sin. While standing there, suddenly I felt a strong arm about my waist, and turning round in affright, I beheld the glowing eyes of Alnuman Aga. 'What have you done with my husband?' I cried in dismay, endeavouring to extricate myself from his arms, and trying to avert my face from the sickening gaze of his eyes. 'He is in the wine shop,' said he, laughing, 'and I stole from him the key to your room. Now you are mine!' As he uttered these words, a deadly faintness crept over my heart, and I felt as if I should sink down dead at his feet. My eyes closed before the demoniac gaze of the fiend before me, and I broke down, while the hot breath of the victorious scoundrel swept my face."

"Go on, don't stop—go on, I say."

"In that awful moment, my dying senses caught the sound of well-known footsteps in the adjoining hall; the door to my room flew open, and Zariadri Tafruj stood before me—not intoxicated by drink, but proud, and stately, and handsome, as in the blessed hour of our betrothal. The invigorating blood rushed to my heart, ecstatic delight, triumphant joy, filled me with giant strength; I forgot that I was a woman and weak. Violated love and fidelity, the presence of my wrongly-accused husband, all tended to increase my hatred, my thirst for an immediate and deadly revenge. Alnuman Aga wore a dagger in his belt. Swiftly I seized it, and stabbed him in the side. But I saw the blow had been too weak, and, with the fury of a tigress I encircled his neck with my arm, my teeth went deep into his flesh, and, drawing the dagger from the wound, I leant the hilt against my bosom, and, pressing the struggling wretch to me, drove the dagger deep into his treacherous heart. This is the story of the murder of Alnuman Aga."

"And is this all? Have you nothing more to confess?"

"What more should there be to say?".

"Did not your husband help you in this fatal business? Did you do all and he stand idly by?"

"The deed is mine alone. After it had been done, and could not be helped or undone, we swathed the corpse in sheets, seated it on a mule, and brought it to the gate of Razhib Pasha's garden, where we left it. Nobody had seen us, nobody would have suspected us, and the secret would have remained a secret for ever if my conscience had not troubled me ever since. I have no rest, no peace, night or day. Waking or sleeping, I see the distorted features of the murdered man, and through his parted lips an expiring cry seems to ring for ever and ever in my ears. It is as if I could see his soul, rent from the body, soar, like some frightened bird, above my head. I hear his dying groans, and my hands are reeking with his streaming blood. No human tongue accuses me, but my conscience cries out; and what help is it to me if nobody knows it, when the Almighty has witnessed my crime? For four days the phantom of my sin has haunted me, and I can bear it no longer. Here I have come to you, my confessor, the earthly representative of my heavenly Redeemer. You can help me. Absolve me of my crime, and give me back peace of conscience, tranquility of mind and soul!"

"My daughter, what you ask is not so easy. It is an awful crime—the cruel murder of the Grand Vizier's only son. That cannot be atoned for and bought off by a little fasting or praying, a pilgrimage, a couple of fowls, and a petty purse of bad coins, of which the silver is almost entirely worn off, and nothing left but the copper."

"I am ready, for any penance and sacrifice, if you will only tell me what to do."

"That is right, and now listen. For nine days you shall eat nothing to appease your hunger but a piece of bread, and drink nothing to quench your thirst but the drops of dew that you can gather from the leaves of the aloe in early morning. Thrice daily you must attend holy service at church, and each time you come you must kneel down before the altar, and make the circuit of it on your knees seven times. Finally, you must send five bags of money—but, mind you, good, full, weighty piastres—this very evening to me, to be used for the clearing of your soul. You may go."

Zabella went home, and Makarios received the five bags of piastres the same evening.

When, on the next day, the woman appeared at church to begin her penance, the priest watched her, and after service, called her to him, and said:

"I was mistaken yesterday, my daughter, in thinking that the slight penance which I laid on you would suffice to wash away your sin. Your crime is so heavy that it cannot be bought off for less than five more bags of money."

Makarios received the required sum, but by the next morning he had found that again five more were necessary, and so on for nine subsequent days, until the wealthy Zariadri Tafruj had become a beggar, and the handsome Zabella had given up into his hands the last piece of her jewellery—her pretty earrings, her heavy bracelets, and her costly pearls.

Still Makarios' coffers were not filled, his greed not satisfied, for when, at last, the weeping woman said: "Now, father, this is the last you can take from me. I have nothing left that is worth the asking or the keeping. These are the last things of value in my possession. Now give me your absolution and the shrove-ticket, for which I have paid with hard penance and the loss of all my earthly possessions"—he made answer with a mocking smile, laying his clumsy, fat hand on her dishevelled locks.

"Not so, my daughter. You are not yet stripped of all valuables, for this beauteous head of yours is worth ten bags of money to one who means to have them."

The poor woman shook the hand of the priest from her head, rose from her knees, and went home.

Ten bags of money had he said—that was the price offered by Razhib Pasha for the head of the murderer of his son!

Makarios was not a lazy man by any means, and he lost no time in betraying the secret of Zabella's confession to Razhib Pasha.

The Grand Vizier listened as the priest related the story of the murder, and, after it was finished, he said, with a grim smile: "I believe that thy tale is true; therefore, stay here, and wait for the reward which thou hast merited; it shall not fail thee;" and with that he led the priest to an inner room, where he left him in the guard of Tsoglani.

Razhib Pasha filled the foremost position among the four hundred grand viziers of the Osman realm, and he was one of the exalted two hundred who could not die at the hand of the executioner. His government was renowned for the perfect order he established throughout the whole dominion, and for the skill with which he managed to keep the treasury of the State at all times well filled. As a man, he was notorious for cruelty and the extraordinary ingenuity which he exercised in devising punishments for his victims. It is related of him that, when appointed governor of Egypt, he kept the death sentence of twenty-five infidel boys, leaders of the reigning class of their time, a secret for nearly four years. During all that time he counselled with them, dined with them, and so on, until, at the end of the fourth year, he finally got all twenty-five of them together at his hospitable table; when, after the coffee had been served, he had all their twenty-five heads cut off in one pretty row.

This was the man to whom Makarios, the white priest, had denounced the fair Zabella for the murder of Alnuman Aga. A Christian woman, who had killed his only son—the flower of Turkish youth, the gallant hero of battles, own grandson to the Sultan Mahoud; for Szalika, wife of Razhib Pasha, the mother of Alnuman Aga, was a daughter of the Badishah.

After Razhib Pasha had left Makarios, and re-entered his own room, he at once sent for the Armenian bishop.

When that holy man arrived, the Grand Vizier asked:

"Is confession a sacrament with you?"

"Certainly," replied the bishop.

"What punishment is meet for the priest who betrays the secrets of holy confession?"

"He is condemned to be burned to death," said the bishop.

"Very good," said Razhib Pasha; "here, take my tablets, and note down your sentence."

* * * * *

Zabella's heart was full of despair as she left the white priest, and bent her steps homeward.

Arrived at her house, she told her husband of the threat Makarios had uttered, which involved her death sentence.

"So this pretty head is not yours any more?" said Zariadri, tenderly caressing her soft cheek, and pressing her burning forehead to his bosom; "will you give it to me, then?"

"Take it, and do with it as you will," said she, kissing his caressing hand.

"Then shut your eyes, and open your mouth."

The woman obeyed, wondering; but hardly had she done so, when his fingers were at her teeth, and, with one deft movement, he had extricated one of the white pearls from the upper front row, leaving an ugly gap in its place.

The startled woman had had no time to cry out; the operation was already performed, and, without a word of explanation, the man left the house, leaving her in a state of utter bewilderment.

Zariadri went straight to Razhib Pasha's residence, and asked for admittance.

"What do you want of me, my son?" asked that illustrious statesman, when the Armenian was brought into his presence.

"I have come to give up to justice the murderer of your son."

"You are too late," said the Pasha, "another has preceded you, and I already know who committed the deed."

"Impossible! As nobody else was present at the deed, nobody else can know the name of the doer. You have been deceived, and I am here to convince you of it. Know, then, that I, Zariadri Tafruj, killed Alnuman Aga, your son."

"You! Zariadri Tafruj! You tell me that you slew my son? Are you not afraid of the tortures of purgatory? The liar goes to the flames, as well as the murderer; have you not been taught this lesson?"

"What I have told is the truth."

"It is not the truth. Your wife killed my son; the marks of her teeth are on his neck."

"Of my teeth, oh, Pasha! Look—the marks on your son's neck were made by two entire rows of teeth, such as mine; my wife has a gap in the upper row of her front teeth, as you may see for yourself, if you like. I repeat it, I am the murderer of your son."

"Well, well, Zariadri Tafruj! You are a good husband, but consider whether it is well for a Christian to love his wife more than his soul's salvation. Are you not afraid of Satan and the flames? Possibly you are a sceptic as I am. Our sages tell us that of all human bones the hip-bone alone does not decay, and remains entire until the day of resurrection, when, according to the size and shape of this bone, the whole body will be reconstructed. Now, I have seen many of these bones, and not one of them showed any marks of having been in the fire. Accordingly, I do not believe in a purgatory. You smile? You had better wait until I have finished. I have told you that I do not believe in the flames beyond this world, and as I am resolved that the murderer of my son, if he be a man, shall not escape infernal torment, I have made sure by transporting it to this world. As you know, the moment of death, or, to speak more properly, of dying, is bad enough in itself; yet its agony can be increased or lessened, and its pain and duration are different in individuals. Now, for instance, if the murderer of my son should be a woman, she would certainly be put to death; but as no man delights in torturing a woman she would simply be thrown into the Bosphorus. A few bubbles would rise to the surface of the water, and if, as you Christians will have it, woman also has a soul, those airy bubbles would possibly rise higher than human eye can see. But that would be the end of all. Whereas, if the murderer of my son be a man, he may well curse the day and hour of his birth, for I shall send him to perdition, indeed. He shall take such a journey that the infernal regions beyond shall appear as a place of rest and recreation to him."

"So this pretty head is not yours any more?"

"I know that, and am prepared for the worst," said Zariadri firmly, though his face was very pale.

"No, you are not; but you shall presently understand me better. Go out into the courtyard of my palace, to the square of the Tsoglani. When Sultan Achmed fastened the sign of the half-moon to the cupola of the Aga Sophia—the church of the celestial wisdom—he had the double cross and the ball on which it rested brought to the ground, and carried hither to this place of the Tsoglani at our palace. This double cross and the ball on which it stands are both of thick copper. Ever since the day of my son's death, that ball and cross serve the purpose of a furnace, and are heated till they glow like the live coals inside them. This is the fiery torture which I have prepared for the murderer of my son, if he be a man. With metal chains attached to this terrible structure, his hands shall be manacled, and his body raised up upon the fiery cross. Go out, I say. Look well at the preparations I have made, and then, when you have taken time to consider, return to me, if you dare, and remind me of the confession you have made to me! Until then, I shall forget it."

Zariadri Tafruj went out as the Pasha had commanded him, and strolled slowly down to the square of the Tsoglani, where the cross of the Aga Sophia had, in consequence of its enormous weight, already sunk down deep into the ground whereon it rested.

Only one-half of the huge ball and the second cross rose up high above the lawn.

At this time, the grass was singed off all round, and half-nude assistants of the executioner fed the fire in this giant furnace. Smoke, flakes of ashes, and glowing cinders were flying about, and the atmosphere, heated and thinned by the fire, invested this awful object of Christian faith with a flickering red haze.

Tafruj stood trembling before this wild scene.

Razhib Pasha had not exaggerated, and there was no doubt that the man who was to give up his soul on this glowing cross would suffer all the pains and tortures which pandemonium can inflict. Verily, the unhappy victim of the Grand Vizier's revenge must be a saint, if that endless hour of horrid agony, without the relief of merciful unconsciousness, did not make him blaspheme God and curse mankind and their fiendish inventions.

Long, long did he look on, watching the molten gold drip down, like glittering drops of perspiration, and listening with a sick heart to the clumsy jokes of the brutal hangman's slaves.

One of the fellows asked him if he had no inclination to touch the images of the saints of the fiery ball. He turned away shuddering; and yet it was only the tip of his finger that they asked him to lay on it.

It was late in the evening when he entered the palace again. He was at once received by the Grand Vizier.

"Well, my son, how do you like death in that form?" asked Razhib Pasha.

"It is terrible."

"Are you afraid?"

"I shudder and tremble."

"And what have you come to tell me?"

"I have come to deliver myself up into your hands. Much as I dread this terrible death, I am a man—and I love my wife. Do your worst, Pasha. I am the murderer of Alnuman Aga."

At a motion of the Pasha's hand, a sedan chair was brought into the room.

"Sit down in this chair," said the Pasha to the bewildered Zariadri, "for I am going to keep my promises. First of all, you will find in this chair ten bags of money, which you have earned, for you have given up the murderer of my son into my hands. But, even if he were guilty himself, I cannot harm you, and you need fear no danger from me or anybody. And now let me give you this warning: your wife, whom you love well, and who deserves your love, you shall henceforth keep locked into your own house, so that her dangerous beauty may not cause the death of more youths as Alnuman Aga, my only, my dearly beloved son;" and two tears trickled down the Pasha's cheeks, and rolled into his grey beard.

Tafruj, dumfounded, and hardly in possession of his wits, was borne out by the Tsoglani; and, at every movement of the chair, the silver money in the bags gave a soft, musical clink.

Through gloomy halls and dark corridors they reached the courtyard, and there, vividly rising out of the dark night, stood the spectral apparition of the glowing cross.

In a wide quadrangle round it, a file of soldiers stood, forming a wall, so that from the outside it was impossible to observe what was going on in the interior of the quadrangle.

On this place, the Tsoglani set down the sedan-chair with the frightened Zariadri, who, looking out, beheld the form of an imam, standing on a high pile of stones, just opposite the fiery cross.

Presently the Turkish fifers blew a solemn choral, and the all-significant tune froze the blood of Zariadri's veins, for this was the air which accompanied the doomed criminal to the place of execution.

When the last shrill note had died away, the imam on the stone pile took out a leather scroll from his belt, unfolded it, and, in a monotonous chant, read its contents aloud as follows:

"The great Bishop, the Saint of Mount Ararat, the Messenger of Salvation at Etzmiatzin, has pronounced the following sentence:

"'The priest who betrays the secret of Holy Confession, shall be brought from life to death by fire!'

"This sentence is confirmed and ratified by the Glorious General and Grand Vizier, Razhib Pasha, and is to be carried into instant execution."

The imam nodded, the kettle-drums sounded, and in the next instant, a human form was raised up by chains, and placed upon the fiery cross.

No, not a human form; but a ghastly spectre in white, which, with the writhings of a tortured fiend, rolled on the glittering cross, managing by fearful exertions to jump from it, only to be thrown back again.

Each time the wretched body fell back, a black cloud of smoke rose from it; a hoarse, brutal roaring, as of a wild beast in the utmost pain, accompanied by terrible oaths, cursing Heaven and earth, conjuring up the Evil One, and then again crying out for death and mercy, rent the air.

Gladly would Zariadri Tafruj have escaped witnessing this horrible spectacle, but the door of the sedan-chair was locked on him, and the Tsoglani kept him a prisoner.

To the ghastly end he was compelled to stay, and look at the tortures to which he had resigned himself, and to which he would have been delivered if Razhib Pasha had not loved justice as he, Zariadri Tafruj, loved his wife.

When at last the mangled body of Makarios, the white priest, had ceased to writhe, when the beastly howls had died away on the lips, the vivid flames broke forth between them, enveloping and consuming the spectral form, the sedan-chair, with Zariadri Tafruj, was taken up again by its bearers, and conveyed to his own house, where he and his ten bags of money were put into safe care and custody of the happy Zabella.

Thus did Razhib Pasha, of whom Turkish historians proclaim that he was insrani kamil—a perfect man—deal out justice.

* * * * *

On the next day Razhib Pasha issued the decree which, under the pain of death, ordered all Turkish women, without distinction of rank, wealth, or position, to wear the feredshe—that ugly garment which hides all beauty of form and face, and sheathes the wearer like a wooden casing. And ever since, all the bewitching finery of Turkish fashion—the embroidered slipper, the graceful scarf, the transparent veil, etc.—are, under pain of death, strictly confined to the interior of the house.

Not that the women have not tried to ridicule the decree, and show their opposition.

On the very day of the proclamation, the women of fashion appeared on their favourite promenade—the bank of the Bosphorus—clad in their utmost enchanting garments, showing off their own beauty and the splendour of their attire.

The lovely pero, Sheytan Emisnezy, was foremost among them, and a new and ingenious invention of hers—to use the glow-worm of Mount Hasmus to illuminate her toilet—drew a train of admirers to her elbow, and struck envy to the hearts of the other women.

"Go home, my beauty; do not wait for the meuzzin to sing out the evening," said Pelvem Aga, the giant leader of the Imperial guards, to the fair Siren, as she playfully slapped his hand with her peacock-fan, and made a trumpet of a copy of the Sultan's decree, which he had showed her as warning.

What do you think of "The Rajah's Treasure" in the July "Pearson's."

But she laughed at the "pain of death," and waited for the evening to show her illuminated dress to the greatest advantage; and like her did all the other idle, frivolous, and vain women mock at the awful threat, and so did the throng of their foolish admirers.

But when the meuzzin's song had announced the hour of night, and Sheytan Emisnezy again stood before Pelvem Aga, the guard, showing him her marble shoulders, that giant caught her up at her gridle, and with a powerful effort hurled her into the Bosphorus, so that, as Tzi, the historian, says, the blue waves of the sea clad her beauteous body.

This was the signal for the guards to set to work, and each of them caught one of the crying, frightened, silly women, and hurled her into the sea. Thus three hundred young, fair, and fashionable women met with sudden and terrible death.

Since that night no Turkish woman appears in the street without the feredshe.

And this is the story of that garment.

THE HALF-BREED.

An Out-of-the-Way Romance.

"CLAVERING—Herbert Clavering."

Carhart put out a hand, with a rush of incoherent words. Of all men, to find Clavering here!

Clavering gave him but little opportunity to put questions. His surprise had been less demonstrative than his friend's; but a twitching of the muscles of the mouth denoted that this meeting had not quite left him unaffected. He began to question Carhart himself—rapidly, a little nervously, scarce waiting for his replies. He was travelling? He had come with a view to making some study of the Indian settlement still taking up the farther slope of the mountain? A sketching tour? And so he still kept these things up?

"You are my guest for to-night, whatever your plans. In any case, those clouds bode no good to travellers in these wilds. I can't give you hotel fare. But, perhaps, you will put up with something plainer for the sake of old friendship and old days."

As he spoke, Carhart was realising the full change that had befallen the man who once—and that but a few years before—appeared so placid amid the great ranks of active strugglers, and so endowed for the brilliant work and the glittering results of life, that his rapid climb to wordly eminence was accounted one of the inevitable sequence. Alas for the rock against which this promising career had shivered almost at its outset! But why desert? That was what Clavering had done. Better, Carhart thought, as he looked at him, have made an attempt to float the ship anew to weather the gale.

With the life of the natives, he had adopted their mode of dress and something of their gait and manner. This seemed to Carhart to have been done out of a sort of bravado—as a species of flaunting assurance that he was amply content with the changed conditions of existence he had chosen. He had aged in these five years. There were on his face bitter lines and hard lines, that silently spoke the disappointment he would have doggedly denied. Carhart saw that however much he might regret the rash step which had led him to leave his native England and the world, and bury himself in these mountain wilds, he would never open his lips in confession of his mistake.

The black cloud had rolled downward, blotting the further peaks from sight, and in the deepening purple light that filled the air, the small loghouse stood out in sharpened relief beside its patches of stunted pines, vividly green.

Carhart dismounted from his horse and followed Clavering across the threshold with some singular sensations. The latter caught the fleeting expression on his face.

"You don't get over your surprise at finding one at this remote distance from your vaunted civilisation."

"Of course I am surprised. You left no tracks behind you."

"My determination to break with all your sophistication was clearly enough announced."

"Yes, I knew the life you meant to lead. Nevertheless I was surprised to find you here."

"You did not believe I would carry out my resolve?"

laughed Clavering shortly. "You see that you were mistaken."

The rain had come on in a sudden rush of wind that chased whirling leaves wildly before it. The taller pines bent and swayed; it had grown sombrely dark in the bare room.

Clavering—a powerful figure in high boots, loose flannel shirt, short jacket—stood an instant in the doorway, and looked out at the fierce conflict of the unchained elements. Then he turned and hung up his soft, wide-brimmed hat against the wall.

"As I told you before, you will have to put up with plain fare." Then Carhart became aware of the entrance of a young girl into the room. She was slim and supple as a willow bough as she moved, making deft preparations for the simple meal, with the smooth, sliding, grave step of the aboriginal race—the races that live close to the soil. Her straight black hair was bound up into heavy hanging braids. Her shy eyes looked out from under straight, black brows. She was very light—almost white.

Carhart had never believed in beautiful half-breeds. His eyes fastened themselves upon her until he felt their persistence an impertinence. His fingers itched to be at pencils and brushes and canvas.

When the storm passed away, it left an uneasy, shifting mass of torn clouds. A watery moon looked out in fitful gleams. Already the clayey soil was sucking up the moisture rapidly.

The two men stayed in the faintly illuminated darkness before the door. The short pipe in Herbert Clavering's bearded lips gave out at intervals a throbbing spark of pale red light.

There was a long silence. It was fraught, for Carhart, with anxious self-questionings, with hesitation. Finally he spoke.

"I shall be going on to-morrow morning, Clavering, and our meeting again is, I suppose, as things are, at least always a doubtful matter. So I have decided to touch upon a topic which it is possible you may prefer not to have broached. Whatever you may think of what may seem my interference, I think that I mean well. Leonora Ashley's husband has been dead two months. Did you know it?"

For an instant it was so still that the rasping of a cricket near by seemed to fill the whole night. Then—

"No, I did not know it," said Clavering. His tones were husky, strained. He controlled himself. But it had been a shock—it had been a shock!

Again there was a silence. At last, conscious of the tumult going on in the breast of the man beside him, Carhart could bear it no longer.

"I always thought you made a mistake—nay, more, that you committed a terrible folly, Clavering, five years ago!" he cried, all the latent irritation hot within him, and bred by the wantonness of his sacrifice of a brilliant life, breaking forth.

A groan burst from Clavering's lips.

"Sudden financial ruin had overtaken me; and—well, you know what she was to me, Carhart!"

"Yes, I know that marriage and your money troubles together made you desert. For it was deserting. The place for a man like you is in the thick of the fight! What matter that a financial break-up had come to you! There was that in you which would have forced Fortune's favour anew. As for the other trouble—we are men, not children, Clavering!"

Suddenly, fiercely Clavering turned upon him.

"Why do you say all this now? Would you have me now go back to the thick of the fight, as you call it?"

"Why not? What right have you to hang back?"

Clavering gave a caustic laugh.

"I could tell you that the stragglers who have that much philosophy are doing the great army of strugglers, all intent on getting to the top, the most inestimable kindness! But I prefer to ask you what you think I could do in the centres of active life? I—who am out of time and touch with all men and things?"

"You have lost five invaluable years—yes. But to say that your mistake is irrevocable is an absurdity."

And then Carhart started, paused, forgetting his arguments, the hard-headed man of the world in him routed by a rushing forth of artist's soul that constituted the other side of his dual nature.

There a few feet away near the corner of the house, was that exquisite girl again. He was about to speak, to ask some question concerning her, when the man of the world came to the front anew, he said nothing.

The last impression he carried away with him from the log-house the next morning was that of the girl hanging back within the door as they rode off. Clavering accompanied him part of the way towards the Reservation. Her eyes followed them with a silent question; it seemed almost to Clavering, imaginative as he was, with a silent doubt, a silent anguish.

It was two weeks later, and Carhart was preparing to draw his sketching tour to an end. Looking up suddenly from his breakfast, he saw Clavering enter the inn, which here, fifteen miles from the Reservation, was dignified with the name of a hotel.

Carhart felt this coming significant. Had he any lingering doubts they were immediately dispelled.

"When do you start?" said Clavering. "I am going back with you."

There was a pause; then Carhart stretched out his hand across the table in silence.

* * * * *

The sun rose and set over the mountain. The days wore away. Flaring touches of crimson began to show against the cool green of the leaves.

At the log-house, amid the stunted pines, a silent figure went in and out. The girl shed no tears. He was gone. She had known always that some day it would be so. More than ever she had known it when that friend of his had come, the friend who belonged to the great world beyond the Reservation, beyond the mountain, of which she had learned at the mission school.

For she had been to the mission school, and she fell to trembling a little when she thought of the missionary—a gaunt, pale man with a holy fire in his eyes—who had baptised her. Ah, how good he had been! He had prayed over her, and adjured her steadfastly to walk with Christ.

She cowered on the doorstep, her slender hands against her cheeks.

Two strangers rode leisurely up in the mellow September afternoon. They talked lazily, their voices drifting towards her.

"No, marriages among whites and half-breeds are not common in this section. It would perhaps be better if they were."

The girl rose and went into the house. A fire of oak logs had been burning on the hearth. She sat down beside it, her arms clasped about her knees, her hair falling forward over her face. The afternoon wore slowly away. Through the glistening needles of the pine trees shafts of nebulous golden light began to stream. Near her was a large chest. She lifted the lid and slowly, reverently, took certain objects from it and laid them on the bed.

They were things he—Herbert Clavering—had given her. There were the fine little handkerchiefs marked with her name—"Annie," the name they had called her when she had been baptised at the mission chapel; and the yards of some soft light muslin she had never made up; and a pair of little shoes such as the women in town wore; and the trinkets he had said made her look like a young Eastern princess.

To her cheeks there had come a faint rose-like colour. Her eyes were like still water, in which the reflection of a star had sunk. She began to deck herself with the things she had taken from the chest. She was clothing herself in a strange freak of fancy for a mystic—a mythical marriage. If he and she were to be married this evening—married as once she had seen two people at the mission chapel, would she look like this? A small, blurred mirror threw back to her a picture she did not know. She had wound the yards of soft muslin about her body; she placed the trinkets about her neck and in her ears.

Athwart the long bar of sunlight that lay from the threshold of the open door across the floor a shadow had fallen. Annie looked up; she looked into his eyes—into the eyes of Herbert Clavering. They stood a moment thus—he motionless, she holding back with both hands the braids of her wavy hair. Then he spoke:

"Annie, I have come back."

She said nothing; she only trembled.

"Annie, I have come back to marry you."

Then only she gave a little, low cry.

"I am not worthy," she said.

His brow darkened.

"Never dare to say that. I thought I could go from you, Annie. I tried to. I meant to. I loved a woman once, and I heard four weeks ago that she was free. I thought to go back to her—to win her now if I could. But I was mistaken in my own heart. That love was dead. I did not see her. I came back to you, Annie. I will repair the wrong."

Herbert Clavering came nearer. He put out his hand and touched the geegaws on her arms.

"Take these things off. You shall have better than those. What were you doing arrayed in them? We won't live here, Annie. When we are married we will go elsewhere. I shall never belong quite to the active world again. But I can do better than this. There must be a new life. Kiss me, my wild flower."

* * * * *

In the course of a few weeks Carhart received a letter over which he sat long pensive.

"Well, who shall say it was not better so?" he murmured at last. "She was beautiful. Clavering was never like any other man. He will seek some new frontier town and make himself a power yet, perhaps. What eyes she had! Ah! one can never get those effects on canvas!"

And the artist sighed.

Told at the Club.

Yes, I have been in America. A year or so ago I had occasion to make the trip, primarily with the idea of studying the tariff laws of the United States, a subject in which I was much interested, in view of my becoming a probable candidate for an English constituency, and, secondly, because I wanted a holiday after successfully carrying through a very long and arduous law case, which has become world-famous. Among other places I visited were the Yosemite Valley and San Francisco, and, while mixing with Chinamen, Mexican "greasers," and miners, I became desirous of obtaining a gold nugget in quartz. A stranger had, however, little chance of securing such a thing at a fair price, and after several attempts at dealing, I intrusted the commission to the clerk at the hotel at which I was staying, the Mercede Il Capitaine. We have no idea in England of the manifold duties and infinite capacity of the American hotel clerk; nothing seems impossible for them to obtain, no task too difficult for them to perform—if they are well paid for it.

My clerk in due course found me a nugget, for which I paid him £120, and placing it in a neat cardboard box which I deposited in my dressing bag, I journeyed back to New York.

Arriving there, I proceeded to the Hotel Brunswick, and again re-questioning the hotel clerk, I deposited with him the cardboard box containing the nugget.

At the back of the desk in the hotel office stands the large iron safe in which the hotel clerk places any articles of value deposited with him by visitors to the hotel, and here I saw my cardboard box put away.

A stay of a few days was all I made prior to returning in the Alaska, and I remember that on the day she sailed I was somehow very much behindhand, and left the Brunswick in a great hurry. So much so that I forgot my nugget, and it was not until I was several streets away that I recollected it. I tore back, and the clerk opened the safe and handed me a box. Thanking him, I once more started off.

I will draw a veil over my passage home. It was winter, the voyage was very rough, and I was very ill. I hardly ever left my berth, and was entirely oblivious as to what happened to my belongings, which were scattered about all over the floor of my cabin. On my arrival at Liverpool, being still very weak, I scrambled them all together, and so they remained until I arrived at my chambers.

When I reached home, one of the first of a heap of telegrams and letters waiting for me that caught my eye was a cablegram. It was from the proprietor of the Hotel Brunswick in New York, and ran as follows: "Have given you wrong box. Do not part with it except as against your gold quartz."

This did not trouble me very much, and I only reviled the stupidity of the hotel clerk in giving me someone else's property, thinking of the trouble I should probably have in getting my own box and nugget in exchange for the box I had. Indeed, so little did I think of it that after a casual search for the box had ended unsuccessfully, owing to the mixed state in which my things were, thanks to the pitching of the Alaska, I postponed a further examination for a day or two.

A thorough overhauling ended in its discovery among some soiled linen, where it had probably fallen during the voyage. The box was almost identical with mine, but how different were the contents! I am no judge of precious stones, but I don't think I ever saw so magnificent a collection of unset pearls, diamonds, rubies, and emeralds all jumbled together in this wretched box, barely strong enough, one would have thought, to have held a dozen collars together. I am a very cautious individual, and my first thought was to discover the worth of what struck even an ignoramus on the subject, like myself, as being exceedingly valuable.

I closed up the box again and took it to an old established jeweller in Bond Street, who confirmed my conjecture as to the jewels being exceedingly valuable. He made a schedule of the contents, and roughly valued them at forty thousand pounds. Then, with overcaution, I took the box, this time inclosed in a cash-box, to my bankers and left it with them.

My next step was to cable to the manager of the Brunswick, thus: "Have box safe; cable particulars," and waited events. In two days the reply came: "Morgan, owner of property, left by Servia. Do not part with box except against your nugget."

I would here ask you to remark the repetition of the instructions not to part with the property of this man, Morgan, until he handed over my box and the gold quartz. There was probably nothing in it, but it struck me as peculiar, and I again cabled to the Brunswick for more information. The answer came shortly and brusquely: "Deliver property to holder of your nugget."

I must confess that my cautious nature rebelled against delivering up such valuable articles to an unknown person, even though authorised to do so by such a respectable person as the landlord of the hotel, who, judging by his last cable, was evidently angry at my pertinacity.

On the arrival of the Servia at Queenstown the following Saturday, I received a telegram signed Morgan, informing me that he would be at my chambers the following Monday. Very reluctantly I withdrew the box from my bank, and bringing it home, had a last look at the gems. I had by now almost begun to look upon them as mine, and it was with a sigh that I returned them to their inclosure.

Punctually to his appointment did my visitor arrive, and my servant handed me a card, inscribed: "R. Morgan, Kansas City, U.S.A."

Morgan himself was an ordinary looking man, not undistinguishable from a score of other Americans I had seen in the bar at the Brunswick. He was fairly well dressed and possessed of easy manners. He handed me a note from the proprietor of the Brunswick, briefly introducing him as the owner of the property, and a dealer in precious stones, who brought my gold nugget against which I was to deliver his precious box. This seemed all right, and there was no doubt about my nugget, which he took out of the box and showed me. There seemed nothing left for me to do but to hand him the jewels, and yet, somehow, for the life of me, I could not prevail on myself to do so. I made the excuse that the stones were all safe at my banker's, and if he would call in a couple of days I should be happy to hand him his property.

He seemed somewhat surprised, and not a little vexed, which, perhaps, under the circumstances was natural, and before he left impressed upon me the necessity of his property being handed over when next he came.

After he had gone, I admit that I felt I had behaved somewhat foolishly. Everything seemed perfectly straightforward, and I had erred on the side of over-caution.

Morgan came punctually again, but this time he was less patient, and more fidgety than before, and evidently bore with my chatting with difficulty. Making an excuse, I left the room and quietly considered the matter, finally arriving at the conclusion that I had no excuse for not returning the property. This I at last proceeded to do, offering him as well some refreshment which he declined, politely, but firmly.

He was all through somewhat reticent, and surprised me by taking no trouble to verify the schedule of the stones, but one thing which puzzled me he easily explained. I could not understand why property of such value was carried in an ordinary cardboard box, a fit covering for a German toy or puzzle, but scarcely suitable for forty thousand pounds' worth of uncut stones. At my mention of their value his eyes certainly glistened, but his explanation was simple; there is an abnormally high duty on diamonds and precious stones imported into America, and dealers who go there often have to resort to all sorts of subterfuges to hoodwink the Customs officers. A cardboard box would be far more likely to escape the lynx-eyed searchers than a strong box. Finally we parted with every expression of goodwill, mutually regretting that we should both have incurred so much trouble through the stupid mistake of a hotel clerk.

It was the very next morning that I received another cable inquiring: "Do you know what is contained in Morgan's box?"

To this I replied as briefly as possible, and in the very smallest space of time imaginable came this dispatch: "Ten thousand dollars reward has been offered for his apprehension."

Scotland Yard had been duly informed, I learnt, and I ascertained, moreover, the full particulars of the case. Morgan had murdered and robbed a Maiden Lane jeweller, who had been his compagnon de voyage, and for weeks the New York police had been looking for him.

Inside of twenty-four hours the so-called Morgan was arrested at an obscure hotel in the East-end, and in due time was extradited.

What is, however, the curious part of the story is that the so-called Morgan with very little difficulty proved upon his trial that he was not the compagnon de voyage of the Maiden Lane jeweller and never saw him. Moreover, the Brunswick clerk swore positively that he was not the man he knew as Morgan, and that it was not he that deposited the box of gems in his keeping.

In consequence of this, the fellow was acquitted of the charge brought against him, and I believe the matter remains a mystery to the New York police to this day.

My own theory is that the accused man, while not the murderer of the jeweller, was a murderer, nevertheless, and that Morgan suffered the fate that he had inflicted upon the original owner of the gems.

I argue that when the real Morgan discovered that he had been left with the wrong box, he made a tremendous fuss in the bar of the Brunswick, and, no doubt, any number of strangers heard the facts, and even witnessed the writing and dispatch of the cable to me. Morgan was then watched, and when murdered, the letter of introduction, his card-case and papers, and, above all, the box containing the nugget, were taken from his body.

PAUPER BLUE BLOOD.

SUMMARY.

Georgina Pluff is a governess in the employ of the Ravenscrofts. Her charge is Eva, daughter of Sir Reginald and Lady Ravenscroft. Sefton, the only son, is engaged to Lady Norah Cannington, whose father, hearing on good authority of Sir Reginald's impending ruin, compels his daughter to write a letter to Sefton, saying that the engagement must be broken off. Before the financial crash arrives, Sir Reginald commits suicide in his own grounds, and Sefton's cup of bitterness is filled by the arrival of Lady Norah's letter.

CHAPTER IV.

The Sins of the Father.

Surely in the whole world there could not have been a sadder home than Ravenscroft Park. Not only had death lowered the blinds and darkened the doors, but death self-inflicted, and the utterly unexpected loss of wealth accompanying it.

Sefton had not torn the heartless note from Lady Norah, and flung it aside in disgust, he was too numb and petrified for anger. He folded it with trembling fingers, and placed it against his heart, feeling that everything in life had ended for him, the worst had come, he was broken—crushed—done for. It mattered not now what became of him, he felt reckless, desperate. Norah loved him no more—Norah was false. She would smile into other eyes, other lips would press the soft, sweet cheek. She would be the wife of another man. Oh! hateful thought, unbearable, galling. But for his great reverence and affection for his mother, and the memory of those haunting words: "Guard well the good old name," he would gladly have sought the gloomy spot on which his father died, and followed that parent's example.

Instead, he curbed the frantic longing, replaced mechanically his signet ring on his finger, and opened letters of condolence without grasping their meaning. It was always another ending, a different signature, he saw photographed in words of flame above the actual writing.

"Yours no longer,

"Norah Cannington."

Miss Pluff kept her room till after Sir Reginald's body had been laid in the ground, then she demanded a private interview with his son.

The request astonished him, for he had hoped she would leave quietly without showing her face again, and the idea of talking to her was distasteful to Sefton.

However, he came at her bidding, thinking to save his mother unpleasantness, and intending to request her to leave without bidding Lady Ravenscroft good-bye.

He found Miss Pluff standing in a defiant attitude in the middle of the room, gowned in black, her face strikingly pale and altered, her hair dressed becomingly, her hands clasped.

She looked straight into his eyes without wavering, advanced a step, then addressed him in a low, determined voice:

"I want to speak to you," she said, "seriously, on a very important matter."

Sefton bowed his head. He did not wish her the conventional "Good-morning."

"First of all, let me tell you how deeply I feel with you for the great calamity that has fallen upon this house."

He held up his hand.

"I have no need of sympathy from you."

His tone was hard, he had set his face like a flint, and no sign or ordinary courtesy betrayed itself. A faint flush crept into the governess's cheeks.

"Very well," she retorted, drawing herself up. "Perhaps it may surprise you to hear that Sir Reginald had taken me entirely into his confidence. While you were all living on in blissful ignorance, I knew that ruin was impending, but my counsel and advice were useless, I could only comfort and console. I have all Sir Reginald's secrets, I know the reason of his suicide, with its accompanying disgrace. Oh! yes, you would hush it up and keep it from the world. You are proud, you Ravenscrofts, but even your high standard must fall beneath the glaring light which I could throw on your father's past! Listen," and she glanced round as if the very walls had ears, then stealing to his side, with the strange slouching step that Lady Norah had remarked upon, she whispered something in his ear.

The young baronet started, his face paled, in his excitement he seized her shoulder, and stared down into her eyes.

"You know that!" he muttered fiercely.

"Yes, and more."

"Then for the sake of the woman you have wronged; whose husband you would have stolen; for the sake of the little girl he loved; in respect for the dead; in pity for the living; never let it pass your lips again."

Miss Pluff's strange face smiled, yet at the same time the expression was so intensely sad, that even Sefton marvelled at it.

"You—you want a bribe?" he asked. "Money?"

She shook her head.

"Oh! no. I have not forgotten the loss of your fortune. But I still remember that the name of Ravenscroft is dear to me—that the blue blood, paupered though it be, runs in your veins. I care not for wealth, but I want position. Give me this as the price of my silence, or, as there is a heaven above, your father's memory shall be disgraced; his name dragged through the mire!"

She spoke vehemently; the fires of Hell seemed alight in her eyes, the gaunt form swayed and quivered, while her hands clung to Sefton's arms, as a vampire clutching its victim.

"What do you mean?" he gasped, too thunderstruck to push her from him.

"Mean!" she laughed wildly; "that I demand marriage with you, Sir Sefton, that you will have to make me Lady Ravenscroft to save the family honour!"

He gazed at her like one demented—the power of speech fled. Her long fingers were still seizing his sleeve.

"See," she whispered, "that will explain all. Who will question my despair at witnessing the shocking scene of my lover's father, shot dead in his own grounds. Was it not natural, that being hysterical, I lost my head, and mingled my grief with his?"

As Sefton listened, he sifted the complicated situation in his mind with sudden, calm deliberation. The honour of the Ravenscrofts lay in the hands of Georgina Pluff. A great, a tremendous, sacrifice on his part alone could save it. His life was nothing to him now, but the name was everything. Norah had given him up, she cared no longer. His love had been heedlessly cast aside, henceforth all natural affection in him was dead, except the love he bore his mother. To save her husband's memory from a slur, to obey his father's last command, surely this must bring some faint compensation, some atom of relief to his over-wrought and strained senses. Besides which, pique crept in, the thought of the false and heartless Lady Norah. Why should she guess his sufferings?

"Have you nothing more to say?"

He turned to the woman, and glanced at her weird, magnetic smile. It filled his soul with repugnance.

"Is there no other way?"

"None. Your wife, or your enemy? Which is it to be?"

"Give me time to consider."

"This is the time," she answered. "Leave me without your promise, and I go from your house to-day, this very hour, and Sir Reginald's secrets go with me. The society papers are always glad of information regarding the blue blood of England. Make me one of yourselves, and I will guard your family secrets as my own life. Sefton, you cannot refuse!"

A terrible crisis was at hand. The man was young, and sorely tried, shaken by recent storms, reckless and bewildered.

The necessity for this sacrifice came almost as a relief. He heaved a deep sigh and thrust her from him.

"I promise," he muttered. "You ask a long price—a life-time. Do you realise what it means?"

"Perfectly."

A strange betrothal, truly! The woman trembling and triumphant, the man cold, with a terribly passive expression in his white face, turning away without another word from his newly-affianced wife.

"Have you nothing more to say?" she asked as he reached the door.

He glanced back.

"No."

"Your word is your bond, Sefton. I can trust it."

The Christian name jarred on him from her lips. It seemed impertinent and unnecessary at that moment.

"Yes, you may rely on my promise, Miss Pluff. It is the old story—the sins of the fathers upon the children!"

Then he closed the door softly after him and walked dizzily down the passage.

"I have made a bargain with a female fiend," he muttered. "I have sold myself to the Devil."

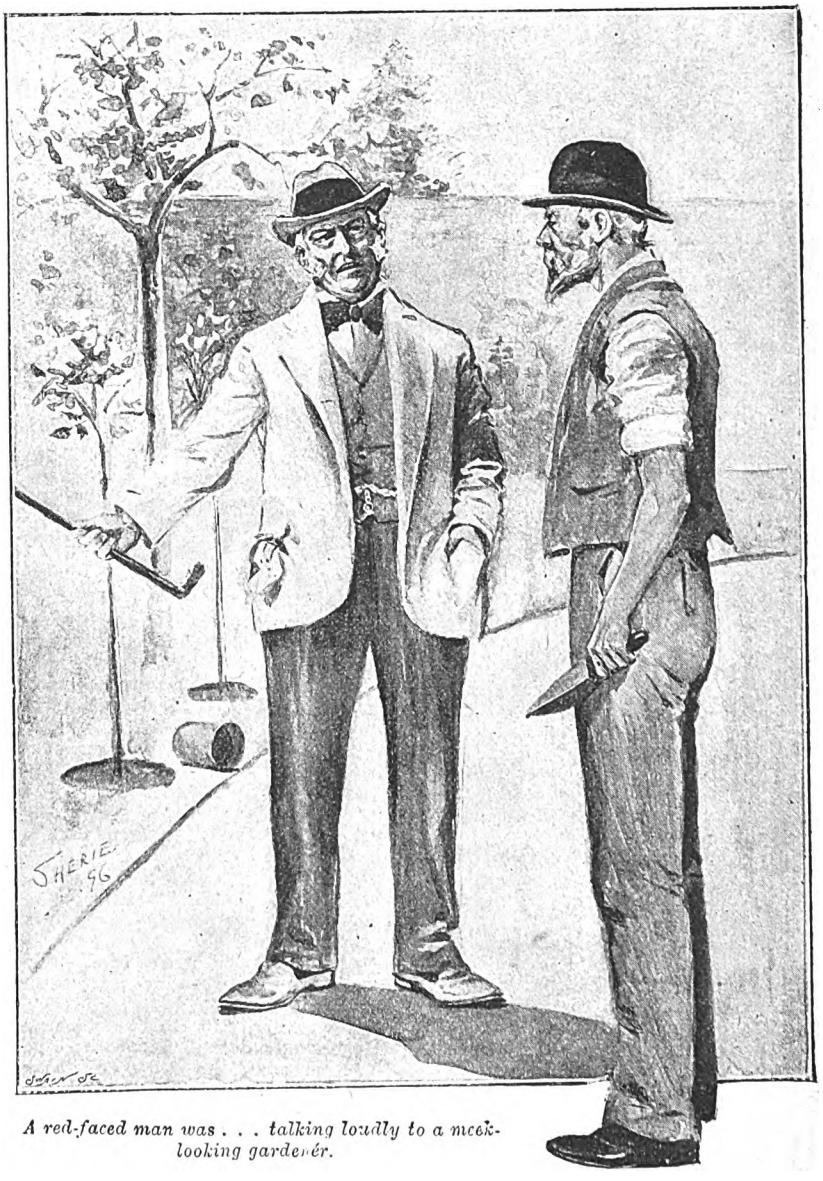
This tragic idea appealed to his morbid feelings as he remembered Lady Norah's words: "I have a presentiment about that woman—something evil."

It was Lady Norah who had driven him to destruction; he laid the wreck of his life at her door.

How could he guess at that very moment she, too, prayed for death in the midst of a merry house party at Worboise Manor? When her friends remarked on her depression she merely said: "The Ravenscrofts are in trouble. I knew them so well. I was thinking of that shocking suicide."

One or two whispered that she had broken the son's heart, and was troubled for once by remorse, but no one knew the truth. The world seldom gets to the bottom of anything, and what it sees on the surface is very far from the mark.

"Young Sefton Ravenscroft was one of Norah's latest victims," said a light-hearted girl to a hard-hearted youth; "she numbers him now among the slain. Norah has no feeling, and she left off her conscience with pinafores. Yet even then it was a trial to keep it clean."



A red-faced man was . . . talking loudly to a meek-looking gardener.

But what of Miss Pluff in her hour of victory, left as she was, mistress of the situation?

She stood listening to Sefton's retreating footsteps like a creature turned to stone, though a thousand thoughts darted through her brain. Was it possible that she had ever loved? Could this pitiless erring woman have cherished a tender affection, remembered a good day in the dark years that were gone? Once as a little child she recollected vaguely that someone had been kind, a dying man on a bed, she called him "father." He kissed her, and held her to his heart, whispering: "Be good, Georgie." Just three words that meant to her then "don't get into bad tempers, and scratch your nurse."

Then came a long and loveless blank till the passionate devotion for Sir Reginald had poisoned all that was pure in her nature, and cast her back upon the world raging against cruel crushing fate.

Now the current changed again into swift exciting waters. She was to be Lady Ravenscroft, one of a select circle, nearly related to some of the highest families, and pose as the sweet young wife who had taken pity on Sir Sefton in his poverty. Visions of the great people who would receive her, the grand houses at which she would visit stirred her blood.

These bracing fancies brought back the warm flow of life to her veins.

She looked only on the side that pleased her imagination.

Georgina Pluff had no fear, she would desecrate her womanhood without a sigh, violate sacred matrimony, and holy motherhood.

She neither flinched nor wavered as she turned over in her mind the recent scene with the man she had claimed for her husband.

"Would he grow in time to regard her tenderly?" she asked herself. "Could the kiss of emotion ever pass from his lips to hers?"

Candidly she confessed that it was not only unlikely, but, under the circumstances, practically impossible.

"Henceforth, good-bye, romance," cried Georgina, dashing a burning tear from her eye, and laughing harshly.

She sank into a low chair, rested her elbows on her knees, and pressed her sharp chin upon her knuckles.

"Lady Ravenscroft, Georgina, that is your future name and title! He is yours! You have played your cards well."

"Sefton Ravenscroft to Georgina Pluff." She fancied she read the announcement in the Times. It sent a wave of joy through her system, a smile to her narrow lips.

CHAPTER V.

The New Lady Ravenscroft.

A red-faced man was standing by a flower-bed, pointing with a thick stick, and talking loudly to a meek-looking gardener.

"What's the good," he thundered, "of keeping four of you chaps loafing round this garden, if you can't so much as weed? You don't think I'm going to pay you to play, do you? No doubt it's very nice sitting and smoking in the arbour, but I've got six acres of ground round my house, you'll be pleased to remember, and there are plenty of men out of employment in Clapham, who would be glad to step into your shoes."

Having delivered this tirade, he struck the offending weeds with his stick, and turned away towards the house.

John Pluff was a retired grocer; he gave up a thriving business in Sydenham, when his father, an old miner, died and left him an unexpected fortune.

A widower and childless, he settled down in a large house at Clapham, and was on the look-out for a second wife.

He had no relations except a half-starved nephew, whom he refused to help, for having committed the dire offence of marrying a penniless street singer at the age of seventeen, and Georgina, the child of his cousin, Gabriel Pluff, an orphan, earning her living as a governess.

Georgina had always hated John Pluff's vulgarity. The grocer's shop stuck in her throat—she could not gulp it down. Besides, she felt that he despised her for her poverty and had no pity for her orphanhood. They never corresponded, and it was with intense surprise that he had opened a letter announcing her engagement to Sir Sefton Ravenscroft.

The news swelled his heart with vaulting pride, his eyes rolled in their fat rims, he smacked his knee with his broad palm. Snobbish visions floated through John Pluff's uneducated brain. He heard himself saying to his friends in trade: "My cousin, Lady Ravenscroft," watching for the effect of the words exultantly. She should be his dear, adopted daughter, his favourite little Georgie! So he wrote a long effusion, giving her an open invitation to come to Queen's Gate House, his residence at Clapham, and asking her what gift would be most acceptable in her new position. Georgina promptly replied, "a cheque," and John Pluff instantly forwarded £1,000 for "my lady's trousseau."

He was thinking of Georgina as he stumped round his six acres and grumbled at the gardeners.

A hansom cab drove through the gates. He watched it with a sense of irritation.

"I know it's that pushing widow, Mrs. Pilpack, again," he muttered to himself. "She has an eye to my money-bags, the ugly old hag. If I marry, it will be youth and beauty my coin shall purchase, not dyed locks and painted lips."

A servant in livery came hurrying across the lawn.

"Well, well. Who's after me now?" asked Mr. Pluff irritably, having caught sight of a skirt passing through the doorway.

"Lady Ravenscroft, sir."

"Lady Ravenscroft!"

His eyes dilated, then rubbing his hands together and chuckling, he strutted across the lawn.

"I hope you showed her into my largest drawing-room," he said, as the servant followed him.

"Yes, sir."

"My dearest Georgina!" cried Mr. Pluff, kissing the new Lady Ravenscroft on both cheeks, "at last I hold you in my arms, my sweet, beautiful girl!"

She freed herself from his embrace, and smiled faintly.

"How is it you never asked your devoted old cousin to the wedding? Eh, Georgie?" chucking her under the chin.

"Simply because we were married at a registry office, discarding ceremony and pomp. My husband and his family have not yet fully recovered from the shock of poor Sir Reginald's death, though, of course, their grief cannot last for ever, and," with rather a strained laugh, "we are cheering up!"

"Well, I congratulate you. Who would have thought you'd have been booked by a baronet? A clever girl, as sharp as they make 'em. You must give me your 'usband's pedigree. I want to learn it off by heart. It's something to be related to the aristocracy, and not to be despised. It gives you a standing in Society. But you look pinched and pale, Georgina. Here, Edward, bring my lady a glass of wine."

"No, thanks, Cousin John, tea, if you don't mind, and then when there are no servants within earshot, I should be glad of a little quiet conversation with you on family matters."

"My dearest Georgina!"

Mr. Pluff drew his chair forward, and surveyed her approvingly.

"That's a very 'andsome gown!" he said. "Georgina, your figure's improved."

"I have to thank you for a decent trousseau, and a nice little sum of money in hand," she replied; "your cheque was a Godsend."

"Don't mention it, my dear. I thought a 'thou' might come in handy, and it's nothing to me," with an airy wave of his hand, and a widening of his chest. "Now here's a cup of the finest brew you could get in the country. Drink it down 'ot, and see if you don't feel twice as fit in a jiffy."

Georgina obeyed. His vulgarity was appalling, but she thought of his fortune, and murmured a compliment on the tea.

"Of course, as you know, I always have everything of the best."

He folded his hands, and ran through the wines in his cellar—their merit and price. "I bought up all Lord D——'s old port after his death. He left his widow a pauper, and she's in one of them Royal workhouses. That is the worst of some of these ancient families, they are as poor as Church mice, and as proud as peacocks."

"No wonder," put in Lady Ravenscroft, "they have their blue blood."

"Yes, and hard cash won't buy that," he replied solemnly. "But I never thought I should see a 'Pluff' with an 'andle to her name. But come, you were going to talk over your private affairs."

Georgina replaced her cup on the silver tray, and drew down her veil again.

"I suppose you know that the Ravenscrofts lost the greater bulk of their fortune at Sir Reginald's death."

"Yes, I gathered as much from the papers."

"I could not bear for Sefton to part with the old family place, such a noble house, with miles of land, an estate that has been handed down from generation to generation from time immemorial. So sooner than put Ravenscroft Park on the market, we decided to retrench, and scrape along as best we could on his small income. Already I am beginning to see the folly of being over-housed and under-servanted, the misery of beholding the beautiful grounds ill-kept, the loneliness of rooms uninhabited. The grass is let out, except just what my husband requires for his animals. Poor boy! He is trying to make a little extra money by training young horses, breaking them in himself, and selling them at a profit. He is the most reckless rider imaginable. I always expect to hear he has broken his neck."

He placed his bulgy form beside her.

"Dear!, dear!" ejaculated Mr. Pluff.

"Oh! my life is not all a bed of roses. I have countless anxieties. Probably, if we could bring ourselves to live in a small house, in some quiet unostentatious suburb, we should be happier in the long run. But Ravenscroft in its beauty and dignity shall rot and decay before my eyes, its ancestral towers fall about my head, sooner than pass into alien hands, to parvenu purchasers."

She rose with a tragic gesture that impressed John Pluff deeply.

"I can't give it up," she continued. "I must cling to it, keep it, for Sefton's heir. Think, Cousin John, if a son should ever crown our married bliss, what it would mean to him—the future baronet—to find that his estates had been sold, his rightful inheritance given up to others."

The retired grocer warmed to the subject, catching Georgina's enthusiasm.

"Stick to the old place like gum, my girl. You've caught the true spirit of the aristocrat, and if you ever let Ravenscroft Park slip through your fingers, well, you won't be a Pluff. We have no blue blood in our veins, worse luck, still we've noble instincts to appreciate it, and we hang on to a good thing when we have it."

"Besides," continued Georgina warily, "fortunes change, and Sefton has so many rich relations who any day might leave him a legacy."

She looked shyly under her eyelashes at "Cousin John."

"Well, if you come to wealthy relations, guess you are as well off in that respect as Sir Sefton."

"Yes, indeed. I often boast of you to my husband."

"No, now, do you really?" with a bland smile. "And what about your ma-in-law? Do she cotton to you?"

"Oh! the Dowager Lady Ravenscroft is a very charming woman, but just a little jealous of me I fancy, resents her son's affection straying from herself. She lives in town on her own income with her daughter. She would dearly have loved to keep poor Sefton tied to the strings of her widow's cap. I must say he is a very devoted son, and visits her constantly. At present she does not come to Ravenscroft Park, as the associations are so painful. Her husband's suicide was a shock from which I fear she will never really recover."

"You don't say! Poor creature! I suppose she won't be looking out for a second, eh? A rich man who could set her on her feet again. Ah! no," catching sight of Georgina's horrified expression, "it would not do for two of the Pluffs to marry into the same family."

"Cousin John, you—you don't contemplate a second union?"

She asked the question anxiously.

"Well, and why not? I'm a hale, healthy man, with plenty of 'oof' to back me up. There's many a fine lass that would look upon me favourably."

"Ah! I see you are unselfish, you would share your wealth with another, some young extravagant beauty, who will squander it right and left, and marry you simply for what you can give her."

A pang of fear shot through John Pluff's soul. Her words had a ring of truth in them. He fidgeted in his blue satin chair.

"Perhaps you are right. I shan't decide in a hurry. I've only to say the word to get a dozen of 'em."

"Yes. I should be sorry to see you caught by a designing fortune-hunter."

Georgina rose.

"I must return," she said, "for Sefton is to meet me by the six o'clock train. He is spending an hour or so with his mother. Perhaps you would drive me to Waterloo. I should like to see your carriage and pair."

Mr. Pluff rang the bell. "Certainly, but I trust next time you will bring your luggage, and do me the honour to stay. I shall be proud and 'appy to entertain the pair of you. There's not a house in Europe where you will be better waited on. For comfort and good living my establishment can't be beaten, and you can tell your husband so. By-the-way, Georgie, my love, I'd like to have a look at the old ancestral mansion, though it is running to seed. I won't put you to any inconvenience, nor shall my visit cause you any expense. You are not above receiving a little present from Cousin John, I'm sure. He hasn't too many relations to spend his money on. Of course, when it comes to friends, well, they swarms like a lot of bees. But it don't do to be too generous to outsiders, for you never know when you are being taken in."

Georgina nodded.

"Very true," she declared. "Don't let people sit upon you. Now you are living in affluence, free from the atmosphere of shop and trade, drop those old acquaintances and leech-like hangers on, who would drain you of your very life blood. A man in your position cannot be too careful."

"Lor', what a wiseacre you've grown! But here are my two classy chestnuts. There's breeding in them, if you like; and that barouche is fit for a queen to ride in."

"But, Cousin John, why on earth have you given the men cockades?"

"Thought they looked well. Some folks say it's for the army and navy, but that's just because they are green with envy. Not having carringes themselves, and don't know nothing about it. Mr. Clay, the chemist at Sydenham, he calls me 'the Colonel.' There, step in, Georgina, and see if it is not the easiest seat you have ever fitted your back into."

Lady Ravenscroft's heart sank. This was the man who had invited himself to Ravenscroft Park, the only relation she had to produce, a necessary incumbrance if she was to make him her banker.

He placed his bulgy form beside her, and the horses dashed away.

CHAPTER VI.

"I WANT YOU, SEFTON."

LADY RAVENSCROFT steadied herself against a gate, and placed her hand over her eyes.

"I can't bear to watch," she said. "Sefton is very cruel to cause me such terror and anxiety. He has absolutely no consideration for his wife or his life. That horse killed two grooms in Will Thompson's stables before he let Sefton have it."

The Hon. Douglas Shirling reassured Lady Ravenscroft, declaring that her husband had the mare thoroughly in hand, and that once he taught it manners, the beast would fetch a long price.

Nevertheless, he followed the rider's every movement with anything but a happy expression on his face.

Surely, he thought, Sefton must be mad to ride an untamed animal in the park—a bolt under the trees would mean certain death.

Douglas Shirling was one of the few friends Sir Sefton asked to the house since his marriage with Georgina Pluff. The men were the same age, and had been at College together.

Douglas was the only person outside his family to whom, in old days, he confided his secret engagement to Lady Norah. Douglas knew the Cannington's well, and had promised to be Sefton's best man.

Of course he guessed that Lady Norah proved fickle, and the governess, doubtless through sympathy, had caught the young baronet's heart in the rebound. Yet he instinctively disliked the new Lady Ravenscroft, and wondered that Sefton had allowed himself to be entrapped by her.

"His recklessness is positively suicidal," said Georgina, turning away. "But I'm tired of talking. Sefton never pays any heed to my wishes."

"Are you going in?"

"Yes. What is the good of standing here with my heart in my mouth? If Sefton is to be thrown, I would rather not see."

She walked slowly towards the house, vexed with Douglas Shirling for not following her.

He remained leaning on the gate, till Sefton rejoined him, pale with heat.

"What's the sense of risking your life?" said his friend, as they strolled through the grounds together. "It hardly seems worth it! I would ride anything within reason, but that mare will need a bit of breaking before you've done with her. I declare once or twice I thought she had got the better of you."

"Come into my study and have a smoke," said Sefton, passing through a long French window, and flinging himself into the chair in which his father sat the night before he died, contemplating the dread unknown. This room was so strongly associated with Reginald Ravenscroft, that Georgina never entered it without a shiver.

"Perhaps," said Sefton, his eyes wandering round the familiar walls, "the suicidal mania is in our family."

Douglas eyed him critically. He noticed the restless flash in his friend's eye, the drawn lines round his mouth, that should not have been there.

Sefton was wretched with his wife—anyone could see that!

"Don't let yourself get morbid," advised Mr. Shirling, forcing a laugh.

"Morbid! That's hardly the word, old chap. Morbid temperaments are often the happiest, they glory in their sorrows, and feast upon them with pleasurable relish. It is not my father's death I dwell upon. I do not revel in pointing out the spot on which he shot himself, nor plague my acquaintances with details of that horrible never-to-be-forgotten night. I want to put it all away from my mind. Believe me, the living sorrows, the daily, hourly regrets, are more haunting and terrible than all the ghosts of the past. When a man is ever face to face with his own madness and folly, the consequences of which go on—on—night and day. Bah! what am I saying?"

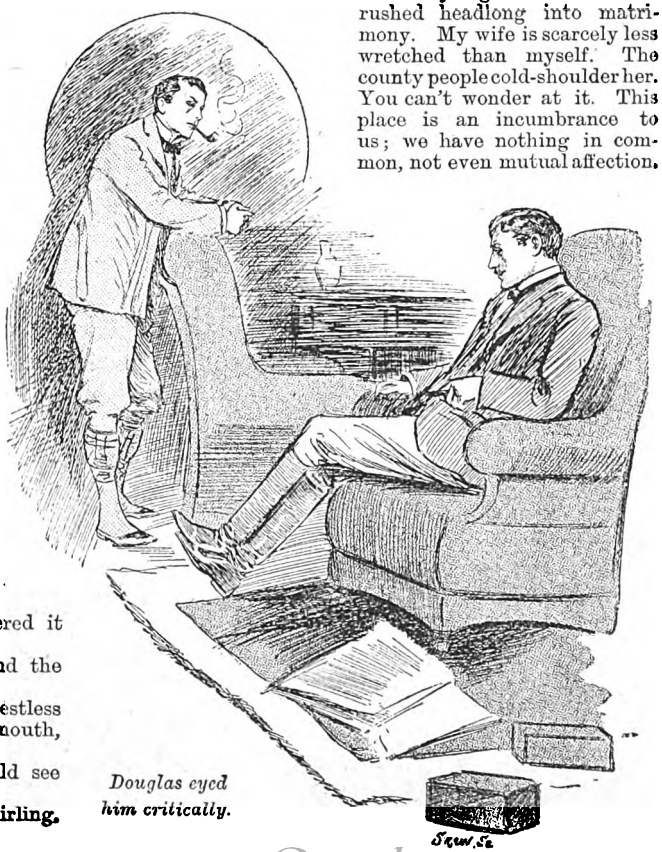
He broke off shortly, the pipe he had lit went out unnoticed between his pale lips, his hands hung limply on each side of the chair, as if dead, impassive and nerveless.

Douglas Shirling was one of those quiet listeners who instinctively inspire confidence. He had never known trouble himself, his life had been a straight rose-path, made easy by wealth, health, and a calm naturally happy nature, moulded in the lap of luxury. Yet he could give sympathy so genuine, so unassuming, that those who had once received it, sought it again and again.

"Oh, don't mind me, old fellow," said Douglas consolingly. "I can see you are in low water. I know you're not happy. I only wish I could do anything to——"

He stopped speaking, amazed at the look of bitter hatred that crossed his friend's face.

"You have guessed it then," said Sefton. "This miserable spun-out existence with a woman I cannot love, nor even respect. Ah, Douglas, I can trust you. I would not breath a word of this to another living soul—it is the secret of my life—a load of humiliation. I am chained down, body and soul. No wonder that danger is welcome—that I crave for death itself. I was not in my right senses when I rushed headlong into matrimony. My wife is scarcely less wretched than myself. The county people cold-shoulder her. You can't wonder at it. This place is an incumbrance to us; we have nothing in common, not even mutual affection.



Douglas eyed him critically.

Ah, you look surprised. I know what you would ask. Why on earth did I do it? I'm not at liberty to explain. The iron entered into my soul when Norah Cannington went out of my life. I cared for nothing. I was hopeless —desperate! They say she will marry the Duke of Malvern; he is always at Rosemont. A brainless boy, insipid and weak-eyed, prematurely aged by outrageous dissipations, a creature unworthy to tie her shoe lace. It is too revolting to think of!"

She looked unutterably charming, lounging upon a window seat.

"Serve her right," muttered Douglas Shirling. "No fate is bad enough for a woman who wantonly breaks true hearts for a pastime. Lady Norah has absolutely no feeling, she is noted for her heartlessness. Whoever she marries she will wreck. Don't regret her, Sefton. She is not worth a sigh."

"Love clings fast, you cannot tear it out, trample it under foot for the bidding. Though your higher nature may rebel at cleaving to what is false, the lower nature will get the better of it, and kiss the very dust. By-the-way, you must go to the Cannington's, you promised them yesterday on the station."

"Oh! I can't stand the old man, and Lady Norah drives me wild. After the way she treated you, I can hardly bring myself to be civil to her."

"Well, go this afternoon and leave a card. There is a flower show at the Grange, and Lady Cannington is giving away the prizes. They will all be out."

Douglas Shirling caught at the idea.

He finished his smoke and changed the conversation to pleasanter subjects.

Then he whirled away on a machine to Rosemont, with knit brows and resentful thoughts for his friend's shattered career.

Lord and Lady Cannington, he was informed, were out, but Lady Norah was at home, and a moment later he found himself in her presence.

She looked unutterably charming, lounging upon a window seat, scribbling with a silver pencil shaped like an axe, on a sheet of notepaper. Her face was graver than usual, and the smile of welcome she gave Mr. Shirling had a wintry air about it. He fancied the pressure of her hand was more fervent than of yore, and that she paled at sight of him. He noticed a full-length portrait of the Duke of Malvern on Lady Norah's piano in a silver frame. His christian name was written across the corner of the photograph, the thin, straggling fist being characteristic of the man.

"You have shattered my poetic muse," she said, holding up the paper reproachfully. "I was just inspired."

"Penning odes to broken hearts?" he asked, a touch of sarcasm in his tone.

"Yes," looking him straight in the eyes. "How did you know?"

He had not expected this answer, and hesitated before replying lamely:

"Oh! poetry is generally demoralising."

"Do you think so? I consider it is rather elevating to contemplate sorrow, especially if you can put it into verse."

"It is practically impossible," declared Douglas Shirling, "to write of a sensation that you have never experienced. You need a broken heart yourself before you can analyse the sufferings of others."

A strange expression flitted across Norah Cannington's face, quite enigmatical, a puzzle to the man. Her lips parted as if to speak, but she closed them again in silence, and crumpled the writing in her hand.

She knew instinctively that he disliked her. It is easily discerned, unmistakably felt by sensitive impressionable natures. The knowledge, however, did not displease, though it certainly astonished Lady Norah.

People who are habitually worshipped by those around them, appreciate the novelty of a hostile attitude, it is at once diverting and interesting. Besides this, she knew the reason of Mr. Shirling's changed manner, and admired him for it.

"You are staying at Ravenscroft Park?" she said at last, breaking a rather embarrassing pause. "The place is very altered, don't you think?"

She leant forward as she spoke and raised her eyebrows inquiringly.

"Sefton is very altered, if you mean that," replied the man mercilessly.

"Ah! Sefton—yes," catching her breath, "poor fellow! He has had more than his share of sorrow. The kicks of the world are very hard, and they bruise deeply. I am so sorry for him."

Mr. Shirling stared at her amazed. How dare she pity Sefton, and before him too, when she herself had caused the sharpest pain—dealt the most lasting blow. His heart swelled with resentment, he looked up and saw the tears in her eyes. The sight of them softened him, till he remembered they could be but crocodile tears.

"You are right," he answered, "fate has been exceptionally cruel to our friend at Ravenscroft Park. More than one of the kicks you mention came when he was already down."

"I know what you think," said Lady Norah, her eyes suddenly flashing, "that I was to blame. It is very natural; perhaps, too, you are right. I like you for your staunch friendship to Sefton—your changed feelings to me. It shows that you have his happiness really at heart—that you are loyal and true. We are alone. I always speak plainly. You know that Sefton and I were all the world to one another. Then can you explain, why, if he loved me, he married that woman whose name was tainted already by scandal—a woman that people receive on sufferance, and to whom his mother can barely bring herself to speak?"

"Because he was mad!" muttered Douglas Shirling. "You drove him out of his senses for the time, and in some mysterious way that creature got hold of him. You left him a prey to an adventuress!"

"If it could be undone," she said. "Marriage is so dreadfully final. It seems to end everything. I have such a horror, such a terror of it."

"Because you have never really loved."

"Is that the reason?" lowering her eyes lest he should read the anguish in their depths.

"Undoubtedly."

How little he guessed the bitterness of her soul. The thought of Georgina Pluff revolted her. She was madly jealous, miserably faithful to her old passion. Yet, like a ship driven of strong winds, she felt herself swept on into swift currents and deep channels, her father's strong will ever at the helm. Instinctively her eyes wandered to that portrait on the piano—her pictured destiny.

Douglas Shirling made an effort to steer their conversation away from personalities.

"Why are you alone?" he asked. "It is unusual to find you in solitude."

"I stayed in," she answered apathetically, "because I am expecting the Duke of Malvern."

Her visitor rose abruptly. She understood the stiff handshake.

"How long are you staying at Ravenscroft Park?"

"Only a day or two."

"Be good to Sefton."

Then she turned to the window and watched him down the drive.

"Oh, I want you, I want you, Sefton!" she moaned. But the sinister face of Georgina Pluff rose before her vision, and the Duke of Malvern was announced.

A FALSE ALARM.

Although a naturally good fellow, Saint-Perix went home in a very bad humour. He had been utterly cleaned out at the club. The worst luck! he had not won once in three hours. At last he threw down the cards and left, vowing that never again would he be found seated at the card table.

Ensconced in a cab, he said to himself, with sullen anger, that all this would never have happened if the Countess had not had a headache—her eternal headache—and they would have gone to the opera together and yawned in company throughout the performance, as they always did on Fridays. Mechanically he thought of the story they had told him of Montescourt one evening at the club. It was almost a farce, what with Montescourt's simplicity, his wife's perpetual indisposition whenever she was called on to accompany her husband to a ball or the theatre, and the handsome young man—like a hero of light opera—who made the third in the dramatis personæ.

Could it possibly be that the Countess was playing the same trick on him to be alone and free for an entire evening? Was not that headache a mere pretext. One by one a thousand forgotten details came back to his memory. He recalled that fashionable bazaar for the benefit of the inundated Madagascans, where, having neither rose-buds nor satchet bags to sell, Mme. de Saint-Perix had offered her bare arm to be kissed at twenty-five louis a kiss.

The receipts had been enormous. He remembered the interminable walks she had taken in the country with her cousin Max; a ball where she had danced four waltzes with the same partner; a letter that she had burned, with deep emotion, some days latter.

All these phantoms dazed and excited him.

"Fool that I am!" he burst out at last, "to think of such things. The Countess is an angel in her conduct, and she would never——"

He shrugged his shoulders and did not finish the sentence.

The cab stopped before his house. Saint-Perix entered. The gas was extinguished, the servants had gone to bed. The house was wrapped in silent peace.

"Evidently," said he, "I was not expected home so early." And, lighting a match, he proceeded to his wife's chamber, happy at the thought of surprising her in her sleep.

He crossed the ante-chamber, pushed aside the portière of the boudoir, and recoiled, startled, livid, as if he had seen a terrible vision.

He had seen a man in the Countess's apartment—a sort of Romeo, of aristocratic bearing, crisp curling hair, and irreproachably dressed.

"So," muttered the husband, "I was not mistaken."

He approached the man, his hands clenched, menacing, pale with anger.

"Will you inform me what you are doing here, sir, in my house?"

"I have no reply to make," stammered the other.

"Scoundrel! I find you at night in my wife's apartment."

"I can say nothing, sir. If you consider yourself aggrieved, I am at your orders."

He extended to Saint-Perix a card, which fell to the floor, and with the other hand he drew from his pocket an elegant little revolver, and, saluting ceremoniously, he said: "Whenever you choose. The Baron San-Leone, Hotel Bristol. It is too late to prolong this conversation—so farewell, till we meet again." And he hastened from the house without awaiting Saint-Perix's reply.

The latter, stupefied, leant with both hands upon a chair to keep from falling. All seemed red before his eyes. He felt that he would go mad—a terrible sense of desolation seemed to crush him down.

"I shall kill him!" he cried, at length; "as for her, I shall attend to her later."

He picked up his card and hastened to the club to choose his seconds.

"A duel to the death," he told them, "and the sooner the better."

* * * * *

The next afternoon, at four o'clock, the seconds came to give an account of their mission to the unhappy husband.

"We presented ourselves," said one of them, "at the hotel indicated on the card of your Baron San-Leone. He had left by the first train in the morning."

"The coward!" cried Saint-Perix; "I would give a hundred thousand francs to find him again!"

At this moment there was a discreet knock, and the Countess's maid half opened the door.

"Madame begs that monsieur will see her a moment," she said.

"Very well," he replied shortly; "you may go."

Scarcely had he pronounced these curt words when the Countess, her eyes red with weeping, her face pale and drawn, entered the salon.

"Henri, Henri, what is the matter with you to-day," she cried, "that you avoid me and close your door to me?"

"You shall learn presently, madame, since you seem not to know," replied Saint-Perix, in measured tones of bitter irony; "at present, as you see, I am engaged."

"But I must speak with you," she interrupted quickly; "I must speak with you now. Do you know what happened in my boudoir last night?"

"I know only too well, madame."

"What! You know that while I was asleep some one broke open the sandal-wood box in which I keep my diamonds——"

Saint-Perix had risen. He gasped, and seizing the Countess's hand in his own, he repeated anxiously: "Someone broke open your box?"

"Yes, and the robber has left nothing, not even my engagement ring, that I prized so much."

"Gentlemen, all is explained!" cried the Count to his two friends triumphantly; "it is a good lesson—do you think so?—and one which I merited. Our San-Leone was a common thief. Well, so much the better. Your jewels, fortunately, can be replaced."

And the Saint-Perix began a second honeymoon, which was quite as tender as the first.

The Knife with the Death's-head Handle.

"HULLO, AMIGO! I was looking for you. I want to borrow your knife. My own I have lost, and to-night I lay for the big buck at the spring. Without a knife, how shall I cut his throat, eh?"

Marston carelessly drew his knife from its sheath and handed it to the speaker. "Si, con gusto, Vincente," he said, and he resumed his pipe.

Vincente Mariano grasped the weapon almost eagerly. Had Marston not been absorbed in serious thought he would have observed beneath the friendly smile on the Mexican's face an expression of satisfaction hardly called for by so simple an act of generosity as the lending of a knife.

"Gracias, señor, the liver shall be yours for breakfast," and, turning from the light of the log fire, Mariano, with his rifle over his shoulder and Marston's knife in his belt, disappeared in the darkness.

Marston continued his ruminations by the fire. It was early yet, but the little Indian village had quieted down, and, save an occasional form stalking along the single, straggling street, he was alone. He had scarcely noticed the coming or the departure of the Mexican, and had passed the knife to him almost mechanically. Now, however, as his thoughts recurred to the incident, a frown settled upon his brow. Then he whistled quietly and finally laughed, but it was a laugh devoid of merriment. "Fudge," he ejaculated, "there's nothing in it; still——" And his mind ran back over the strange story that had been told him by his friends, the gunsmith, in the little shop down at Prescott the day he was first attracted by the long, keen blade of the weapon, its artistically fashioned buck-horn handle, and, above all, by the carved death's head that decorated it. "Grim fancy, that," he had remarked to the gunsmith.

"That is what I thought," was the reply, "when I saw the fiendish thing put on there. This knife was brought into my shop ten years ago by a handsome, dare-devil Spaniard, who had as a wife one of the most attractive women in town. He was a bright chap, and, placing the knife upon the counter, he carved with his penknife this death's head upon the handle. 'My wife shall see it,' he said, with a smile that I did not like, and, gaily waving his hand, he walked out. The next day his wife was found in her bed stabbed to death, and he had disappeared."

"And how did you become possessed of the knife again?"

"Ah, that's too long a story! The day after Francisco Vargas fled, his wife's lover—a Mexican, Mariano, I think was his name—also left town. Three months later, at a fandango hall down at Tucson, while a Spaniard was engaged in the dance, a Mexican, who had entered unperceived, stole behind him, snatched his knife from its sheath, and plunged it into his breast. As he fell, the victim of his own weapon, those near him heard him exclaim: 'Her curse!—she swore I, too—should die—by it. Ah, Mariano!'—and then his life went out. Vargas had a daughter seven or eight years of age—some people said Mariano was really her father—but what became of her nobody seems to know.

"That knife—well, there isn't a vacquero, hunter, miner, or gambler in all Arizona that would wear it at his waist for all the gold in the country. It has had a queer, a diabolical history; but whether the fatality that accompanies it is the result of a frenzied and dying woman's curse—some fearful potency that inheres in that leering symbol of death, projected there by the fiend that lived in the heart of Francisco Vargas, or merely a curious combination of circumstances, such as often makes the truth more wonderful than the wildest fiction, I shall not endeavour to say. After Vargas's death, a gambler got possession of the knife, and, in an affray one night, as he reached with it in his hand to strike an antagonist, he slipped and fell and thrust the blade into his own heart. It passed into the hands of a miner; he was found one morning in his cabin dead, with a huge gash in his breast. His partner, his gold, and his knife had disappeared. Months later the partner, while resisting arrest for another crime, over in Idaho, having emptied his revolver, and being cornered and desperately pressed, avoided the gallows by thrusting the knife's keen blade between his own ribs. Since then it has had half-a-dozen or more owners, and everyone has come to his death in some strange way through its instrumentality. The last one to handle it was the coroner here, into whose hands it came after holding an inquest upon the body of its last victim two years ago. He would not keep it, it couldn't be given away, and he finally forced it back on me. But I don't own it, you mind, any more than he did. It belongs to nobody. I am not superstitious, and I have no fears; still, I sometimes dread the infernal thing; it does seem as if within that grinning skull there lurked a relentless and implicable demon."

"Good!" said Marston; "your story is interesting Let's see the belt."

Taking it, he buckled it on, and placed the knife in the well-worn sheath. "I am about to start on one of my periodical hunting and prospecting trips. I shall go alone, as I always do. I came in here to purchase a knife and to say adios. This is just the thing," and before the little gunsmith could remonstrate—before, with pale face, and hand that trembled, he could reach across the counter in earnest protest, Marston had thrown down a gold piece and was gone.

Just why Marston had wandered off up into the Suppai country, he could not tell; but he did know that he had already been there a few weeks too long. After several weeks of leisurely roughing it he found himself one day on Cataract Creek, among the small tribe of Suppai Indians who occupy that almost inaccessible section. They took to him kindly, for Marston was one of those strong, strapping, broad-shouldered, broad-natured men, a thorough Englishman whose strength, cheerfulness, and kindliness appeal magnetically to all classes of men and to all classes of women.

Marston smoked and meditated. Day after day he had mentally sworn that he would get out of there, and at once. And day after day, and night after night, he had remained.

But the next morning he would "strike out"—bright and early, too. There were unfriendly signs in the air; at least he imagined he saw them. He seemed, somehow, to be an object of suspicion of late. A few of the young bucks kept away from him; their demeanour was sullen and threatening.

He arose, kicked the remaining brands together, and walked towards the small brush shanty that served him as a sleeping place, some distance behind the village. The night air was sweet with the odours of tree, and shrub, and herb, and throwing back his shoulders he filled his lungs with it and rejoiced. Life—life beneath the open sky, companioned by mountain, and forest, and stream—life, with the large liberty and continuous delights that one finds in perfection only in the wide and sunny West—how good, he thought, it all was; with his health, his strength, his freedom, his love for all things, he felt like a god, whose subjects were the rocks, and the trees, and the running waters, and all wild creatures of the wood and of the air. He paused before the shanty. "And yet," he reflected, "what would it all be worth, but for some sort of human companionship!" Putting aside the blanket that served to cover the doorway, he entered and dropped it behind him.

There was a commotion in the village the following morning, and as the sun rose steadily higher the hubbub correspondingly increased. Maria, the belle of the Suppai, whose perfect Spanish features distinguished her from the other girls of the reservation was missing —La Coqueta, Vincente Mariano had called her, casting a furtive glance at Marston to see the effect of his words. Marston had not changed countenance. "She is a beauty, Vincente; who was her mother, and how did she come here?"

Mariano shrugged his shoulders. "Quien sabe!" he said, and with his habitual imperturbable smile he walked away.

Marston did not appear that morning, either; and finally a group of bucks, some silent and stolid, and some with ugly and menacing looks and gestures, turned as if by a common impulse towards his shanty. At the door they called. There was no reply. Thrusting back the blanket they gazed within. Soon the shanty was filled with and surrounded by a mass of pushing, struggling bucks and squaws, and the cañon resounded with commingled cries of astonishment, rage, and sorrow. Side by side lay Marston and Maria; in the bosom of the girl, thrust to the hilt, was a black-handled knife such as Vincente Mariano always wore in his belt; from the bare and bloody breast of Marston stood up a buck-horn handle on which a death's-head grinned ominously at the young buck whose hand pulled the weapon from its sheath of flesh. But in all that surging, ravening crowd, nowhere was seen the smiling face of Vincente Mariano.

JUMBLE STORY, No. 3.

THE RUSTTED FINDER.

"THE gloomy house at the end of the street is on the golden metal transformed it into a thousand sweet promises to her, saying that when he returned to tell his wife. It would kill her. He knew that she met a companion in misery who was an old friend. The man swore by everything sacred and unsacred that was set on the house, and several facts of interest brought home worn out and fatigued, but invariably with a swollen garden, six yards from the pear tree, beneath a dandelion surrounded by a high wall, and a mystery," the Doctor would never leave her again, and they would be rich and deserted, alone in the gloomy house—what was it that he was doing?

In the first place it was found that there was one young parted with her wedding ring, and then she awaited the worry: she must be very lonely, and yet the busy-bodies discussed, it was observed that behind the fresh beauty of the suburb was fond of saying, and the epigram had but one old dress with which to clothe herself. Lastly she would soon be in want of money. Oh, the bitter irony in finding the big gloomy house, surrounded by the high solemn oath that he would do his commands faithfully. Sentence by sentence, sometimes only one a day he told her; friendless and relationless, she knew of no one to end.

Now it happened that in the exercising yard this man bade her a more tender farewell than usual, he had made piece by piece, until there was none left; all the fine old furniture worth fifty times the amount she got half in gold, amounting to thousands of pounds; he did take a holiday abroad for a year or two. And then he drove his pick savagely into the soil. The dandelion plant, lay buried his hidden treasure, half in notes, and gazed at the gold. "He was to keep the notes for months, and still she was left alone.

There were few, however, who troubled themselves with the agony of the thought; his health broke down; friends' words came back to him, and he remembered of her face there was a tired expression of sadness and mystery, it was nevertheless very evident. So the busy-bodies discussed the matter, with the result that a watch return. But the days passed by and he did not come; to light.

And the husband of this poor woman, starving, and in the eyes, and then one of them was taken back to his City. That meant that he would go away, and return at heads as they went by and passed on. That there was a wall. It was apparently deserted. Not a soul was to about the matter; those that did merely shook their stars. The man ran his fingers through the coins, and banking account.

For the girl who took the lonely little walks by herself to a heavy iron box, and drawing it out, he prised it all times of the day; sometimes he would be absent for the doctors knew that he had but a few months to made the place notorious.

The moon came out from behind a cloud, and shining his secret when the warder's back was turned. In the door lay hundreds upon hundreds of pounds of his ill-cell, and a few hours later found himself free.

The jewels went, one by one, and after those her person in the house at least; and then it was noticed not know how many. The man was to dig it up, and the gloomy house, and yet how deep a mystery, and how pretty. And when she was scanned yet more closely, they would leave their gloomy house, and perhaps would live.

In truth there was a mystery behind the high walls of his shoulders. Then he hurriedly left the garden.

So he went away, and his wife waited anxiously for his drives. He went to the back of the building, scaled the notes back in the box, and the whole in the bag. He did not think of comforting her.

One day, after he had been home all the morning and afternoon, he had taken his hat when it grew dark, and found within everything that his poor friend had broke asunder. and yielded up its treasures. He came whom she might apply for aid. She sold the furniture, and her every detail, from her hat to her shoe, had been happy.

"Fourteen years penal servitude." He had not dared the days lengthened into weeks, and the weeks into days at a time, and even weeks. Then he would come tragic, no one even suspected.

By the last day of his friend's confinement the wretched walls, found the pear tree, and the dandelion plant, and the oath that he had sworn. Then a thought from the suburb his friend had mentioned. He had no difficulty gotten wealth.

He set out immediately in search of the out-of-the-way wife." He was to tell her that her husband was dead.

And he could not let her know. His hair turned white the world that knew his secret; and one, though living, was dead.

Then he looked nervously behind him, and put the clothes. The wind was blowing cold now, and she had listened to their music.

Then gradually she used up all the money he had left open. His heart gave a great bound of excitement as he threw the soil in its place again, and raised the sack to be seen. Only a few sparrows hopped on the overgrown husband had told him everything, and demanded his keep the notes himself, and give the gold to the "little himself, and give the gold to the little wife." His Devil entered his mind;—there were only two people in described. He put the notes hastily on one side, and that she was usually alone, and, what is worse, was very was a young wife, whose husband was something in the of it—the cursed, bitter irony. Within ten paces of her he would do so; the two men looked each other earnestly for it.

The mystery is soon explained—he was in prison.

LEGENDS OF WOLFVILLE.

BY "DAN QUINN."

Wolfville is a Cattleman's Settlement in Arizona, and the Characters in these Legends are Cowboys.

No. 13.—Needed Watchin' an' Herdin'.

"YES," said the old cattle-man, as he took off his sombrero and gazed meditatively at the rattlesnake band, "cow-punchers are a mighty queer people. They need watchin' an' herdin' as much as cattle.

"I knowed one by the name of Stevenson down on the Turkey Track ranche, in Texas, as merited a heap of lookin' after. This yere Stevenson wasn't exactly onery, but bein' naturally restless an' peevish, with a disposition to be emphatic whenever he was fillin' of himself up, keepin' your eye on him was a good safe play. He was public-sperited, too, if anyone ever was, an' sometimes took lots of pains to please people.

"I minds once when we was bringin' up a beef herd from the Panhandle country. We was up agin' the south bank of the Arkansaw tryin' to throw the herd across. There was a bridge there, but as we allowed it was weak, we was enjoyed in makin' the herd wade.

"Steve was posted at the entrance of the bridge to turn back any loose cattle that might take a notion to try and cross that way. Thar he was, a settin' on his bronco an' both mighty near asleep. Some women people—towerists I reckon—as was camped in town, came over on the bridge to see the fun. They was lined out close up to Steve, an' leanin' of their young Eastern chins on the top rail, a lookin' down.

"'I don't regard this much,' says one young woman, 'there ain't no thrill into it. Why ever don't they do somethin' excitin'?'

"Steve sees the young woman is displeased, an' as he couldn't figger nuthin' else out quick to entertain her he gives a whoop, bangs his six-shooter off into the scenery, digs his spurs into the hoss, an' hops over the side of the bridge into the shallow water below.

"The jump I reckon was some twenty feet an' busted the pony's legs like toothpicks, besides breakin' Steve's collar-bone, an' dispersin' of his features around mighty free an' frightful on account of his sorter lightin' rather heavy on his face.

"Well, we shot the pony, an' Steve rode in the grub waggon four or five days recooperatin' of himself.

"Steve got himself killed a year after, an' struck out on the big trail where the hoof prints all p'ints one way. He was over an upper Red River a-gamblin' around with the cowboys when he got creased.

"Steve never oughter gambled none. He was a good cowboy—splended round-up hand—an' could do his day's work with rope or iron in a brandin' pen with anybody; but comin' right to the case, he didn't know any more about playin' poker than about preachin'.

"Actually he'd bet two pair like there was no record of their bein' beat. This yere, of course, led to frequent poverty, but it didn't seem to teach Steve nuthin'. He was downright foolish on that p'int.

"On the occashun of his demise, one of the boys got hold of a tray-full, Steve bein' possessed of a club flush, queen at the head. That settled it. In two minutes he didn't have even his blankets left.

"After he went broke Steve histed in a drink or two of nose-paint, and scoured around a whole lot, an' just as the tray-full boy gets into his saddle, aimin' to go out to his camp, he comes along up an' hails him.

"'Do you know,' says Steve, mighty gloomy, 'I've been tryin' to school myself to bear it, but I can't, an' I'm therefore here to say as how you stole that pair of kings as you made out your full hand an' completed my ruin. This bein' troo, I'm just goin' to draw on you for that bric-à-brac I lost, an' I looks to see you honour the draft unmurmuringly.'

"'Oh, you do, do you?' says the tray-full boy, mighty scornful. 'Well, you're a heap too sanguine. You just send the draft through the clearin' house an' watch it get thrown out a whole lot. Do you suppose I gives up the froots of a tray-full—as hard a hand to hold as that is? Well I guess not; not this round-up.'

"'Don't get flippant about this yere robbery,' says Steve. 'It's enuf to be plundered without bein' pestered with ill-timed gaiety. Now, what I say is this: either I gets my stuff back, right here now, or our succeedin' conversation will occur in the smoke,' an' thereupon Steve pulls his pistol and takes hold of the tray-full boy's hoss by the bridle.

"'If anything makes me more weary than another,' says the tray-full boy, 'it's gun play, an' to avoid such exhibitions I freely returns your plunder, but mark me, you and I don't play cards no more.'

"So the boy gets down off his hoss, an' Steve, thinkin' the debate is closed, puts up his gun again. But he was a heap too hopeful, for the next second, bang goes the tray-full boy's six-shooter, and the bullet ketches Steve in the neck. It bothered his breathin' to such an extent that in two minutes he quit tryin' altogether, an' that afternoon we had a hasty but mighty successful funeral with his remainder.

"'I don't reckon,' says Gene Watkins, who was ranch boss, 'there's no need of havin' any trials or lawsuits about this yere killin'. I've knowed Steve for a long time an' liked him, but them views he kept entertainin' as to the value of poker hands leads straight to everlastin' life, an' this yere sorrowful episode don't surprise nor stampede me none whatever. His death should be a warnin' to us.'"

CHAPTER XXIV.

Mr. Daunt is Still Puzzled.

Kenyon did not think it necessary to inform the authorities at Scotland Yard that Vere had been found. They were certain to become acquainted with the fact before long, since the proceedings at Deptford must reach their ears; and in the meantime it was of the utmost importance that the invalid should be allowed to remain quietly in the doctor's hands. Vere was indeed little better than a wreck. He was a different creature from the bright-eyed, high-spirited young man who had won Winnie Denvers' heart.

It was quite impossible for him to go to Devonshire, even if the Rector had been willing to admit him to his house. But Harold had written a long letter to Katherine Dale, explaining in detail the plot against Vere, and the state in which he had found him. After describing the way in which the artist had been drugged and carried off by Jane Unwin to her father's house, he went on:

"It may seem well nigh incredible to you that a man should have been kept prisoner for several weeks in an ordinary house in such a country as ours. But you must remember that, in all probability, for the greater part of the time, he did not care to escape. When he awoke from his stupor on Wednesday morning, his captor would probably give him another dose of the drug; and by Thursday morning she would allow him to realise that it was too late—that the morning which should have secured his life's happiness had come and had found him unable to take the prize he had won. I can imagine him sinking into a deeper and ever deeper apathy, finding his only recreation in the society of Jane Unwin (who, we must remember, had at one time been his sweetheart), and flying every night to opium to deaden his mental pain.

"I can understand all that easily enough; but what I find it hard to comprehend, is how Miss Unwin should have possessed the cunning, the courage, and resolution to carry out a plot of this kind. Assuming, as I think we may fairly assume, that she was madly jealous of Miss Denvers, and keenly desirous of marrying Launcelot Vere, she took a very good way, perhaps the only possible way, of accomplishing her purpose. But is it conceivable that alone and unaided she compelled or induced, not only her father and cousin, but the lawyer, Beaumont, to aid her in the carrying out of her plans? It seems to me that she must either have had a powerful friend to assist her, or she must have been used as a tool by one who desired that Vere should be suppressed, at all events for a time.

"I have one request to make of you before I close. It may appear to you singular, but, believe me, it is not unwarranted. It is that you should not breathe a syllable concerning Vere's release to anyone except Miss Denvers—not even to her father, or to Mr. Shenstone—and that you should impose the same condition on Miss Denvers herself. It will be quite sufficient reason to give her that if the fact of his being found were known to the police they would speedily discover his address, and that it would be a dreadful thing for him to answer the charge of murder (of which I am certain he is wholly innocent) in his present state of health. At any rate, please tell Miss Denvers that I rely absolutely on her discretion, and on your own, to preserve perfect silence on this subject, even from your own nearest relations."

Harold's real reason for insisting that the fact of Vere's having been found should be kept a close secret was that he did not wish Paul Shenstone to hear of it. He thought that his best chance of discovering why Shenstone had played him false, was to allow him to remain in ignorance of what had happened, and see whether he would not in some way betray himself.

Ralph Masters had been taken before the magistrates and remanded for a week. At the expiration of the seven days it would be necessary for Vere to appear at the Deptford Police Court; and then he must be ready, Kenyon knew, to surrender himself, and be taken into custody on the coroner's warrant.

But to Harold's surprise the Deptford police made no effort to arrest Vere, and seemed ignorant of the fact that the coroner's jury had found a verdict against him. The two friends gave evidence against Masters, who was committed for trial on a charge of conspiracy and false imprisonment; and they returned to London in company.

The only reason Harold now had for remaining in town was that he might stay with Vere, and help him to break off the fatal habit of taking opium. But he did not feel certain whether it would not be better for Vere to go to a police office and voluntarily surrender himself; and to set his mind at rest he took Vere one day to call on Mr. Daunt.

"Quite unnecessary," said the lawyer, when the question was submitted to him. "The police have your address?" he added, turning to Vere.

"I am staying with my friend Kenyon at present," he said; "they know that; and they also have my permanent address," was the reply.

Mr. Daunt fixed his steady blue eyes on the sensitive face before him. "A kindly, gentle soul, but weak as water," was his inward comment.

"I believe the police are convinced, as they must be by the facts proved in Masters' case, that you are entirely guiltless of causing poor Jane Unwin's death," said Mr. Daunt. "They probably suspect Masters, or some one else, of the crime; and although you must take your trial, it will be only a formal affair.

"There are one or two points, however, that should be explained. The revolver, now—can you offer any explanation of the fact that your revolver was found close to Jane Unwin's body?"

"As I have told Kenyon," answered Vere, "I lost that revolver, or mislaid it."

Digitized by Google

"When did you see it last?"

"At Mr. Pascoe's house in Richmond. It was there I lost it. I had picked up the thing at a pawnbroker's on purpose to use it in a picture of an American girl defending her wounded lover, or something of that sort. Miss Unwin sat for the American girl, and I painted the picture at Mr. Pascoe's house. The case I left behind in my rooms, because it took up so much room in my portmanteau. Mrs. Unwin objected to seeing the revolver lying about the studio, though I told her I never had had a single cartridge for it, so I put it somewhere out of sight—into a cupboard, I think. But when I looked for it, just before leaving, I could not find it. I never saw it again, and I have scarcely even thought of it till Kenyon told me it had been found close to Jane Unwin's body."

Mr. Daunt turned to Kenyon, a grave look on his face.

"The doctor must have been mistaken in saying that the girl could not have committed suicide," he said. "It seems clear that Jane Unwin must have appropriated the revolver and afterwards used it to take her own life."

"It does," said Kenyon.

"Were you in any way related to Mr. Pascoe?" asked Mr. Daunt suddenly of Launcelot.

"Not at all."

"Are you sure?"

"As sure as a man can be of a thing of that sort," replied Vere; and he rose to take leave.

"Could you spare your friend for a minute or two?" said Mr. Daunt to him, as he shook hands. Vere answered that he would wait in the clerk's office, and left the room.

As soon as the door had closed behind him, the lawyer drew his chair closer to Harold's.

"Have you any idea how Jane Unwin came by her death?" he asked.

"Not the slightest."

"Doesn't it strike you as singular that a young woman alone and unaided, should have been able to conceive and carry out such a plot?"

"I don't believe she did it alone, or unaided. I believe she was made a tool by some one," answered Kenyon.

"By whom?"

"Ah! How can I tell?"

"If your friend had been a relation of old Mr Pascoe, I could have guessed at a motive readily enough."

"Yes. But there was no attempt to kill him."

"He would have killed himself soon enough with opium."

"Still, they couldn't have reckoned on that," objected Kenyon.

"True—but perhaps a temporary seclusion—long enough to enable some one else to put his hands on Mr. Pascoe's money—would have been sufficient. The trust funds once distributed——"

"The money is still in the hands of the trustees, then?"

"So I was told when I made inquiries a few days ago. It would have been divided among the claimants—children of a second cousin named Patey, I believe—before now; but the trustees received a letter protesting that more time should be given for some nearer relations to turn up. And who do you think wrote that letter?"

"Haven't an idea."

"The disinherited nephew, Joseph Abbot!"

"But what had he to do with it? I thought you told me that he was expressly excluded from sharing in the inheritance?"

"So I did."

"Under no circumstances could he take anything?"

"Not a penny."

"Then why should he trouble himself in the matter?"

"Why, indeed?"

"It is impossible," said Kenyon after a pause, "that any claimant of the Pascoe property could have been at the bottom of this plot against Vere, seeing that he was merely a friend, not a blood relation, of the testator."

"Just so. Yet, where to look for his enemy I do not know."

"The thing is a mystery," said Harold, rising from his chair.

"And will be a mystery to the end," answered the lawyer.

CHAPTER XXV.

In Wythecombe Church.

As Launcelot Vere recovered strength, mental and bodily, the desire of going to Wythecombe, and ascertaining for himself what Winnie's feelings towards him were, grew in intensity till he could bear the suspense no longer. Yet he shrank from meeting the Rector. For several days together he never ceased to implore Kenyon to go with him to Wythecombe and explain to the Rector how he had been trapped and caged and kept a prisoner. Harold would have been willing enough to go, but for two considerations. He feared the effect of so severe a strain on his friend's enfeebled intellect; and he was nervously anxious that Kate's wedding-day should have come and gone before he went to Wythecombe.

As the twelfth of the month—the day that had been fixed for Kate's wedding—drew near, Kenyon fell into a deep melancholy. More than ever, now that his self-imposed task was finished, life seemed a flat and barren moor, empty of everything like interest, not worthy of a man's labour, not worth keeping. The loss of Kate made existence a burden to him. In the future he saw a dull series of aimless years. There he forced his thoughts to stop. He did not know what abysses, what crimes, his passion might plunge him into, if he were to allow himself to think of what he was losing. Sometimes he was on the point of rushing off to Wythecombe, to make another appeal to Kate, ere she spoke the words that were to be an eternal barrier between them. Then he remembered his last interview with her, and recognised the fact that he might bruise and wound the girl's heart, but could never turn her from her purpose.

When the morning of the twelfth of October dawned, Harold's rooms were empty. Vere, who was now quite out of the doctor's hands, waited there all day for him in vain. He did not return till late at night, pale and haggard, drenched with rain, and hardly able to speak.

For the next three days Harold remained in a state of apathy. On the evening of the third day Launcelot Vere called on him as usual and began once more to urge him to go with him to Wythecombe.

"All right," said Harold quietly, "we can go to-morrow."

Vere was astonished.

"Will you see the Rector for me?" he asked eagerly. "Will you plead for me? Will you explain how it was that I was unable to free myself? Will you get him to consent to my seeing Winnie?"

"I will," answered Kenyon. "At least, I will do my best for you."

Vere's impatience was so great that nothing would content him but travelling all night, or leaving London by the first train in the morning. Kenyon preferred the latter alternative; so they agreed to meet at Paddington at 5.20.

Kenyon was punctual; but Vere was already at the station when he arrived, looking out for him anxiously.

"I'll take both tickets," said Harold, taking his place at the end of the queue at the booking-office window, while Vere went off to secure seats.

Kenyon had got pretty close to the window, when he heard a man asking for a second-class ticket to Wythecombe. The village was so remote, that Harold felt a certain surprise, and moved a little to see whether he should recognise the man who was going to that out-of-the-way corner of Devonshire. He saw a small, common-place looking person, with a pale, quiet, composed countenance, wearing no beard or moustache, but dressed like a commercial traveller or a small tradesman. He seemed to observe that Harold was staring at him, for he suddenly lifted his eyes, and Kenyon hastily looked away.

Once or twice during the journey Kenyon noticed the pale-faced stranger, and found himself dully wondering what the traveller's object might be in going from London to an insignificant village two hundred miles away.

When Vere and his companion arrived at their destination, they noticed that the village street was unusually quiet, even for Wythecombe. Not a soul was to be seen. They went on to the Rectory; the roads were deserted. Around the church-porch were a few women and children.

"Upon my word, I believe there is a wedding going on," said Vere, "some villager's, no doubt." A thrill shot through Harold's veins. Could it be that the scene he had so carefully avoided was to be enacted before his eyes—that his ears were to hear the words spoken that were to put him and his love asunder.

"I say," whispered Vere, "I want to see what is going forward; but I am anxious not to be recognised. Let us slip in by the little door in the tower, and get into the gallery." He dragged Kenyon away by the arm as he spoke, and Harold followed, unresisting.

They found the tower-door open; but the door at the foot of the gallery stair was shut and locked. There was nothing for it but to slip into one of the pews.

If Harold had happened to turn his head round for an instant, he would have seen in the pew immediately behind them the quiet looking stranger who had travelled down that morning from London. But he was gazing about him like one under a spell, or like one who had been a hundred years dead, and was trying to understand the new world he had awakened to.

Even now Kenyon hoped that this was some stranger's wedding—not Kate's, surely! How was he to bear it?

The vestry door opened. There was no more room for doubt. Preceding the Rector by a few steps came Katherine and her mother. The bride was clothed in white; but her face was as white as her dress, and her eyes were on the ground.

Harold could hardly help showing how he suffered. He grasped the back of the pew in front of him, and tried to rise and make his escape; but his limbs refused to obey him. He was shivering from head to foot.

As the bride and her mother passed on to the altar rails, the bridegroom, who had been hidden from the two friends by a pillar, stepped forward.

"Good Heavens, Harold!" said Vere in a loud whisper, "it is Joseph Abbot! What is he doing here?"

Harold, looking round at his friend, saw the quiet stranger in the pew behind start, rise up, and bend forward.

He touched Vere with his finger, and said in a low tone:

"I beg pardon, sir, but are you certain that the bridegroom is named Joseph Abbot?"

"Of course I am. I know him perfectly well."

Vere had hardly uttered these few words when the stranger left the pew and glided up the aisle.

The Rector, who had uttered the opening words of the service, paused and frowned at him.

"This marriage cannot go on!" The words were spoken in a low voice, but they were heard all over the church.

"What do you mean, sir? Who are you?" asked Mr. Denvers in an angry whisper.

"I am a detective officer from Scotland Yard, and I arrest you, Joseph Abbot, for the murder of Jane Unwin at Hampstead, on the——"

The sentence was never finished.

Shenstone turned on him, his face like the face of a tiger. Kate, seeing it, turned half round, and clutched her mother by the arm. And, with a snarl of rage, like a tiger's, the murderer felled his captor to the ground. Then, with quick, sudden strides, he reached the door of the vestry and disappeared.

A dozen voices uttered an inarticulate cry, a dozen people ran forward to help the fallen man.

"Take him! Follow him! Don't let him escape!" gasped the police officer as soon as he could speak.

But when the bystanders opened the vestry door, they found the room empty. It was evident that the criminal had run down the green lane that skirted the Rectory garden, and had escaped through some coppices and broken ground into a large wood which filled the bottom of the valley. Pursuit was soon begun; but it was not very vigorous. Nine-tenths of the people in the church were women; of the remainder some were unwilling to run down a neighbour on the mere word of a stranger. Others were secretly unwilling to face a desperate man. By the time the police were fetched from Darnport, it was seen that the fugitive might possibly escape arrest.

"How did you find out that this man Shenstone was the murderer?" asked Kenyon of the detective that evening.

"When the police searched the 'Black Swan,'" he replied, "they found in a drawer a letter to Jane Unwin appointing a meeting on Hampstead Heath. It was signed only with the initials J. A.

"The case was put into my hands; and I saw at once that Mr. Vere could not be the murderer, and that 'J. A.' very probably was. I took the letter to Mrs. Unwin; and she told me at once that she recognised the handwriting as that of a Mr. Abbot, her late master's nephew. There was a postmark on the envelope containing the letter—Wythecombe. I came down here; but could hear nothing of a Mr. Abbot. I went back to London and made inquiries in other directions, but meeting with no success, I decided to try Wythecombe again.

"I confess, sir," he continued with a smile, "that when I saw you in Mr. Vere's company at the railway-station, I thought it possible you might be the man I wanted. So I followed you into the church. Then, when I heard Mr. Vere's sudden exclamation, I thought it better to act at once, since it was of the utmost importance to delay the marriage until the truth could be ascertained."

Kenyon turned away, unable to speak.

Some hours before this Launcelot had managed to get a note conveyed to Winnie, telling her that he was waiting in the lane, not far from the garden gate. The instant she read the scrap of paper, Winnie flew to the spot where her lover was waiting, and he caught her to his breast in a whirlwind of joy; then, before a word was spoken, he knelt down and kissed her feet.

"Oh, Winnie!" he cried at last, "can you forgive me?" and he poured out the story of his being kidnapped, and of his subsequently yielding to the demon of opium.

"Forgive you? I have nothing to forgive!" cried the girl, clinging to his breast, and looking up into his face with shining eyes. She led him home; and at the sight of her radiant face her father's stern resolutions and gloomy fears melted away. He received Vere stiffly at first; but as he came to understand how helpless the poor fellow had been, Mr. Denvers felt able to forgive him for—having been so unfortunate.

Leaving the two lovers to themselves, the Rector went out to pay a call at the High Cottage. On his way back he met Harold Kenyon, and brought him back to the Rectory, in order that he might satisfy his curiosity concerning the events of the last few weeks.

They were sitting together in the library, when a servant came in to say that the person engaged by the Rector to pack up Jane Unwin's things and forward them to her mother had finished her task, and that she had brought a book which she had found on Miss Unwin's bookshelf, but which did not apparently belong to her.

Mr. Denvers took the volume in his hand.

"This belongs to the Sunday-school Library," he said,

"Miss Dale gave it to us. Here is her name in it—Katherine Pascoe Dale."

Kenyon started.

"Did you say Pascoe, sir?"

"Yes. Pascoe. Wasn't that the name of the old man who was the uncle of that scoundrel Shenstone?"

"It is the same name," answered Harold. "I wonder if she can be a relation of Mr. Pascoe! The name is not a common one. Perhaps Vere can tell me."

Vere, on being applied to, said he thought Miss Dale might be descended from a sister of Mr. Pascoe, who had married and gone to Australia with her husband many years before. And this turned out to be the case. The solicitors to the trustees had advertised for the next of kin of Anna Pascoe, but only in Australian papers, not knowing that the widow and child of Anna Pascoe's only son had come home and settled in the quiet village of Wythecombe.

The motive which Joseph Abbot had had for all his machinations was now clear. He had found a useful ally, years before, in the housekeeper's daughter, who kept him informed of what went on in his uncle's house when he was absent; and when he was disgraced and banished from the house, she secretly sympathised with him, and did her best to serve his interests, corresponding with him privately from time to time.

Shortly after she went to Wythecombe she borrowed a few books from the Parish Library, and happening to observe in one of them the name "Pascoe," she mentioned the fact in one of her letters to Abbot.

Abbot was at that moment well-nigh desperate. The will disinheriting him had been read, and was evidently going to be acted upon. He had nothing in the world but a few pounds; he had no profession, nor any means of earning a livelihood. When he received Jane Unwin's communication he made some inquiries, and soon satisfied himself that Katherine Dale was sole heiress and next of kin to his late uncle. He then conceived the idea of going down to Wythecombe under a strange name, marrying the heiress, and then, in right of his wife, claiming the property which the will prevented his touching.

He paid his court to Katherine Dale so well that he secured her promise; but very soon after this success he was thunderstruck at being told that Launcelot Vere, who had frequently met him at Mr. Pascoe's house, and knew the whole story of his crime and his disgrace, was actually at Wythecombe, and engaged to marry the Rector's daughter.

It was by the merest accident that he did not meet Vere on the street on the day when Jane Unwin met him and spoke to him.

It was certain that the instant Vere found that Abbot, who had been guilty of a bare-faced attempt to win a fortune by forging a will, was passing under the name of Shenstone, and was about to marry his wife's bridesmaid, he would certainly enlighten his bride, and, through her, Kate herself, as to Mr. Shenstone's true name and character. Therefore it became a necessity for Abbot, unless he meant to abandon his hopes, to stop the impending marriage, and keep Vere out of Wythecombe, at all events until his own marriage had been celebrated.

But this seemed a task beyond his power; and after long and fruitless pondering he had given up all hope of gaining Kate and with her his uncle's property, when he happened one evening to come upon Jane Unwin in a lonely part of the road between his own house and the village. She was crying, and after a little trouble Abbot made her tell him the cause of her distress. The same event, Vere's approaching marriage, was to blast the hopes of both of them.

At that moment a plan for averting the danger that threatened him shone out clear and luminous in Abbot's mental vision. It was almost as if Satan himself had inspired his willing servant.

Here was an instrument, Abbot saw, ready to his hand. He easily persuaded Jane that if she followed his directions she would not only prevent Vere from marrying Miss Denvers, but would raise an insurmountable barrier between them, while at the same time she and Vere would be thrown together at a time when he would be grateful for any society, or any sympathy.

Jane, urged forward by her own unruly passion, soon consented to do all that was asked of her; and she suggested her father's house as the place most suitable in all respects for Vere's temporary prison. Beaumont's help was purchased by a promise of a share in the spoils, and the plot was successfully executed.

It turned out, however, that Vere was by no means the passive victim Jane Unwin had expected to find him.

She wrote to Abbot telling him that she was tired of the struggle, and intended to take Vere back to his own quarters on the following day.

Abbot saw that he must act at once. He had noticed Masters, and had conjectured, rightly enough, that his was one of those low natures which can be bought. He went up to town, therefore, resolved to bribe Masters into doing his will, and to silence Jane Unwin. He took with him the only weapon he had—one he had picked up some months before in his uncle's house. But he did not believe that it would be necessary to use the revolver. He hoped to be able to cajole or frighten the girl into doing what he wanted. But Jane Unwin was not to be either cajoled or frightened. She defied Abbot. He threatened to shoot her. She, maddened with the loss of all her hopes, and driven to frenzy by her accomplice's taunts, struck at him. There was a scuffle, and all that Abbot knew the next moment was that he was standing with a smoking pistol in his hand and a deadly fear at his heart, while a woman lay stiff and dead at his feet.

The murderer spent his last sovereign in bribing Masters to keep the half stupefied victim a prisoner for a few weeks longer, and he was obliged to forgo the name of one of the bank's customers at Darnport, in order to obtain the advance he had tried to get from Harold Kenyon without the formality of a guarantee. This was not found out until afterwards.

Two days before the day appointed for the wedding, the bride caught a bad cold; and on the twelfth she was confined to bed. This led to the marriage being postponed for a few days; and the delay, as it happened, saved Kate from a lifetime of misery.

Nothing was heard of the escaped criminal for some days. Then it was said that his body had been found on the beach at Darnport. This rumour turned out to be true. And as a short time afterwards a small boat was discovered floating about in the bay, bottom upwards, there seemed good ground for hoping that Abbot had not been guilty of suicide, but had been drowned while trying to make his way to some other part of the coast.

They are coming home, however, in order to be present at Vere's marriage, which is to take place in April.

Harold has not yet asked Kate to be his wife. He is afraid of her, Winnie Denvers says, because she is an heiress. This may be true; but Winnie has told them both that if they are not engaged before she leaves her father's house as a bride, she will denounce them at the wedding-breakfast as a faithless pair. And there can hardly be a doubt that whether the Rector's daughter carries out her threat or not, she will not permit Harold Kenyon and her old friend Kate to live to the end of the year in single blessedness.

HIGH PLAY.

A Comedy off the Stage.

By G. Manville Fenn.

CHAPTER I.

A GOOD MOTHER.

"OH, curse it all! my head! my head!"

Lord Braetoun jerked himself viciously from his right side to his left as he lay on a couch, and the effect was not soothing, for he uttered a groan, and then something else which made Lady Braetoun, a very fashionably-dressed, handsome, patrician dame, turn from the window in Hyde Park Gardens, where she was gazing thoughtfully out upon the various equipages passing, and look at her son with a half-mournful, half-contemptuous expression of countenance.

"Poor fellow!" she said softly, as she shrugged her shoulders, raised her eyebrows, and then took out a laced handkerchief, with which she carefully dabbed her forehead just where the none too abundant frizzed grey hair covered it with tiny curls.

This action necessitated a glance at one of the mirrors, which seemed gratifying, for she drew herself up and then took a few steps towards the couch.

"Does your head ache so much, Roderick?" she said.

"Ache!" he groaned. "It's as if boiling lead was running from side to side."

"Shall I ring for a cup of strong tea to be made, dear?" she asked.

"Oh, yes, do, pray, if you want it to be a hundred times worse," he cried fiercely. "My nerves are bad enough without strong tea."

"It always does mine good, my dear," said the lady coldly, as she arranged the full lace ruffles about her delicate blue-veined wrists.

"Does yours good! Well, what of that? You are a woman, aren't you?—Oh, dear; oh, dear!"

"But you are so impatient, my love. Really, Roderick, as a man you ought to try and bear pain with the mind of the stoic."

"D——n the stoics! The headache is unbearable."

"If you are going to use such language as that, Roderick, perhaps I had better leave you."

"I wish to goodness you would, and not stand there firing off platitudes at me. Can't stand an honest English oath, can't you? Why, that's nothing to what I used to hear the old man say to you."

"Let your father rest in his grave, my son, and try and pay a little respect to your mother, if you can."

"There, don't bother me with all that talk. You don't know what I am suffering."

"I pretty well do, but I cannot pity you. If you acted sensibly you would have been fit to go with me this morning to church."

The young man laughed bitterly.

"Be a good boy and walk with mamma to our pew, and carry the books, to go and sit among all the rest of the miserable sinners in lace and silk, scenting the place like so much incense——Ah! there it goes again."

"Lie still, then. If you had not burst out into that foolish tirade of irreverence you would not have felt that pang," said the lady with dignity, and she turned to gaze in a glass again, turning her head first to one side and then to the other, to pat and arrange her hair, unconscious of the fact that her son was gazing at her with a face full of contempt.

"Looks lovely," he said with a snarl. "Is that the new coiffure from Truefitt's?"

The wrinkles in Lady Braetoun's handsome face showed in a marked way for the moment, and there was a peculiar twitching about the corners of her lips, as she said coldly:

"I thought you were ill, Roderick."

"Well, so I am," he cried, with a peculiar drawing in of his breath, as if he were suffering intense pain.

"I should not have thought it of one who is well enough to insult his mother."

"Insult? Bah! You make me speak, with all your mincing. Anyone would think you were a young widow on the look out for a fresh husband."

"And you some coarsely-minded young man of the lower classes. That is not wit—it is not badinage, my son, only brutality, such, however, as I suppose I must expect from one who associates with grooms and betting men."

"That's right; go on. I wish you suffered as I do for half-an-hour. It would make you more feeling."

"I am quite ready to be sympathetic, and to do all I can for you, Roderick, if you will act like a reasonable being."

"You don't know how bad I am," he groaned.

"Oh yes, I do; it goes without saying; but I don't wonder at it after your dissipated life."

"Dissipated devil!"

"You force me to speak to you, my dear. I do not want to know anything about the life you lead, nor to bring you to making confessions of your folly."

"That's right; get a man down sick and helpless, and then jump upon him."

"It is my duty, Roderick, to jump upon you, as you so slangily term it."

"Then you should have begun earlier," he said bitterly.

"Perhaps so; but I trusted to my son's common sense. I had the dignity of our position to keep up, the exigencies of society to attend to. Succeeding as you did to the title and your father's fortune, I was willing to believe that my son—a Braetoun—would worthily support his position."

"Go on!—go on."

"Yes, I have much to say, and though it pains me I must go on. I ought, I know, to have tried to check you sooner, before you had ruined your property, and brought yourself down to what you are."

"A regular wreck, I suppose," he sneered.

"No, but one suffering bitterly from his follies. I hear too much about you. No, I do not play the spy. I try hard to remain in ignorance, and if I were selfish I should shrug my shoulders and say: Why should I trouble myself about him? I have enough for my wants; he must do as he pleases. But I am not selfish, Roderick. I think deeply about you and your interest, and I tell you now that it is quite time you ceased to sow your wild oats and thought about redeeming the past. I am really shocked. What do you expect is to be the end of all this keeping of racehorses and pretty actresses?"

"Pistol, I suppose."

"Worse and worse! A Braetoun talking of taking such a cowardly step as that! Shame! You are ten times worse than your father. Reckless, imprudent, a gambler perhaps, but he was always a nobleman. He would not let me suffer. But really if it had not been for his forethought in settling upon me what I have, I don't know where I should have been."

"Have you done?"

"No, Roderick, I have not done. I have let you go on in your own way all this time without doing anything, hoping that a change would come, but hoping in vain."

"I wish to goodness you would not worry me now I am so ill."

"I must. Now is the time to try and bring you to your senses. It is the only chance I have, Rod. You see you are getting worse and worse—constitution ruined—hopelessly involved in debt——"

"Oh, I shall make a grand coup one of these days, and clear everything off," he groaned.

"Not you. That's what every foolish racing and betting man thinks."

"Will you leave off, mother! My head's all of a whirl. There, it's of no use to make a fuss about it. I must keep on till I win, and once I do I'll sell the horses and have no more to do with them."

"And will you give up that other dreadful shameless expense?"

"Never you mind about that."

"But I do mind about it, Roderick. As your mother, it is my duty. Now, my dear boy, do be ruled by me. Do take my advice. You never will win enough on the turf to clear yourself."

"How do you know?"

"By experience. There is only one way to recoup yourself."

"Speculate?"

"Yes, if you like to call it so."

"What in?"

"Matrimony."

"I? Not fit to marry. Rubbish!"

"Yes, that is what you are talking. You must marry, Rod, my dear! It is your duty. Begin quite a new life, my dear, and clear the estate. Then turn quiet country gentleman."

"Ha, ha, ha!—Hff! Ah, my head!"

"Self-inflicted pain, Roderick. But come now; you know I am talking sense."

"I don't want a wife."

"Yes, you do. It is time you married."

"Who'd have me? You don't want me to marry that widow?"

"You might do worse, dear: she has a very fine fortune, and is a sweet-tempered little woman."

"Sweet-tempered little fool. Bah! Idiot! I won't have her. I wouldn't if she were a ten times millionairess, so drop it."

"I don't want you to marry her, dear."

"Then you've got another woman up your sleeve?"

"'Drop it!'—'up your sleeve!'—My dear Roderick, should you make use of such slang to your mother?"

"Oh, my head!"

"Let me lay my eau-de-Cologne moistened handkerchief on your forehead."

"Lay the coal-scuttle on it if you like, only don't bother me."

"I won't, my darling. There now, isn't that cool and pleasant?"

"Oh, it's very well, but smells spirity. I want a soda-and-brandy."

"No, no, not now. You really must not drink as you do, Roderick dear. Now, listen to me. I have a girl up my sleeve for you, if you will talk slang, you naughty boy."

Digitized by Google

"Who is it?"

"That charming Miss Emsworth."

"Who's she?"

"Roderick! Now, my dear boy, you were introduced to her at Lady Baringham's, and she dined here with her father."

"Oh, her! Simpering bread-and-butter school miss."

"She is not, my dear! only sweet and innocent. The very woman for you. This is her first season. There are a dozen men wanting her, but I said as soon as she had been here an hour: 'That is the very girl for my boy, Roderick.' She is the only child, and Mr. Emsworth must have at least a million."

"What is he—a Whiteley, or John Barker?"

"Absurd boy! No! he is one of the British South Africa princes, and she'll be enormously rich. I had long talks with him, and he's a thoroughly keen, shrewd man of business."

"Then he won't be such a d——"

"Roderick!"

"Well, blessed fool as to marry his little girl to a used-up rake of a fellow, right to the eyes in debt and difficulties."

"Don't you be so fond of depreciating yourself, silly boy. You've been foolish, and now you are ill and repentant. I have seen a little of the world, my darling, and I know what Mr. Emsworth means by settling in England this season, and taking his daughter everywhere. These men have made money, and they want position. Trust me for it, he wants to match her to some scion of good family—to give his child a title, and the son-in-law a large fortune. Now do you see?"

"I don't want the chit. Silly schoolgirl, who could only say 'yes' and 'no.'"

"You did not get to know her. She is very sweet, highly accomplished, has a lovely voice, plays brilliantly, speaks three or four languages, and is charmingly pretty. Only wants the style that a season would give her. Rod, my boy, you have only to ask, and there is a delightful wife for you with a noble fortune. Come now, do be a good boy, and take my advice."

"What, go and tell the old man that I'm a regular wreck and want to marry his filly?"

"Filly! For shame, Roderick! Go to him and propose in due form, prior to going abroad."

"Going abroad? What, to get rid of my duns?"

"Oh, you dear, foolish, absurd child! No—no—no! You are out of order and want change. Make sure of her first, and then go and see Allan Murray or his father, tell him the exact truth about everything, and ask him where you had better go for three months—Ems, Baden, Aix, Cannes, or Algeria."

"Three months! Besides, I can't afford——"

"You shall afford it, my dear, even if I sell my diamonds, for the estate must be rescued from these dreadful harpies to whom you have pledged it."

"Here, how the devil do you know?" cried the young man, sitting up.

"Never mind. I know everything about you, Roderick—everything," said the lady with intense emphasis.

"The dickens you do."

"Yes, everything, you foolish boy, and that it is time a certain dissipation came to an end. There, you know I am right, so do as I wish. Ce n'est que le premier pas qui coute. Before the three months are over you will be thoroughly well again, and I shall have managed Mr. Emsworth and his daughter. He will trust me to introduce his child to society and be her chaperon. I quite love the dear girl already. Then I shall persuade him to take her out for a month to wherever you are, and—there, do you see?"

"I don't want the chit."

"Messieurs, le jeu est fait. Yes, I see, mother. What a clever old girl you are!"

"Somebody need be clever, my dear."

"Is she all you say?"

"Ten times more, Roddy dear. A most loveable girl, and as innocent as she is high. Oh, you lucky fellow; it is a chance of chances."

"Is it? Don't count your chickens until——"

"Ah, but this little chicken is hatched, Rod, my dear. There, I'm very glad we've had this pleasant chat; you will be good now, won't you?"

"Oh yes, for I'm sick of living as I am."

"Of course he is, poor darling," said Lady Braetoun, bending down to re-saturate the handkerchief with scent and kiss her son's brow. "No wonder, poor boy."

"Gently with that scent; you are soaking me. What time is it?"

"Half-past twelve, dear, and the people are actually coming out of church."

"What!"

"Roderick, my darling, what is the matter?"

"Oh, nothing," cried the young man, dragging at the bell. "Only an appointment that I must keep."

"No, no, my darling, pray lie still. Have lunch with me to-day."

* * * * * *

"Did you ring, my lady?"

"No, I did. I ordered the phaeton to be round at twelve; why the dickens isn't it at the door?"

"Been at the door half-an-hour, my lord," said the servant who had answered the bell.

"Then why the dickens didn't you come up and tell me?"

"Your lordship's orders were that you were not to be told, because you could always see for yourself."

"Go to the devil, idiot!"

"Yes, my lord," and the door closed.

"You shouldn't speak so pettishly to the servants, Roderick darling," said Lady Braetoun, "it will make them think you irritable. Are you going to have a drive, then?"

"If I wasn't going for a drive I shouldn't have ordered the horses round should I?"

"No, my dear; of course not. Good-bye, darling. You will be back to dinner?"

"No; I shall dine at the club."

"Very well, dear. But you will think seriously of what I said?"

Roderick, Viscount Braetoun, was scowling at his handsome features in the glass, noticing the dark rings under his eyes, and a peculiar twitching at the corners. Then, without giving further answer than a short nod, he strode out of the drawing-room, and his mother moved to the window to see, a few minutes after, a handsome pair of high-stepping horses driven up from where the groom was waiting, her son step in, and the stylish phaeton dash off at a rapid rate.

"Ha!" she said softly, "I did not think he would take it so well. Terribly plebeian; but she is very sweet, and it will be our salvation."

After which Lady Braetoun picked up the scent-laden handkerchief her son had tossed off his forehead, and seated herself on the nearest couch, looking handsome with her grey hair and stately bearing, quite the patrician mother, smiling, placid, and content, in the satisfaction of what she looked upon as a good Sunday morning's work.

CHAPTER II.

Playing with Death.

Roderick, Lord Braetoun's appointment was in the Strand, for he drew up at a well-known restaurant, gave the reins to the groom, and upon entering walked through at once to the inner room, where, at a table in a corner, a particularly striking little figure was seated, and rose eagerly as he appeared.

"Oh, Rod, dear, I was getting in such a fidget."

"What about, Baby?"

"I thought you didn't mean to come, but it's all right now."

"Didn't mean to come! Didn't I say I'd come?" he cried pettishly.

"Yes, and I ought to have known, but I am so stupid. I've ordered the lunch, so as to be ready, for I do so want to go—omelette, sweetbread, cutlet, and a bottle of dry."

"Humph! That's right," said Braetoun, seating himself and gazing rather wistfully at the piquant little figure in pale blue and a gauzy diaphanous bonnet, with quite enough lace here and there to give the wearer a fairy-like—theatrically fairy-like—aspect. Her face was covered by a delicate veil, which needlessly heightened a perfect complexion, and half hid her fair, clustering golden hair, whose tint gave the lie to any suspicion of aureoline, or any other coiffeur's preparation. In short, she bore careful inspection, and the most particular in taste would have declared Lucy Lee, known as "Baby," late of the chorus of the Theatre Royal Thespis, to be absolutely the most charming little blonde upon whom eyes had ever rested.

"Oh, what a serious look," she said, as she began to take off her gloves and display a pair of the prettiest hands possible, and then to remove her veil, which was lightly tied on behind, this last process helping to explain the sobriquet by which she was known, for baby-like dimples played about in cheeks and chin, and again at the knuckles, or where the knuckles should have shown in her soft, white, little hands. "Not cross, are you, Roddy, dear?"

"Cross? No. Tired; and got a horrible head on."

"Oh, poor, dear, darling old man!" she cooed. "Only wait till we're down in the country, and that ogre of a groom isn't looking, and I'll kiss the poor, aching place. Mustn't kiss it here, dear, must I?"

"Don't be a little fool," he said sourly. "Oh, here's the cham.," as the waiter came up, carrying an ice pail. "Yes; open it."

The cork was dexterously sent flying, the pale pink, amber wine poured foaming out from glass to glass till each was filled, without a bead running over the side. Then, as the waiter hurried off for the first dish, the glasses were raised, there was a long, silent look, and a moustache dipped in one, a pair of classically-formed, ruddy lips touched the other, to take a few sips in the same time that the masculine vessel was drained.

"Poor old thirsty boy! I am so sorry that the head's bad."

"Hah! It'll be better now," said Braetoun; and his face lit up a little as he gazed approvingly at his companion's costume. "That's capital, Baby."

"Do you like it, dear?" and as he nodded she added with childish delight: "Oh, I am so glad."

"It all suits you perfectly. Ah, you're a horribly pretty little thing."

"Horribly!" she said, with a pout of her rosy lips. "What a shame!"

"Well, you can't help it, pet," he continued, half mockingly; "but you really are a puzzle to me."

"Puzzle? Why?"

"Because you ought to have been the daughter of some big pair of blue-blooded swells, instead of a farmer's daughter. How did you come?—hansom?"

"No, in the brougham, of course. I wasn't going to let that lazy fellow have nothing to do on a Sunday. He gets dreadfully idle and impudent. There, it's only about one o'clock now, and he'll have nothing else to do all day. He don't know what work is. He ought to have been on the stage. I say, how funny and quiet this place looks on a Sunday."

"Humph! yes; very. Go on; you're not eating."

"I'm not hungry, dear; I want to get out in the country. It seems a shame not to make haste. We can eat at any time."

"Yes, of course. Well, don't be impatient."

"All right; and you must eat, dear. Is your head getting better?"

"Yes. Sight of you has done me good."

"I wish that was quite true, Rod," she said, resting her elbows on the table, laying her little white chin in her hands and gazing at him earnestly with her dark grey eyes.

"Well, so it is," he retorted.

"No, only a compliment; but it is true with me."

"I say, 'bilboes,' little lady."

"Oh, I forgot," she said, colouring like a detected child, as she hastily removed her elbows from the table. "But it's of no use, Rod. I'm not a lady, and I never shall be one. But so long as you don't mind, it doesn't matter, does it?"

At a table in a corner, a particularly striking little figure was seated.

"Not a bit," he said. "Come, have some more wine."

"No; I haven't drunk this, dear."

"Never mind; freshen it up. Make your eyes sparkle, Baby."

She smiled and held her glass, sipping from it after it had been refilled, but it did not have the effect he declared, for the pretty eyes grew slightly dim and suffused.

But they began to sparkle soon after, when their owner was seated beside Braetoun in the phaeton and the horses trotted west.

At Hyde Park Corner they were checked, and, as if already tutored, the groom stepped down from behind.

"Seven o'clock, my lord?" he said.

"Half-past."

The horses darted off again, and they were not checked till well beyond Esher, at the bottom of a very retired mossy lane, deep in woodlands. Rein was drawn at the gateway leading to a low thatched farmhouse, half hidden in ivy and other creepers.

At the sound of wheels a weaseley-looking, thin man, with the face and form of a boy, came trotting down, and pulled off his stableman's cap as he ducked down his head.

"Day, Sam."

"Day, m'lord; day, m'lady."

"How's the mare?"

"Splendid, m'lord; never see anything like her."

"Humph, where's your father?"

"Hout, m'lord."

"Eh? Out?" said Braetoun sharply. "Where's he gone?"

"Dunno, m'lord. Hout with the old woman. Chutch, p'r'aps."

"Church!" said Braetoun scornfully, as he drew up by the garden. "Here, take the horses out, and give them a good rub down and feed. As soon as that's done saddle the mare, and bring her into the field."

"Yes, m'lord," said the little groom obsequiously; and he hurried off muttering to himself, while his master strolled across an inclosure through a gate, and into what in days gone by had been the home field of the farm, an extensive tract of some thirty acres, shut in by trees, and, having just recovered from the late mowing, whose result was shown in a couple of goodly stacks, now stretched out in a beautiful green lawn, over which the rooks were sailing, their hoarse cries made musical by mellowing distance.

"Oh, look at the flowers, the dear old buttercups and daisies!" cried the girl; and in a few minutes her delicate white gloves were stained with green, as she kept on picking till she had quite a bunch.

"What a little goose it is!" said Braetoun with a smile full of contempt. "Wish you'd be content with them always, instead of orchids and stephanotis."

"Well, so I should be, if I could pick them for myself. Oh, I say, Rod, it's just like being at home again. It is so beautiful. How nice it all smells!"

"This will smell nicer," said the young man, taking out and lighting a cigar. "Wonder how long that idiot will be! I wanted to talk to his confounded father about the mare."

"Why didn't we go to the stables and see the dear?"

"Because you haven't got on your stable suit, you extravagant puss. Look at your gloves."

"Oh dear, what a mess! Never mind; you'll buy me another pair, dear. I should like to lie down in the grass and roll."

"If you do, I won't drive you home. Look here, Baby, you were never meant for a lady, but for a South Sea island savage, where the young ladies wear nothing but flowers. You'd be quite at home there."

"For shame, Rod! Well, let's go there. I should like it; I'm so tired of London. Who'd go gravel-grinding in the Park when they could come here? Hi—loo—loo—loo—loo! There goes a rabbit!"

"Be quiet, you little savage!" cried Braetoun, laughing. "Come, walk about properly. Suppose anyone saw you."

"But there is no one to see us here, Rod; that's why I like it. Seems like being Adam and Eve in the Garden."

"Oh, does it? Well, perhaps so, for that scoundrel Vinnis plays the devil here."

"Don't be cross, Rod, but do let's enjoy ourselves now we've come."

"All right, go on then; but you don't expect me to begin picking buttercups and daises, do you?"

The girl made no reply, but darted at the globular head of a dandelion flower in seed, picked it, and then, pouting out her lips, began to puff at it to see in how many breaths she could send the winged seeds flying.

"Look at that," she cried; "it's just like it used to be when I was a good little girl."

"What!" cried Braetoun, with a boisterous laugh; "why, you were never a good little girl in your life."

"That I was, till father and mother died, and I came up to nasty old London, and Aunt Duncan. She's a dear good old thing, but I don't think—I don't think——"

"What don't you think, Baby?"

"Look, here comes Bella," cried the girl excitedly, as the groom rode through the gate, mounted upon a satin-coated mare which touched the sward so lightly that she seemed to be gliding along on air. "Oh, you darling, how I do love you!"

"Nice she-devil to love, 'pon my soul!"

"For shame, sir! She's only wicked to you men, and you deserve it. See how gentle she is with me."

Proof positive was given the next moment, for, as the groom rode up, Lord Braetoun raised his hand to pat the animal's glossy neck, when she stopped short, uttered a low, squealing cry, and made a dog-like snap at his hand.

"Ah, you beast!" he cried fiercely.

"Don't, don't," said the girl. "It's only her play; look here."

"Keep back; she'll savage you," cried Braetoun.

"Not she. You wouldn't hurt me, would you, Bella, you beauty?" said the girl, going close up to the mare, which sniffed at the flowers and then suffered herself to be patted and caressed, the girl ending by raising the animal's muzzle and then kissing her between the eyes.

Suffered herself to be patted and caressed.

"That will do," said Braetoun impatiently. "She isn't a lap-dog, Baby. Now, Sam, give her a canter."

The sinister-looking lad pulled his cap down tightly, gathered up the reins, and pressed the mare's sides with his legs, when she shook her head violently, sidled, arched her back, and uttered a low, whinnying noise.

"Quiet!" cried the lad harshly, and, after making two or three bounds, she went off at an elastic canter towards the trees, and then down by the side of the hedge towards the lower part of the great field.

"Splendid, splendid!" muttered Braetoun. "She'd be perfect if it were not for her temper."

"She is perfect," said the girl. "Look at her. Oh, how I should like to ride her! What would she be without a bit of temper?"

"Bearable. She's a devil with," said Braetoun, laughing. "Well, she must be safe for a few races to come; and she need be. But hang the beast! I hate her."

"Glad of it. She's beautiful enough to make you love her."

"Well, suppose I did, Baby," he said contemptuously, "what then?"

"I should hate her. Don't want you to love anything but me."

She darted a look full of passion at him, but he did not notice it, his eyes being fixed on the mare as she galloped along with her head down and neck curved, the lad riding her perfectly and the hoofs hardly seeming to touch the soft turf.

"Capital—capital!" muttered Braetoun.

"Yes, she is a darling," cried the girl as she too watched now, with her lips parted and her white teeth glistening. "Faster, Sam, faster. Give her her head."

"No, no, no, no," growled the young man—needlessly, though, for the horse and her jockey were far beyond hearing. "He's going quite right. I don't want her made hot. So you don't want me to love anyone but you, eh, Baby?" he said, smiling.

"Of course not."

"Humph! Fellow had better love a mare than a woman."

"No, he hadn't. She'd cost more and you couldn't trust her."

"Nor a woman, neither."

"You're a wicked story, Rod, that you are, and if you were quite well I'd punish you. I say, do get quite well again, there's a dear. Oh, do look, though! Here she comes. Oh, you pet, you pet! What did you say Bella Donna meant?"

"Poison," said Braetoun shortly.

"That you didn't, Rod. It was beautiful girl—no, beautiful lady; and so she is."

The lad drew rein close by them, and the girl went to the mare's head to caress her, while Braetoun gave her rider a few instructions in a low voice, ending by laying his hand heavily on his companion's arm.

"Stand back, Lucy," he said sharply; and the act seemed to startle the mare, which shied violently, and went off at a tremendous gallop for a hundred yards or so before the lad got her head again.

"Temper," muttered Braetoun.

"'Tisn't," said the girl decisively. "She thought you were going to hit her with a fork handle. I know she's been ill-used."

"Clever! And how do you know?"

"Because that's how one of our mares used to do; and father caught the horsekeeper one day hitting her with the fork handle, and father knocked him down, and was summoned for it."

"Summoned or not summoned, I'd knock anyone down who ill-used one of my horses, Baby. But it isn't that Bella Donna's a regular savage, and that lad's the only person living who can ride her."

"Nonsense! I could. Let me, now."

"You? Absurd!"

"It isn't, Rod. She'd be as gentle as a lamb with me. Send Sam in when they come back. I must have a canter."

"Without a riding habit?"

"I don't want a riding habit. I never used to have one."

"But there is no side saddle."

"I don't want a side saddle. I could ride her barebacked. I used to ride everything at the farm. Why, Rod, I've ridden the colts, the donkeys, the old cart-horses, and I once had a trot all round the field on an old Alderney cow. Oh, it was fun—all jolty and jog, and she was such a bony thing. Ah, those were happy old days!"

"Happy old days?"

"Yes, but I was never so happy as I am now. You do pet and spoil me so."

"I believe you want to get back to the stage. Think of the applause, bouquets, and diamonds—notes too."

"Don't be a brute to me, Rod. You know I always hated the silly idiots, with their flattery and stupid presents. Then you came, and everything seemed so different. I say, Rod dear, oughtn't you to marry me?"

"No. Spoil you," he said roughly. "Perfect as you are."

"Couldn't be happier, could we? Only I feel sometimes as if it would be right. But I couldn't love you more, and the country and flowers, and horses."

"And champagne, and a brougham, and money."

"Pooh! I don't care for them a bit. I am tired of them directly, but I am never tired of being down here with you."

"Bosh! You're getting tired of me now, and want to get rid of me, so as to go back to the theatre."

"Rod!"

Only that word, full of reproach in its tones, as the tears started to the girl's eyes, and she clasped the speaker's arm. But she burst into a half-hysterical laugh directly.

"You shouldn't talk to me like that, Rod," she said softly. "It's only teasing, and I don't mind, because you know better; but it hurt me, dear. There. It's all gone now. Oh, do look at the mare; isn't she lovely? Look how her skin shines. What a shame to put that thin, ugly boy on her! Rod, I must have one canter."

"Absurd!"

"Well, I like to do absurd things sometimes. I will ride. Here, you, Sam Vinnis," she cried as the lad rode up, "jump down."

The lad glanced at his master and obeyed, while the girl took the reins and began caressing the mare.

"You can go back to the stables. I'll bring the mare in."

The lad grinned, and hearing no counter order from Braetoun, he walked awkwardly back, with his legs very wide apart.

The girl waited till he had passed through the gate, and was out of sight, while Braetoun looked at her curiously, and as if something were passing through his mind. Then he started, and turned paler when she spoke.

"I should kill her."

"Now, Rod, give me a leg up."

"Nonsense!" he said angrily, "she'll turn her head and bite you directly."

"She won't. You wouldn't bite your little mistress, would you, beauty? You sweet—not you. He tells wicked stories about you, you darling."

"Mind, Baby. I tell you she'll savage you."

"She will you, if you say such wicked things about her. Come and help me on."

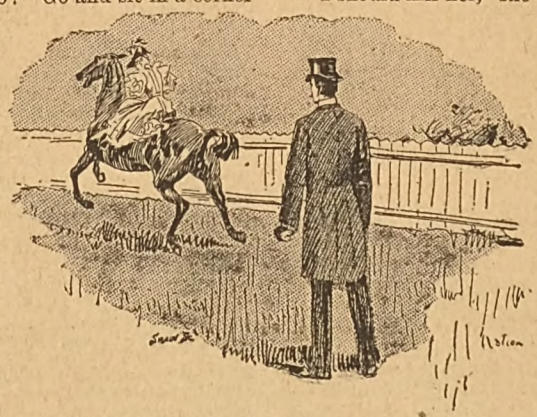
"I won't. Why, you'd be off in a moment, and break your neck."

"Oh dear, should I?" she cried mockingly; "and if I did what would darling old Roddy do? Go and sit in a corner and cry; or be very glad to have got rid of a tiresome, expensive, extravagant thing, and then marry some very good, nice lady in his own set. I believe you'd like to get rid of me and do that, so now's your chance."

He gazed at her wildly as his scene with his mother flashed before his mental gaze, then turned ghastly pale.

Lucy burst into a mocking peal of laughter.

"There, sir, how do you like to be teased? That made you feel. Poor old darling! It will be a lesson to you not to tease me. I know: he couldn't live without me, could he, beauty? We know, don't we? Come, that's right; rest your pretty head on my shoulder. We love one another, and we're not a bit jealous. Now then, you shall take me round the field twice, as fast as you can go. We don't want side saddles, or riding habits, or any of that nonsense. We understand one another, and we'll show him how we can go. Now, stand quite still, beauty, while I mount. Come, Rod, make a stirrup of your hands."



"Mad little fool; it would serve her right."

"I will not," he said angrily, and speaking with a peculiar look in his eyes.

"Thank you," she said, with a gentle look. "I like that. I'm so glad. If you hadn't said that, and turned to be so cross, I should have felt that you didn't care whether I did or no. But you would care, because you do really love me—very, very dearly. Rod," she whispered, as she nestled to him, with the rein over her arm, "I am glad I'm so pretty."

He caught her in his arms, for they were quite alone, and the mare started slightly.

"You little mass of vanity," he said, as he held her tightly. "Proud of your pink and white face, and bright eyes?"

"Not a bit," she said, "I'm only glad because I know you like me to look nice. Now help me on."

"No—no," he said, starting again, and with the peculiar look coming into his eyes.

"Yes, please—please; I want to. I must ride. Help me, Rod."

"I can't," he said; "it isn't safe for you."

She burst into a little, silvery, rippling laugh.

"What nonsense! I could ride anything. Come, help me."

She gave him a long, earnest look, and as he stooped down and made a stirrup of his hands, she placed one tiny little foot in them, laid a hand upon the saddle, and the next moment was seated, the mare not flinching in the least. Then she laughingly settled her right leg over the pommel, and shook out her dress, patting down the stiff folds and looking at him archly.

"Now, sir," she said, "how do I look—pretty?"

"Pretty?" he said, as he settled her tiny foot in the stirrup after shortening the leather. "Lovely."

"What nonsense! But will you always think so?"

"Always."

"When the little crows' feet come in the corners, and won't be stopped up with powder? Oh, Rod," she whispered, as she bent down and kissed him; "I know. But you must always love me, Rod, because if you were to throw me over I should—I should——"

"Yes—what?" he said huskily.

"Turn like the mare, and show how much devil I had in me. I should kill her."

"What!" he said, starting violently.

"I should kill her," she said, as she leant down with her face very close to his. "Yes, I know. It would be because there was someone else for whom you were throwing me over. I've seen it done—often. But I'm not like they were. I couldn't bear it. I should kill her, and then I should kill myself. Yes," she went on, with a peculiar smile, "it sounds ugly, doesn't it? But I should, somehow, for I couldn't bear for anyone ever to look in your eyes as I do, and put her arms about your neck. You are mine, Rod, and I'm yours, and——what am I talking about? There, let go of the rein. Why did you catch it?"

"Because you must not go," he said huskily, as he forced himself to speak, and get rid of the strange paralysing sensation that troubled him.

"Yes, I must. I will. Let go!"

"No," he said, with a boisterous, unnatural laugh. "Look at that devil, now, she's laying down her ears."

"Nonsense! What has come to you?"

"Nice question," he said roughly, "after your talking like you have been. Here, come down."

"I won't."

"I tell you I don't want to come and pick you up all soft, with a lot of bones broken."

"I should think not. I won't let you have a cripple to pet. Let go."

"I shall not. There, I'll walk her up to the stable."

"Rubbish!"

"I will not let you ride her. Look at her; she's as skittish as—as——"

"Oh, say it!—as I am. Now, don't be absurd. Let go."

"I tell you I will not. I can't let you. I—I feel as if something would happen."

"Nonsense! You dear, loving, careful old boy; but I won't break your heart by coming to grief. Let go, Rod, I must have my ride. It sends a thrill all through me as I feel her breathe. It's like sitting on air—like being part of her. Now let go."

"I will not," he panted. "You have no grip of the saddle, and that she-devil will——"

Snatch.

Quick as thought, she twitched the rein from his hand; the mare made a deer-like leap, and they went off like the wind which swept by as a cloud covered the sun, while in imagination Braetoun saw her slip from her seat, to be dragged by the stirrup at the heels of the mare, and something seemed to whisper to him.

"And then you would be free."

MY old friend, Dr. Bonnet, had frequently invited me to visit him in his home at Riom. As I was unacquainted with Auvergne, I decided about the middle of the summer of 1876 to accept the invitation.

I arrived by the morning train, and the first face I saw on the platform was that of the Doctor. He was clad in grey, wore a round, black, soft felt hat with wide brim and a very tall crown, narrowing as it rose to the shape of a chimney-pot, a genuine Auvergnat hat, which suggested a charcoal-burner. Togged out thus, in his light suit, broad hat and bushy white hair, the doctor had the air of a young old beau.

He embraced me with the frank delight that country dwellers always exhibit on seeing arrive long-desired friends, and waving his arms around him, proudly exclaimed: "Behold Auvergne!" As for me, I gazed, but saw only a chain of mountains whose truncated cones might have stood for extinct volcanoes.

After a while, when I had swallowed a cup of café au lait and rested a little in the doctor's house, he dragged me out again to see the old city, obliging me to admire the apothecary's shop and the other celebrated old buildings, black and gloomy, but pretty as trinkets, with their richly sculptured fronts. At last, before one of them, Doctor Bonnet asked me to wait a bit while he entered for a professional call.

"I'll not be gone a minute," said he, "and afterwards we'll go to the Chatel-Guyon Hill and view from there the city and the whole Puy-de-Dome range. Wait here on the pavement. I'll just run upstairs and straight down again."

The house before which he left me standing was one of those sombre old country houses, closed, mute and mournful. It seemed to me, besides, to have a specially sinister countenance, the cause of which I soon discovered—all the broad windows of the second storey were closed halfway up with stout, wooden shutters. Only the upper part was open, as if they had intended to hinder the people shut up in this vast stone coffer from looking into the street.

When the Doctor reappeared I told him what I had noticed.

"Yes," responded he, "you are right. The poor creature shut in there is never allowed to see what passes outside. She is crazy—an idiot, or rather a simpleton—that which you Normans term a 'niente.' Ah, it is a sorrowful story, at the same time a wonderfully strange and interesting case in pathology. Shall I gave you details?"

"Yes," said I, and he resumed:

"It is twenty years now since the owners of that house, my clients, had a child, a girl, like all other girls apparently. But I soon perceived that while the body of the little one developed admirably, her intelligence remained inert. She walked at a very early age, but absolutely refused to talk. At first I believed her deaf; then I found that she heard perfectly, but that she did not understand. Loud noises made her tremble, startled and frightened her, though she could not comprehend their causes.

"She grew; she was superb, but mute—mute through lack of sense. I sought every means in my power to rouse a glimmer of intelligence in that torpid brain; nothing succeeded. I thought that I had noticed something like recognition of her nurse; but once weaned she knew her mother no more. She never knew how to speak that word, the first that infants lisp and the last that soldiers cry on the battle-field—'mother.' Occasionally vague stammerings or meaningless squalls fell from her lips; nothing more.

"When the weather was fine she laughed continually, uttering soft cries that one might compare to the cooing of birds; when it rained she wept and moaned dismally, frightfully, like the plaint of dogs howling at death. She liked to roll on the grass in the fashion of young animals, to run like a mad thing; and she clapped her hands joyously every time she saw the sun entering her room. When her window was opened she clapped her hands again and threw herself about in her bed in order to be dressed the sooner.

"She appeared, however, to make no distinctions between persons, between her mother and her nurse; between her father and me; between the coachman and the cook. I liked her unfortunate parents, and went to see them nearly every day. I also dined with them frequently, which allowed me to see that Bertha—for so they named her—that Bertha, I say, seemed to recognise the dishes and to prefer some to others.

"She was then twelve years of age, but developed like a girl of eighteen, and taller than I. The idea came to me then to foster her gluttony and by this means to bring into her mind an appreciation of differences, to force her, through the faculty of taste, the animal love of certain savours, if not to reasoning, at least to instinctive distinctions, which would clearly constitute a sort of material working of thought. We could, later on, perhaps, by making an appeal to her passions, to her appetite, and by carefully choosing those that would be able to serve us, obtain a sort of return shock from the body to the dormant intellect that would, little by little, increase the insensible working of her brain.

"In pursuance of this plan I, one day, placed before her two plates, one of soup, the other of very sweet vanilla cream, obliging her to taste alternately one and the other. Then I left her free to select for herself. She ate the plate of cream. In a short time I had made her gluttonous—so gluttonous, in fact, that she seemed to have in her soul but one thought, or rather the one desire, to eat. She recognised perfectly the various dishes, reached for those she liked and greedily seized them. She wept, too, when they were taken from her.

"I then thought of teaching her to come to the dining-room at the sound of the bell. It was a long task; I accomplished it, nevertheless. There was assuredly established in her clouded understanding a connection between the sound and her taste, a sympathy between two senses, a call from one to the other, consequently a sort of linking of ideas, if one could term an idea that faint, that instinctive bond of union between two organic functions.

"I pushed my experiment still further and taught her—with what difficulty!—to recognise the meal hours on the dial of the clock. For a long while it was impossible for me to hold her attention upon the hands, but I succeeded at last in making her notice the striking. The method was simple. I stopped the dinner bell ringing, and everyone rose to go to the table when the little hammer struck the hour of noon, etc., etc. But here success ended. To count the strokes I could not teach her. She simply darted to the door each time the clock struck, then, little by little, was able to grasp the fact that the striking had not all the same value from the point of view of repasts, and her eye, guided by her ear, rested frequently on the dial.

"Having noticed this I was careful every day at twelve and at six o'clock to put my finger on the given number exactly as the sound she awaited rang out, and I soon perceived that she followed attentively the march of the little brass hands that I had often moved in her presence. She had understood—I should say rather that she had seized the meaning. I had forced upon her the knowledge, or to make it still clearer, forced upon her the sensation of the hour as one does with carp—which have not, however, the assistance of clocks—by feeding them every day at exactly the same moment.

"Once this result reached, all the timekeepers in the house occupied her exclusive attention. She passed the days watching them, listening for them and awaiting the hours, from which happened something that was very funny. The works of a pretty little Louis XVI. clock that hung at the head of her bed got out of order and failed to strike. She noticed it. She had waited twenty minutes with her eye on the hands, for ten o'clock to sound. But when the needle passed the figure she was stupified at hearing nothing, so stupified that one saw plainly that she was agitated by one of those violent emotions which move us in the face of a great catastrophe.

"And stranger still, she had the patience to remain before the little dial till eleven o'clock came to see what would happen. She heard nothing still, naturally; then, suddenly, seized with a mad rage at being deceived, or with fright at being face to face with an inexplicable mystery, or with the furious impatience of a passionate nature before an obstacle, she caught up the tongs from the chimney corner and in a second had smashed the clock to atoms.

"Her brain, then, was working, calculating in an obscure fashion, it is true, and in a narrow limit, for I was still unable to make her distinguish people as she distinguished hours. To obtain from her a further stir of intelligence we would have to appeal to her passions in the material sense of the word. Of this we soon had another and terrible proof.

"She had become magnificent, a type of her race, a sort of admirable but stupid Venus. She was now sixteen, and I had rarely seen such beauty of form, suppleness of shape and regularity of features. I have said a Venus; yes, a Venus, blonde, plump, vigorous, with her great limpid eyes, vacant, blue as a flax-flower, and wide mouth with full fleshy lips, the mouth of a glutton, a sensualist, a mouth for kisses.

"Well, one morning her father entered my surgery with a strangely disturbed air, and seated himself without even responding to my good-morning.

"'I—I am here to speak to you upon a very serious matter,' said he at last; 'is it—is it possible for Bertha to marry?'

"I jumped with amazement and involuntarily cried out:

"'Marry! Bertha! It is incredible!'

"'Yes, I know—but—reflect, Doctor; we have hoped—we have thought, you see, that possibly—if she—had children it would be a help to her, a great happiness, besides, in short, that her mind would awaken through the joys of maternity.'

"I was greatly perp'exed. It was reasonable. It might be that this thing, so new—this wonderful instinct of motherhood that throbbed in the breasts of brutes as in the heart of woman, that makes the hen throw herself into the jaws of the dog to defend her little ones—would bring about a revolution, a complete transformation in that dormant brain, and start to working the motionless mechanism of thought. I immediately recalled, too, an example that had come under my observation. I had possessed some years before a little hunting dog, a female, so stupid that I could do nothing with her. She had pups, and became at once—I cannot say intelligent—but certainly as well developed mentally as many another dog.

"Scarcely had I foreseen this possibility than I, too, was eager to marry off Bertha, not so much through friendship for her and her poor parents, though assuredly that helped, as through scientific curiosity. What would come of it? There was a strange problem here.

"'Perhaps you are right,' I answered the father, 'we can only try, but—but you will never find a man that will consent to this.'

"'Yes,' said he in a low voice, 'I have found him.'

"I was dumbstruck, but managed to stammer out:

"'A suitable match—someone—someone in your own station?'

"'Yes,' said he briefly; 'it was of that I came to tell you and to consult you. It is Gaston du Bois, of Lucelles.'

"I had nearly cried out: 'The scoundrel!' but caught myself in time, and said, instead:

"'So be it, if Du Bois suits you.'

"The poor man warmly shook my hand.

"'In a month from now, then,' said he, 'the marriage shall be.'

* * * * *

"Briefly, Gaston du Bois, of Lucelles, though a man of good family, was a gentleman of leisure who had run through all his paternal inheritance, mired himself in debt by a thousand questionable means, and now simply sought a new way of procuring money. He had found it here. Handsome, strong and hearty, though wild and of that odious race of fast livers, he appeared to me a sufficiently suitable husband, inasmuch as later on he could be got rid of with a simple pension.

"He came, then, to the house to pay court to the beautiful 'innocent,' who, moreover, seemed to please him. He brought her flowers, kissed her hand, sat at her feet and regarded her with tender eyes; but she gave no heed to his attentions, and never seemed to distinguish him from the others living about her.

"The marriage took place.

"Soon afterwards I went to see Bertha, to read on her face, if possible, if change had come to her. But I found her as I had found her every day before, preoccupied solely with the clocks and with dinner. He, on the contrary, seemed really to have affection for her, and laughed and played with her as with a petted kitten. He had nothing better to do.

"Then I began to make almost daily visits to the married pair, and before long I saw that the young wife recognised her husband, and threw upon him the greedy glances that hitherto she had kept for sugared dishes. She followed his movements, distinguished his step on the stairs or in the adjoining room, and clapped her hands when he came, with a countenance transfigured by a glow of profound happiness. She loved him with all her force and soul, her poor, infirm soul, and with all her heart, the poor heart of a grateful beast.

"It was a picture of admirable and innocent passion, nevertheless pure and modest, such as Nature had put in souls before man complicated and disfigured it with all shades and changes of sentiment. But alas! the husband soon wearied of this beautiful, ardent and mute creature. His days began to be spent away from her. She began to suffer. She waited for him from morning till night, her eyes on the clock, and thinking no more of the meals, for now he ate always from home, at Clermont, Chatel-Guyon, Royal, no matter where, in order not to return.

"She grew thin. All other thought, desire, expectation or confused hope fled from her mind, and the hours when she did not see him became for her a time of cruelest torture. Soon he slept from home and returned only at daybreak. She would never go to bed till he had come, but sat motionless on a chair, her eyes on the little brass clock hands, turning and turning always in their slow regular march around the dial with its tell-tale numbers. She heard the trot of his horse away down in the valley, sprang up with a bound, and then, when he came, turned with a gesture of a ghost to the clock, as if to say: 'See how late it is!' And he, beginning to be afraid of this loving jealous idiot, grew fretted, as brutes do; and one night he struck her.

"They ran for me. She was struggling and howling in a horrible attack of sorrow, anger, passion, I know not which, for who can divine what is passing in these rudimentary brains? I calmed her with morphine and forbade her seeing this man again, for I comprehended that marriage was infallibly leading her to death. Then she became mad. Yes, my friend, that idiot became truly mad. She thought of him always and awaited him always, day or night, sleeping or waking.

"As I saw her emaciating and pining, and as her obstinate regard never quitted the clocks, I had taken from the house every apparatus for the measurement of time. I took from her thus the possibility of counting; of counting the hours and of ceaselessly seeking in obscure recollections what moment he had formerly returned. I hoped at last to kill memory in her, and to extinguish that flame of thought that I had lighted with so much trouble.

"I have not succeeded. The other day I tried an experiment. I gave her my watch. She took it, considered it some time, then began to wait in a lamentable fashion, as if the sight of that little instrument had suddenly reawakened the memory that had begun to be dulled. She is thinner to-day than ever, with great hollow, brilliant eyes and a restlessness of nerves and body that keeps her pacing, pacing, back and forth like a caged tigress.

"I have had the windows barred, high shutters put to the glasses, and all the chairs screwed to the floor to keep her from looking into the street to see if he is returning. Ah! the poor parents; what a life they have passed."

* * * * *

We had arrived now on the hill.

"See," said the Doctor, facing about. "Look at Riom from here."

The gloomy old town had the air of an ancient, dead city. Behind us, as far as the eye could reach, stretched a green, wooded plain, dotted with villages and towns, wrapped in a blue vapourish mist that reached to the sky line; while to the right, clear to the horizon, ran a chain of round-topped knobs and mountains.

The Doctor still talked of the country and the summits and the history of this or that one. But I did not listen; I was thinking, thinking only of that poor mad girl, seeing only her; she seemed to hover, like a sorrowful spirit, over all that vast country.

I demanded brusquely:

"And the husband—what has become of him?"

"He lives at Royal on the income they allow him. He is happy and free."

Saddened a little and silent, both of us, we turned to go back. Just then an English T-cart, which had come up behind us, passed rapidly, drawn by a thorough bred. The Doctor clutched my arm.

"There," said he, "there he goes now—Du Bois."

And I saw a wide-brimmed grey felt, tipped over the ear, and beneath it two broad shoulders disappearing in a cloud of dust.

BESSIE.

"YOU'LL come again to-morrow?"

"I can't, besides——"

"Besides what?" curiously.

"You know, Dick, well enough," and the woman turned away.

The man kicked a stone viciously.

"Just once more," he pleaded; "I shall be going away soon now."

"Yes," replied the woman sadly, "and I shall be glad when you have gone. I can't help it, but I know that to meet you like this is very, very wrong."

"Rot!" the man ejaculated.

"No it is not rot, Dick, but I will try and come just once more."

She stood facing him now, a little thing with soft, fair hair clustering round her almost childish face.

He was so tall that he had to bend to look into those wistful, upturned eyes.

He took her little face between his hands and kissed it.

A man with hair streaked with grey, and a slight stoop, passed them; he half paused, then hurried on swiftly.

They did not see him; they were looking at each other.

"Let me go, I shall be so late."

"Then promise to come to-morrow?"

"If I can."

"I shall expect you. Good-bye, darling."

* * * * *

A man and his wife were sitting in the drawing-room, while the late autumn sun flooded the room with colour as it slowly set.

He was reading the paper and smoking his beloved pipe.

She was working, and her thoughts kept time to her stitches.

"How dreadfully old he is looking to-night"—stitch, stitch.

"What ages we have been married"—stitch, stitch—"more like thirteen years than three"—stitch, stitch—and she sighed.

The man (he was not so very old either) laid down his paper, and looked at her, opened his mouth to speak, but stopped, and took up his paper again.

"Why didn't we meet three years ago?" A pause. "I wonder why I married him?" Stitch, stitch, stitch—angrily now.

"How he stoops! Always poring over those musty old books, I suppose"—stitch, stitch. "I don't think he stooped like that three years ago. I wonder——" She laid down her work and closed her eyes.

The man smoked furiously.

"I am going out shooting to-morrow," he said.

"Shooting!" She sat up and looked at him. "I didn't know you cared about it."

"One must have a change," shortly.

"A change; perhaps he was weary too!"

"You look tired; you had better go to bed. I must see to my gun and things; I shall be very late to-night."

He went into the library and locked the door; then he took a large parchment document out of his desk, and read it over.

After that he began to write. Sheet after sheet of notepaper he covered, pausing at length to look at his wife's portrait which smiled down at him over his table.

"No, no," he muttered, "better not," and he threw the paper on the fire and watched it burn and smoulder away. Then he took a fresh sheet and wrote five words on it, and placed it with the parchment in a drawer.

A clock chimed three a.m. The man did not heed it but sat smoking. At last, as daylight dawned, he took up his gun and examined it.

A hurried pretence of breakfast in the grey morning light, then he stole up to his wife's room. She was sleeping peacefully.

"Bessie," he said softly.

She opened her blue eyes bewildered.

"You are up very early," she said.

"It will be late when I come home; I want you to kiss me, dear."

She looked at him astonished.

He did not often ask for kisses now.

The man took her little arms and placed them round his neck, and held her close to him.

"Bessie, dear," he said, "I have not made you very happy, but I am going to try and make you happier."

Then he kissed her and went downstairs.

* * * * *

It was a long sunny day, the late roses were heavy with perfume, and the birds sang unceasingly.

At the gate, by the cornfield, the man and woman met. She was very white; they were to say good-bye. She meant never to see him again.

The sun had set when she went slowly home. The house was dark and still; she was, oh! so glad she could not talk just yet, and the light would hurt her eyes.

Going into the library she sat down.

Oh! how she longed for a change. If only she could go away for a little time, it would be easier to bear then.

Yes, she would write to those friends up North, that would be far away.

The woman lit a lamp and searched for some notepaper.

She could not find any, she knew there had been some yesterday.

She opened a drawer. A folded parchment document, and on the top a sheet of paper. There was a sudden commotion in the hall; he was coming home; she must get the letter written quickly; she seized the sheet of paper.

A knock at the door.

"You are wanted at once," said a strange voice. A sudden fear struck her. Still holding the paper in her fingers, she followed the man out into the hall.

On a stretcher lay her husband, dead. He had accidentally shot himself.

Bessie glanced mechanically at the paper which she still held. On it was written:

"God bless you, my darling."

WE sat together in the verandah at Shepheard's Hotel. Cairo lay beneath and around us—Cairo, filthy, multi-coloured, malodorous, but always picturesque. Suddenly an Arab came round the corner, and, with a salaam of the deepest, handed some letters to Grimshaw. Then he squatted down on the verandah boards, with his great black eyes fixed on my companion's face, waiting for further orders.

"Your boy, Captain?" I asked.

"Yes," replied Grimshaw; "but a good deal more than that: I should be buried in the Soudan now if it were not for Ibrahim yonder."

"Tell me about it, please," I said rather eagerly, for this small Arab in the clean, white tunic and brilliant turban interested me mightily.

Grimshaw settled himself back in his bungalow chair and began:

"You know, of course," he said, "that I was in Khartoum with Gordon. I did not regularly belong to the General's forces, but I had volunteered as one of his aides-de-camp. Well, we were shut up in that death-trap city Khartoum, surrounded upon every side by the forces of the Mahdi—myriads of fanatical Soudanese Arabs following that high priest of bloodshed.

"We English were but a mere handful of men; the auxiliary forces were wretchedly small. Our only hope was aid from Egypt, and, as the whole world knows, that never came. Poor Gordon was allowed to fall a victim to the Mahdi's sword, and most of the garrison were slain. With the exception of Slatin Bey, who became a Mussulman, I think, I was the only European who got out of the doomed city with my life. That I did so is due to Ibrahim."

Here the Arab boy—on hearing his name mentioned—looked up and smiled, showing a row of teeth exceptionally even and white.

"A few days after we entered Khartoum," continued Grimshaw, "I was patrolling the town under General Gordon's orders, when we came across a great rabble of boys, hallooing and shouting at a deafening rate. I sent an Egyptian soldier to discover the cause, and he reported that the young 'fuzzy-wuzzies' (it is so that Private Atkins of her Majesty's troops denominates the Soudanese) were 'having fun' with one of their number. I was then, as now, intensely interested in native manners and customs. Halting my men I entered the boisterous cordon of boys to determine the reason of the tumult.

"The little rascals were teasing one of their number. 'Teasing,' indeed, in this case, is too mild a word. They were beating and stoning the lad, who lay bruised and half blinded in the gutter. His turban was off, and his already scant clothing had been torn to shreds. I sprang into the middle of the mob, and demanded the cause of such brutal treatment. At first they affected not to understand my Arabic, and went on beating their victim; but when I had soundly cuffed one or two and summoned my interpreter to my aid, I succeeded in making them answer.

"'He is the renegade's son,' said a ringleader—'Hassan the renegade's son. Stone him, in the name of the prophet.'

"Then I understood. The poor boy's father had taken service with Gordon, leaving his offspring to suffer all the cruelties which the Khartoum children, egged on by their elders, were sure to inflict upon him. I lost no time in calling up a few men, and sending that pack of youthful fanatics to the right about. They went away, vowing dire vengeance on the 'renegade's brat,' and I raised my protégé from the dust. He had fainted from pain and loss of blood; but one of our surgeons soon brought him to. When he opened his eyes and saw me, he smiled like a coffee-coloured angel, and wanted there and then to give me his best salaam. Of course I made him lie down again; but he blurted out his gratitude for preservation so vigorously that he became near fainting again.

"Next day his father, Hassan, one of Gordon's servants, came to see him. The two had a long talk, and finally Hassan announced that, for his son's sake, he had decided to leave the General and go back to the cobbler's stall in the bazaar. Ibrahim—for the lad whom I had helped to rescue was the same one now sitting before you—soon recovered, thanks to his native tough constitution. He left my hut, absolutely refusing to touch any of the money which I offered him.

"'Protector of the poor,' he said in his quaint, grandiloquent eastern way, 'you have saved your servant's life. Did not the mouse once repay the lion that had been his benefactor? Lo! I am the mouse, effendi, and you are the lion. Perhaps, some day, I may repay you. Salaam, friend!' Then he backed out of my hut; and I did not see him again for many days.

"One evening, while hurrying through the bazaar on my way to General Gordon's quarters, a boy sprang out of a cobbler's stall and handed me a tiny bundle—I had no time to more than recognise him as Ibrahim, son of Hassan. I carried the bundle to the General, and together we undid the fastenings. Have you ever deciphered an Oriental object letter? I mean a letter which is not written upon paper, but of which the sense is conveyed by objects—flowers and the like. The bundle handed to me by Ibrahim was just such a communication. It contained a queer collection of articles. They were: a piece of broken knife blade; a scrap of green cloth; two flowers (marigolds, I think) with only the head remaining; a brick from the walls; and, lastly, an iron affair, which I at once recognised as the point of one of those sticks with which camels are urged onwards.

"General Gordon lost no time in unravelling the mystery of this missive.

"'The Green Cloth,' he said, 'means the Mahdi; because his sacred flag is green. The knife blade stands for a sword; and the decapitated flowers mean that our heads are going to be cut off. The brick, I take it, hints of treachery inside the walls. The camel-spike advises you to fly from Khartoum immediately. Where did you get this?'

"When I told him the source of my information he was inclined to pooh-pooh Ibrahim's letter. 'It is a boy's fear and fancy,' he said. 'We shall be relieved in a few weeks.'

"But the Mahdi's men formed an impenetrable circle round the town—a circle that grew ever narrower and narrower. Day after day we scanned the desert horizon for some sign of the expected relief, but without avail. Day after day the impression grew stronger upon each and all of us that we were doomed.

"During an early morning walk, Ibrahim accosted me as suddenly as he had done before. This time he carried no object-letter.

"'Fly, effendi,' he whispered. 'The city is betrayed. My father and other Mussulmans have decided to let the Mahdi within the gates. Disguise yourself and fly before it is too late.'

"I shook my head, for duty kept me in Khartoum; and Ibrahim retreated with tears in those big, honest eyes of his.

"The very next night his warning was fulfilled. It would be idle, my friend, to tell you over again all the horrors of the capture, or rather betrayal, of Khartoum. The Mahdi soldiers were like fiends incarnate. Spent with fatigue and slender fare, we could not stand before them. Gordon, poor fellow, was slain; and a remnant of us were driven fighting for life from hut to hut, across the city. Finally, with empty revolver and broken sword, I found myself in the stairway of a rude minaret, waiting for the death which I felt to be inevitable. It is all very well to meet death boldly on the field of battle, with comrades and friends around one, but to sit down in a dark stairway and count the minutes until its coming, might make the bravest man in the world feel uncomfortable. All around I heard the hideous sounds of slaughter, and watched through a tiny loop-hole the wall of red flames shooting across the sky (for it was midnight, and a starless midnight to boot). A sick feeling stole over me. To remain cooped up thus seemed intolerable. I had just resolved to rush into the thick of the Soudanese and sell my life as dearly as possible, when a footfall on the stairs below arrested me.

"It was the sound of a naked foot; and as I peered, every sense on the alert, into the half-light of the minaret doorway, I vaguely distinguished a dark form and two shining eyes. Was it one of the Mahdi's warriors in search of human prey? I gripped my broken sword tighter, and prepared for action.

"'Effendi!' whispered a voice, 'is it you, protector of the poor?'

"The voice was that of Ibrahim, son of Hassan. My heart gave a leap for gladness, and I answered him that it was indeed myself.

"'It is good,' he exclaimed. 'My lord, I have come to save you. Hasten down, and don these garments which I have brought you. They belong to the old blind priest who lodged with my father. He died last night, but nobody knows of it yet. You can pass as the old priest and escape; make haste, Sahib, make haste!'

"I saw the chance, and seized it. Before you could have repeated the proverbial 'Jack Robinson' many times, I had pulled those baggy Mohammedan clothes over my soiled and bloodstained uniform. A turban took the place of my Khadi helmet, and around my face I draped the white hood which the Soudanese Arabs wear. Then, before I could protest, Ibrahim coolly seized a handful of mud and liberally daubed my face.

"'The Sahib is too white,' he explained. 'The old blind priest was always dirty and black—so kick off your boots, Sahib, and let me daub your feet.' Off went my boots, and in a minute or two my legs, from the knee down, were as brown (and as dirty) as they well might be.

"'You are all right now, effendi,' said Ibrahim; 'let me make for the Cairo gate.'

"With all my heart I thanked the boy; but he would listen to no thanks. 'You saved my life; I'll save yours,' he said. 'Remember, effendi, the mouse and the lion. Let us hasten to the gate.'

"'But you are not coming,' I began, when my protest was interrupted by a troop of black Mahdists surging into the little bye-street where we stood. Never shall I forget the sight they presented, in the false light of the burning city, with their huge piles of hair, their ferocious faces, and their spears and scimitars dripping with blood. I had given myself over for lost, when Ibrahim gripped my hand, led me onward, calling in sing-song tones: 'Make room for the blind priest. Room for Amed, son of Ali, the soothsayer. The light of Allah is upon the blind priest.'

"Taking the hint, I plucked up courage enough to shout the war-cry of the Mahdi. The fuzzy-wuzzies, entirely deceived, joined in my cry. 'Bide your time, holy father,' said one of them; 'we'll give you plenty of Christian heads later on.'

"Then they left us, whooping like demons down the street. But Ibrahim plucked at my sleeves, and mechanically I followed him. Many times we met such parties of the Mahdists, but in the darkness our ruse succeeded beautifully, and we reached the Cairo gate in safety.

"Around the gate, despite the confusion, a strong guard had been posted. In the open space without, many scores of camels were sprawling.

"'A camel for the Mahdi's messenger!' cried Ibrahim in his shrill voice. 'Ho, brothers! A camel for the blind soothsayer, Amed, son of Ali, who bears the Mahdi's defiance across the desert.'

"A dozen dusky warriors surrounded us; and as many awkward camels were prodded to their feet. One of these ungainly beasts was made to kneel, while Ibrahim made a great show of helping the supposed blind priest to a seat upon its back.

"Just then a tall fuzzy-wuzzy—clearly an officer—rushed forward. 'Who is this?' he demanded. 'Where does this man go? The orders are that none shall leave the gates before daybreak.'

"My heart sank, but, fortunately for us, the natural superstition of the Arabs came to our aid. 'Have a care!' cried one of the soldiers. 'It is a blind priest—a soothsayer. He may curse you.' The officer stepped back involuntarily, eyeing me with fear. 'Give us your blessing, holy father,' chorused a dozen onlookers.

"Here was a new predicament. I could not remember enough Arabic at the moment to give the desired blessing; but a whisper from Ibrahim recalled to my mind a simple form of words, which, eked out by discreet mumbling on my part, and the loud responses of the boy, suited the Arabs well enough. They prostrated themselves—the officer with the rest, amid a great cry of 'Allah Ackbar.' Then Ibrahim smote our camel soundly, and away we went, through the outposts, speeding fast from the gory city of Khartoum.

"The perils and adventures of that journey were too numerous to be told at one sitting; but it was nearly a month after that awful night that our camel limped into Cairo, carrying on its back two emaciated fugitives who had once been an officer of the line and an Arab boy.

"Ibrahim has been all round the world with me since, and will probably continue to be my comrade until one of us twain departs this life for ever—eh, Ibrahim, old friend?"

The Arab lad smiled, and spread out his hands. "My fate is thine, effendi," he said. "You saved my life."

"On that score, Ibrahim," answered Captain Grimshaw. "I think we are quits. Remember Khartoum."

That this new form of competition is likely to prove more popular than any yet started in Short Stories during its existence is proved by the enormous number of attempts received at this office in the first competition. RESULT OF POST-CARD COMPETITION.

Of the several hundreds of experiences sent in for this competition, the following, forwarded by Mr. John Beveridge, of 3, Fishmonger Alley, Fenchurch Street, E.C., has been selected as the best. A penknife has been awarded to Mr. David Beveridge, of the same address, who attested to the truth of the statement.

I am not likely to forget what occurred when I received my first salary, as it is often made the subject of a joke against me in our family. I was barely thirteen years old, and the sum of 4s. a week (which I started with) seemed quite a lot of money. On the Saturday afternoon that I first received it, I had made arrangements to meet a girl that lived a few doors from me, and felt quite manly as we got a steamer up to Richmond, where, after a walk, I paid for tea and various other little expenses until she said it was time she was getting home. Then the thought struck me about money for the return journey, which I had forgotten all about, and when I counted up my remaining cash found it amounted to 2½d. My pride had a great fall as I explained the matter to the girl, who immediately turned as cross as possible and said she had no money with her, so we got on a 'bus as far as they would take us for the twopence, then started to walk home, a distance of about eight miles, and when we arrived her mother told me I ought to be ashamed keeping her daughter out so late. And ever after that I dreaded the sight of that girl as much as people do the tax-collector.

HER TRELLVE TOES.

"I WILL not give you back your letters," said he.

But I must have my letters back, and that night as I walked straight to the wardrobe and drew the curtain up and saw me and opened the door herself.

There was a wardrobe cupboard with curtains before the key in the lock.

Then a key rattled in the lock, and I did the only little package of "legal cap," and pens, and inkstand, on the mantelpiece?

Sally was a girl you could trust. She was a plain brute!—"you'll find a better girl in no time."

Ben—I mean Mr. Howard; he was Ben to me no Mr. Javerell, because he is engaged to my Aunt Ophelia, and now I intended to tell her the facts of the case and keep it to lend the lodgers when they lose their key-money. Secondly, I—I—only meant to tiff a little—not need and meet me at the station."

I knew that Ben—I mean Mr. Howard—was out by his room.

Then Henry walked away, and Ben—yes, Ben, my pipes.

"Ben," said the strange person, "you are not looking what belongs to me. And you will, won't you?"

"Oh, my dear," he answered, "you cannot have all the rings. Now, I shall lock you in and sit on the stairs to-day my dearest friend, and the only one who knows the stairs.

"We were engaged to each other," said Ben, "and I will be getting things ready for dinner, and Sarah kissed them, and took down my photograph and kissed you exactly at four."

I drew a chair to the desk, sat down, and turned a cigar box.

"There is but one woman in the world for me," said Howard."

And cold shivers ran up my back when Sally unlocks all the drawers and desks in the house. We heard the street door open and bang shut and feet ascend and look for my letters.

"And I want you to help me to get them, Sally," I said I.

"Ah, whatever you please, Miss Travis. I suppose I'll hide it from the world, and you will never speak of fool, Henry.

"It is a splendid idea," said Sally. "You'll have to buy those things for my wife, and you pack up what you wouldn't tell another fellow, but I believe my heart is all. She's a mercenary little wretch, but I—I am a window, and Sally, who was making a cherry pie, looked horrible Mr. Henry. "Now, you'll come up and spend eight o'clock, and at nine I tapped on the basement to break off, only to frighten you. Thirdly, I—I—oh, poor Ben—took a bundle of letters from his bosom and back.

And then and there I sat down and told her all about the fact that my grandfather did not leave me his own letters."

"You'll not have any trouble in six months," said the Ben. "There now, I've done. You know my trouble. that you are not engaged to me any longer, Mr. moment.

"But you have no right to keep them," said I, "now I've found out that you really truly love me, Ben—and unlocked the door and we were really in the room—by another man.

"I'm feeling wretchedly," said Mr. Howard. "I keep watch, though nothing can happen. I'll come for they are. Good-bye, Miss Travis."

"Gentlemen don't talk of law; they think of honour," and a blotting-pad.

They shut the door and sat down. They lit their correspondence. I always kept the rough draft of mine, but just as good as gold. I had told her everything, possible thing to avoid discovery—at least for a little thing, with something the matter with her spine, and he never wanted me. I came to get my letters, but loved her better than my life, and I thought she was longer—lived with Sally Grey's mother.

"I suppose he keeps the letters in his desk," said she. And I was about to try my key on the drawers when I said. "To let me get into Mr. Howard's room and take lunch, darling."

"Stuff and nonsense!" said this Mr. Henry—heartless and there's no law in the land to make me give up my property has a good deal to do with things being as well."

"I love her still. I shall keep her photograph all my life—and her letters to read and kiss—I would not give that, and then, having pulled a bag from the corner, he sat up in bed I thought of the way to do it.

There was nothing inside but some notepaper, and a broken—there, don't laugh. You see that photograph rubbing the forks and glasses. I'll get the pass key—of advantage! You have jilted me, and you can say what very fond of me. But you know how grandfather cut it. I ran towards it and stood bolt upright in the I—well there I was—it was not a situation to impart it to anyone, I know."

"Oh, dear," I thought, "where can I look now?" corner as Ben—I mean Mr. Howard—entered, followed them up."

"It is only me in the flesh, Ben," I said. "I wish I was wait until lunch is over, and Miss Peck and Mrs. Jones call upon her, and she picked a quarrel with me—that's me out of his will, and then a rich old fellow began to go out. Then mother will lie down for a nap, and Biddy you may keep them. I—I've misunderstood you, and love you very much—and I couldn't be going to marry old how Ben and I came to make up our quarrel.

I shut the desk and looked in the drawer. There was a ghost so that I could vanish. And now you can boast though we part for ever, forgive me, Ben."

"Is it her ghost?" I heard him say to himself, and all your life, if you like—and I will say something. Firstly, I did not care about your grandfather's horrid dignity.

And Sally was my bridesmaid when I married, and is your holiday with me, won't you? I'll just step out and though it is broken off—I—I want to know—I used to get her to let me go into Ben's room while he was away "I know he doesn't put them in his trunk, but this key you please, and I can prove the truth by our course we have one for every room. Now, do stay for it and about the letters.

The next moment he was staring at me and I at him.

THE ILLUSTRATION AT THE ORTHOPÆDIC.

The young person in question was, I should think, about four years old, and she held, on the occasion of which I speak, the undivided attention of some twenty young gentlemen and even of a couple of older gentlemen of scientific aims. She was not so very important a young person, either, being a charity patient at a famous hospital where little ones of deformed limbs are treated. Yet, perhaps, she was not so very poor a little girl, because there were two red ribbons tying up her brown hair, and quite a wide frill of lace about the neck of her plaid dress.

Her mother carried her into the lecture-room and placed her upon a high table, and then left her to dangle her little bare legs until the lecturer should be ready to use her as an illustration.

The young person gazed thoughtfully about the room, at the odd instruments behind her and the students in front. Neither proved of sufficient interest to retain her gaze, and she presently devoted her attention to her mother, the nurses, and a few other pitiful ones in an adjoining room, who were playing unconcernedly amid surroundings which might have saddened them had they been older.

The lecture was vividly interesting, and the students looked at the little maid as they had, perhaps, looked at numerous other little maids with red bows and big brown eyes, as merely a convenient deformity that made the lecturer's words easier to understand. They were not a particularly pleasant looking lot of young men. Their clothes fitted badly, and it was obvious that their paths had been rural and their bringing up uncareful. Our little girl, although she certainly could not have told why, was not approving of them. She looked them over, as an older person looks at a monotonous landscape, with an eye open for possible beauty.

"You see, gentlemen," the lecturer went on, "the exactly opposite set of conditions occur in these two cases. In the boy's there is talipes varus, that is, the foot curves inwards; in the girl"—the child looked gravely down upon him as he took her little leg gently into his hand and moved it upward—"here is talipes valgus, the foot curves outwards." The class bent forward. "In this, however, an abnormal development of——" It was an highly important illustration. The medical journals had noted the case at length.

Only one man in the room was looking elsewhere than at the piteously twisted limb in the doctor's hand. There was a look about the child's little mouth which reminded him of someone whom he should see within a couple of hours. They would dine together. This was her birthday. He would give her the sweets he had chosen with such care and which he had now in his pocket. He could see her delight over the unexpected revelations in the box. It certainly would be the first time she had been presented with her own initials on each sweet. Then the tongs with tiny golf-drivers for claws, and the filagree paper perfumed with wood-violet, and the criss-crossing of violet baby-ribbon over the mauve and white confections. The bonbonnière was of silver with a pretty lid. It was a love of a box and he felt justly proud of it. The lecture was good, of course, but he should be glad when it was over.

A bored sigh from the little maid echoed his wish. She was looking dully about the room again, and presently her big brown eyes lit upon the young man who leant back while the others leant forward, and who looked upon her with friendly eyes while the others examined her feet. She returned his glance with grave scrutiny. He pleased her. He was good to look upon. He had a flower in his coat. Clearly this was something she did not expect among this crowd of ugly men. The little maid was unconsciously realising the difference between a good-looking chap, with a good tailor and an eye for ties, and the student who is too absorbed to care what he has on.

They looked steadily at each other, the young fellow with a smile on his lips, and the child with pleased appreciation dawning in her eyes. Suddenly she smiled also. Then she laughed aloud.

"Pretty man," she chuckled, pointing with her chubby forefinger at the well-groomed youth.

There was a roar from the class and the young fellow blushed a fiery red at the honours thrust upon him. The man next him grinned.

The lecturer, with a smile, proceeded to the boy's case. The girl felt her foot free and extended her arm to the class.

"I want to go to him," she cried, her lips quivering with excitement.

"Hush, dear," said the nurse reprovingly. But the child persisted.

"Take me down," she begged, with her eyes fixed on Leggatt.

He shook his head smilingly at her, and turned his face resolutely towards the lecturer. In a second or so, in spite of himself, he stole a glimpse at the child. She was still seated at the table, dangling her poor little legs, with her arms pleadingly extended and with great tears gathering in her eyes.

Young Leggatt moved uneasily, tried to look away, uttered a forcible exclamation under his breath, and then, finally, with an impulse he could not control, dashed out of his seat to the front of the room and took the now sobbing child in his arms.

The lecturer frowned—it was his duty to frown—then turned his back so that he was not supposed to know what was going on. The young fellow retired with the little girl to the end of the hall and sat down, taking her upon his knee. The nurse hovered near. The little girl's eyes danced. She smiled up at the handsome youth while he was wiping her tears away. Then she proceeded to have one of the best times in her poor little life. She found out why his hair was parted in the middle, and why he wore a pin. She played with his watch and traced his initials on its back. She learnt how to make rabbits out of handkerchiefs, and elicited his admiration of her own new one with the blue flower in the border. His pockets revealed unknown treasures. She made hieroglyphics on his ivory tablets with a silver pencil. So far there was mutual enjoyment.

It was when she was going through his last pocket that she unluckily chanced on the bonbonnière. The outside box was tied with pretty pink string. She wanted the string. The young man gave it to her. Naturally, then, she opened the box to see what was inside. This had not been the programme. Inside was another box. How funny! The second box was glittering. Funnier still! Perhaps it would open also. Just at this juncture young Leggatt had his attention distracted for one perilous moment, and when he came back to his play with the little maid he received an unpleasant shock.

She had opened the silver lid and was gazing in an ecstasy of delight at the sweets and ribbons within. With a feminine intuition she recognised the contents, although she could never have seen anything similar. She looked up at him gaily, as if it had been a game and she had found the handkerchief.

"Sweets," she cried joyfully.

"Yes," said the miserable but truthful young man. Then she generously offered him one. He seized the opportunity and took the box from her.

"See," he said, wishing he had never been born, "pretty box shuts. Now, wrap it up. Put it away," and he slipped it into his pocket. Her face looked grieved wonderment at him, and he weakly added: "Hunt for it again."

She looked doubtfully at him for a minute while he basely tried to divert her attention. He pointed out the big clock beside him and the interesting fact that the pendulum swung all night and day. But the little maid, not being of the sex which is concerned with the insides of machines, gave the most cursory glance at the clock and began an instant search for the fascinating sweets.

The young fellow groaned within himself. If it were an ordinary box the poor little thing would be welcome to it. But this especially ordered one, with her initials on each sweet, the precious tongs and box with her monogram on its lid! There was no time to get anything else for her. In less than an hour he would be at her birthday dinner. Why had he been such an idiot as not to have sent it by post? To let himself into this scrape just because he was beguiled into wanting to give it into her hands himself, and see her radiant face. And if he let her birthday go by without a reminder, she might indeed be hurt. Perhaps she would say "No," when so careless a lover asked her to marry him. Then that fellow, Rowley—no doubt his present was already received. He had been so cock sure of being able to knock Rowley out with the daintiness and appropriateness of his own gift. Rowley would never have thought of anything so novel. Hang it all, the youngster should not have these sweets. He would buy her a couple of boxes to-morrow and send them to her.

A sudden shuffling of feet warned him that the lecture had ceased. He looked down at the child. She had found the box and was preparing to open it again.

"I must go, little one," he said. "I will bring you two boxes of sweets to-morrow. Let me have this one."

But she clung to it.

"No, baby keep it," she said forlornly.

It was the note in her voice that told how accustomed she was to having things taken from her, that went to young Leggatt's heart. He tried, miserably, to detach her little fingers. But she held tight and the tears began to come into her eyes. With a quick ejaculation he desisted from his half-hearted task. They looked at each other for a second in silence, the baby girl, the tears running down her cheeks, a pitiful quiver on her lips, the man with a struggle in his face. She held the box close in both small hands. Suddenly he beckoned to the nurse.

"Will you take this little girl?" he asked gently, kissing the child good-bye. "There are a few sweeties here," touching the box, "I hope you will allow her to keep them."

And he hurried out of the door.

He outstayed the others after the dinner party. The girl continued a conversation. "It was not kind of Mr. Rowley," she said, "to embarrass me by giving me such an expensive gift. A few flowers one likes. But a gold-lined box with my monogram on it, even if the value of it were disguised by filling it up with sweets! Why, even the sweets had my initials on them. It was execrably bad taste."

The young fellow pondered within himself. Had he any right to sail under false colours? Why not? But as the girl fixed her clear eyes upon him, he involuntarily told the truth. It was a bold narrative, and meant simply to honestly emphasise the fact that he had been guilty of the same bad form as had Rowley, and therefore deserving of no better treatment.

But somehow when he finished—though why should what was execrable taste in Rowley be thought a touching kindness in Leggatt—there were tears in the girl's eyes, and she extended her hand.

"You will go and see the little thing again," she said softly, "and I—I—should like to go with you."

"Always?" ventured the young fellow, his heart beating painfully.

He kissed her hand. Then he looked down into her eyes, and then—he kissed her lips.

MADGE ROBERTSON.

He was a poor clerk, without high aspirations, commonplace, ungainly, living valiantly, and inexperienced in deep emotion.

She was plain, dependent, badly informed, unattractive, and she lived because living seemed the custom. Neither had ever been in love—they had never gone beyond vague dreams of what love, marriage and a home, such as they saw all around them, might mean in their own lives.

And when they one day fell in love with each other both were surprised beyond measure—he that any woman could find him lovable; she that any man could deem her attractive. There came another surprise in the sweetness of the experience—the having of a sacred little world of their own, apart from the great swirling world around them, and the cosy sympathy, the timid confidences, the bashful caresses, the tenderness that came into their hearts, and the wider and brighter aspect of the world, that before had seemed so far removed.

After the first of the love-making had passed, and they had adjusted themselves somewhat to their new condition, and had found life broad and wholesome, the differences between them began to come into evidence.

Each magnified, beyond all reason, the goodness and charms of the other—to him she was an angel, a faithful devoted heart; to her he was a deity, an unspeakable blessing which God in His infinite goodness had sent into her dreary life. He loved her, she worshipped him; and that is the old, old story.

If she paid more careful attention to her appearance, it was to be pretty for his sake; if he was more careful in his dress and manner, it was because of that higher respect for himself which her love had inculcated in him. She lived for him only; he for himself—and her. To her it was all a beautiful dream, to him, an awakening. It inspired him with ambition, her only with devotion. With her, dull earth had dropped away and radiant heaven had opened; with him earth remained, but had lost its dullness and had become shining and pleasant. She would have died for him; he would have preferred to live to make her happy and to enjoy himself the good which had come to him. And all this is merely the old, old story.

Surely he could not have been after all, so inferior as he had deemed himself before her love came into his life. He reflected that he had been under-estimating himself, and that if so good and sensible and loyal and tender a soul as she could find admirable qualities in him, such qualities must exist and be patent to the world. Thus grew his pride, and then his vanity. It was as grateful to his self-love as it was to her devotion, to humble herself before him, to look up to him, to hang upon his words, to repose her heart, her life, wholly in his keeping, to be eager to serve him, to renounce everything for his sake. In every way she encouraged him to take her life into his hands and make of it whatsoever he would.

The discovery of a self-surrender so complete, of a devotion so unrestrained, warmed the marrow in his bones. His spirit expanded, and the strength of a giant entered his soul. So much deeper and stronger than she did he come to feel—did she make him feel—that he began to regard her as a tender creature placed under his guidance—a frail, helpless, homeless dove, whom he must cherish, watch tenderly, and direct in the ways of his choice.

Thus it came about that he began to criticise her now and then, suggest changes here and improvements there; and she accepted these petty tyrannies as special blessing, and gloated over them, and trained her manner to accord with them, and deemed herself the most fortunate of all the girls to whom the great God in heaven had sent the priceless blessing of a good man's love. And all this, too, is only the old, old, story.

They were married at last. The world was very sweet and tender and beautiful in those rosy young days; and even poverty could not throw a mist over the morning of their lives. For was he not advancing in material ways at a pace which surprised the commonplace associates who, before she came into his life, had known him as a commonplace man like themselves. He even looked forward to the time when he might be rich and influential, when he would be spoken of as a self-made man, who, through sheer force of innate superiority had broken down the barriers which confine ordinary men, and had escaped into prosperity! How she pinched and patched and saved and contrived and planned! How able and shrewd she was in her suggestions, and how sensible he found them in practice. Surely, one of these days he would be called a remarkable instance of a self-made man?

In all possible ways she humbled and obscured herself. It did her good to see that in this way his pride and self-importance (which she knew to be admirable qualities) were developed and sustained, perhaps magnified. There was infinite sweetness even in the humiliation which she suffered when he tyrannised over her and treated her as an inferior being, and browbeat her over little things; in accepting his denomination, his prying into all the innocent little secrets and privacies of her woman-life, his interferences in and direction of her dress, her domestic affairs, and the minutest details of her small recreations.

What if he did make her read books which she did not like, entertain people with whom she could have nothing in common, and deny her the little cherished things that she wanted, and that he thought were trivial and injurious? What if, sometimes, he flew into a passion and heaped abuse and reproaches upon her, when she had tried so faithfully to please him, and had been so humiliated over her own shortcomings? What even, if a blow did come at last, that sent her reeling to the wall, her face blanched, and an inconceivable pain wringing her heart? Was not he the master, the king? Had she not sworn to love honour and obey him? And O, God in Heaven! did she not love him, and would she not have died for him?

The days grew longer then, and heaven—perhaps because she had become more accustomed to it—seemed not so bright as formerly. But still the fire of devotion (and who may know to what extent, if at all, it was fed by duty) burnt brightly within her heart. And what if chilling blasts should come in force seeking to overwhelm it and scatter it to the winds? Steadfast and devoted she had been to the end of the lengthening days. And this, too, is but part of the old, old story.

Towards the very end she did something—in an old, old story like this it never matters what—that sent his passion beyond the bounds within which a blow may bring satisfaction. In their own home, under the very chandelier which her hands had adorned with some fragile ornament, he thrust a pistol against her breast, while his eyes blazed, his face purpled, and his vituperations issued in thick and husky words. He stormed at her for not accepting gratefully the blessing of a comfortable home, of a husband who gave up all pleasures for her sake, and who slaved for her like a beast in the yoke.

And then, his passion rising under her complete abjectness and despair, lashed by the dumbness of white lips from which the power of speech had flown, maddened by the unspeakable reproaches, which, still tempered with the old tenderness, shone from her wide-staring eyes—he pressed the finger of murder upon the trigger.

A crash, a smothered gasp, and she sank to the floor, while he stood there looking down upon her; upon the white, pinched face upturned to his; upon wide eyes which, looking into his, spoke things which heaven has never given to lips the power to express; upon the painful heaving of her chest; upon the form, so lately alive with energy to do his bidding, lying so unshapely and disorganised on the floor; upon the thin stream of blood which so soon issued from her speechless lips; and as he thus looked down upon the pitiful wreck, there unfolded within him a mighty scroll, unwound by a flaming hand; and upon the whole length of it, suspended, as it were, from highest heaven and stretching thence down into nether-most hell, he read the dreadful tragedy of her sacrifice.

He was faint. He dropped the pistol; in falling, it touched her hand, and her fingers closed upon it. A distressing fulness, forcing itself upward, pressed upon his throat and sought to burst his temples. He staggered away from her, and fell weakly into a chair at the further end of the room; and her glance, tenderer now than it had been since the days had grown long and the light had faded from heaven, followed him thither and rested calmly upon him, as though caring for one thing only, and that, a last impression to take away with her on the wings of eternity and cherish fondly for ever.

Rising above her to confront him, the man saw a shadowy black frame, with a cross-beam from which hung a rope; and it was not in him to go and kneel beside her, and take her hand, and bestow a caress upon her, and beg the infinitely sweet boon of her forgiveness; it was only the scroll that he saw, and the calm, fond eyes, and the shadowy black frame above them.

Someone, attracted by the shot and the fall, came into the room. Was this the avenger of the law, the witness who would hear the accusation of the dying, the builder of the shadowy black frame? Painfully, slowly, the wife said to the intruder: "I have shot—myself; my husband—is not to blame!"

The black frame faded away with her words and her life, for was not the pistol in her hand? And the man, no longer burdened with her living, sat shrunken, cowering and wizened, in the chair.

PAUPER BLUE BLOOD

SUMMARY.

Georgina Pluff is a governess in the employ of the Ravenscrofts. Her charge is Eva, daughter of Sir Reginald and Lady Ravenscroft. Sefton, the only son, is engaged to Lady Norah Cannington, whose father, hearing on good authority of Sir Reginald's impending ruin, compels his daughter to write a letter to Sefton, saying that the engagement must be broken off. Before the financial crash arrives, Sir Reginald commits suicide in his own grounds, and Sefton's cup of bitterness is filled by the arrival of Lady Norah's letter. Georgina Pluff is aware of the late Sir Reginald's past, and threatens to expose his misdeeds unless she is married to Sefton. After the wedding Georgina visits her wealthy cousin, John Pluff, a retired grocer, and impresses him with her social position. Lady Norah receives a visit from a friend of Sefton, Douglas Shirling, who gives expression to his opinion concerning her treatment of Sefton.

CHAPTER VII.

The Market of Souls.

"Who spoke that word? Who called me 'Old Leather-lips'?" thundered John Pluff after a group of boys who were running across a field. He was too hot and stout to give chase, though he shook his fist at the retreating figures.

"Georgina, my dear," turning to Lady Ravenscroft, "this is your land, I believe?"

"Yes, but Sefton is going to let it to Farmer Hicks."

"Never mind, it belongs to you now, and those boys were trespassing. I informed them of the fact, and they addressed me in most insulting language."

"There is nothing on the face of this earth," retorted Georgina, "that can make itself more abominable than the small boy."

Lady Ravenscroft was looking out of sorts and annoyed. Her cousin had forced his society on her, and made her ridiculous in the eyes of everybody. Mr. Shirling, who had arranged to leave the day before John Pluff's arrival, stayed on at Sefton's urgent request. Georgina warned her husband that this relative was hardly one she would have chosen to present, but Sefton never considered her feelings, and failed to take the hint. Of course Douglas Shirling was laughing at her and John Pluff behind their backs, though he appeared unusually grave, never seeming to notice the gaucheries of Lady Ravenscroft's grocer cousin. That was natural enough in Mr. Shirling she told herself—a sign of his good breeding—well-bred people were all hypocrites, according to Georgina.

"I've been all round the place, and it's first class," announced Mr. Pluff. "You only want money to keep it up, and you might entertain dukes and duchesses by the score. Give them the best dinners they've ever sat down to, pour out your coin ad lib., and you might be a shining light in society on the very top rail. Bah! it's a wasted chance, Georgina."

She raised her eyes pathetically.

"It is indeed, cousin John. I think, too, that I should know how to make the most of wealth, if it came my way. I feel that the true spirit of the hostess is in my veins. I should fling myself into the part body and soul. I would show Sefton I know the ropes, and he would never feel that he had married an outsider."

"Ah! Georgina, you're up to snuff, and no wonder, since you come of my stock. Our family was always for bettering themselves, and pushing to the front. But look here, my girl, it strikes me that you and the master ain't very chummy; 'ad a bit of a row, eh?"

"Oh! no," shaking her head sadly, "Sefton is always like that now, just dull and indifferent."

"It's a bit soon to begin. Rather a change to before marriage, I reckon. Ha! ha!" breaking into a gruff guffaw, "I should 'ave liked to see you two love birds spooning about here in old Sir Reginald's time. He'd have been down on the governess hammer and tongs, eh!"

John Pluff laughed again; he did not notice the grey hue that crept over the woman's face.

"You quite misunderstand," she said; "Sir Reginald had a great regard for me. If anything, he treated me as his superior. I was never looked down upon, and I dined every night with the family."

She tilted her chin in the air as she spoke, and rounded her words.

"No offence, dear," murmured Mr. Pluff humbly, looking at her with renewed reverence. "But what's altered the young spark? Why does Sir Sefton look so down in the mouth? You would not think he'd married for love, though of course, situated as you was, there could be no other reason."

"Shall I give you the key of the whole matter?" cried Georgina, twisting her fingers together, and rocking from one foot to the other with a half nervous, half impatient movement.

John Pluff nodded.

"Money," snapping her fingers, "or rather the need of it, which my husband has never before known. Is not that enough to age and sour a man?"

They had wandered out into the country roads, and as Georgina spoke a Victoria came in sight. A girl, exquisitely gowned, leant back in the carriage with rather a strained expression, and a bright hectic flush rising under her white veil. Beside her sat a peevish-looking youth, whose lips were set. They were not speaking.

Georgina bowed, and the girl returned it unsmilingly, the man raised his hat, a cloud of dust, and they were gone.

"Who are those swells?" asked John Pluff curiously.

"Lady Norah Cannington and the Duke of Malvern."

A low whistle, and a widening of the eyes, as Georgina's cousin regarded her admiringly.

"My!" he said, and collapsed into silence.

"Lady Norah is a very old friend of the Ravenscroft's. I dare say she was coming to call on me with the Duke."

Georgina knew full well that this was not the case, but her mission was to impress John Pluff with her poverty and grandeur. She spared no pains.

The sight of Lady Ravenscroft had come at an unfortunate moment for Norah Cannington.

The jealousy, the pique, which she could not control, leapt into her heart as she passed Sefton's wife. She did not pause to consider that her resentment was unreasonable. Her brain seemed on fire, everything was slipping away.

Digitized by Google

She turned to the young Duke, and saw that his eyes were weak with rising tears. He had just declared his passion only to be refused. Norah knew well that Lord Cannington expected her to accept the offer—he intimated as much that very morning. She dreaded to think of the scene her decision would cause, anger from one parent—disappointment and reproaches from the other. Was it worth while? Her life could not be more bitter. She had no love to give, but this impressionable youth was not exacting, he would be happy and contented with a pretty face, and the shadow of a heart.

"Norah!" he broke in suddenly, his voice shaken by emotion, "you don't mean it—you can't? If you realised what you are to me, you would at least give it a day, an hour's consideration. Heaven knows I will try and make you happy."

Happy! Oh! the irony of that word.

"Is there no hope for me, now or in the future?"

She turned her head away. They were passing the gates of Ravenscroft Park. She felt the Duke of Malvern's fingers tighten over her gloved hand. A dull paralysed sensation deadened her sensibilities. She thought of Georgina's gushing bow, the triumph in her eyes. Why was Sefton so shortsighted? How could he believe she had really changed? His Norah faithless! It was impossible!

"Your eyes are softening," whispered a voice at her side. "I see light at last."

Lady Norah faced her youthful lover, with pallid lips, and a wan sweet smile.

"Yes," she said, "you shall make me—happy!"

Then she broke into a strange mirthless laugh, that tore her heart, and left it sore and bleeding.

A Victoria came in sight.

But the Duke of Malvern was happy, for what he called light was in reality merciful darkness, masking the hideous truth of Norah Cannington's wrecked life.

"I shall speak to your father to-night," said the Duke as they drove up to Rosemont.

On entering the house, Lady Norah slipped away, and softly opened the door of her father's study.

A vivid flash of memory brought back the night when Lord Cannington had broken the news of Sefton's altered fortune, and she had been weak enough to resign him under the pressure of a parent's influence.

"Father," she said, advancing to the desk and laying her hand on his shoulder.

He was writing letters in the same chair that she had written her last letter to Sefton Ravenscroft.

"Yes, my child."

He took the little hand tenderly, unaware of the silent misery he had caused. In his eyes, that passed episode was a girlish fancy she had long since forgotten. Why, the fellow was married now, she could not think of him still!

So Lord Cannington calmed the slight prick of conscience he felt, when the Ravenscrofts were plunged in mourning, and his daughter walked about looking like a ghost.

"I have come to tell you," said Lady Norah, "that I am engaged to Victor."

For the first time she spoke of the Duke of Malvern by his christian name.

A certain amount of pity for the worthless goods he was taking to his heart softened her towards him. Any other man must have known and seen how distant she was, how far away, even when he clasped her in his arms. But the Duke was not her equal intellectually, and she knew it, making allowances for him.

Lord Cannington was highly pleased at the news, and did not fail to express his feelings. She listened in silence, then drew away from the parental embrace.

"If you are glad," she declared coldly, "it's all right, only don't congratulate me in private. I shall have to suffer enough 'good wishes' publicly. I don't care what becomes of me in the least, all men are the same, but one, and you stopped me having him. Now I might as well go right as wrong, and I suppose the Duke of Malvern is the most eligible suitor in the market of souls."

Lord Cannington gazed at his daughter in dumb astonishment.

Never before was there such a hard, bitter ring in Norah's silvery voice. It was a revelation to him.

"What nonsense you are talking, child," he said, not unkindly. "I don't want to sell you, though I won't have you marry a pauper. Besides, if you are harping back to your old affection for Sefton Ravenscroft, that 'love,' as you called it, was merely child's play. How long did he remain faithful to the memory of his passion?"

The words stung Norah to the quick. Lord Cannington little guessed how deep a wound he was probing. He merely noticed that she stood very still, without moving a muscle.

"I only thought I would tell you," she said at last. "It is better to be straight, and speak the truth. I cared for no one before I loved Sefton, and I shall never care again. Therefore, from a worldly point of view it is as well to widen my interests, and try to live down my sorrow as Victor's wife. There is some satisfaction in social success, and it helps to kill the heart. Yes, father, I will kiss you now, I couldn't before, but I think you mean to be kind. I was a fool once, and you meant it for the best. I ought to have stood firm, and never to have given in, but it's easy to talk afterwards."

Her head fell on his shoulder, she stifled a sob which rose involuntarily.

"Don't let mother know. I would rather she thought I was happy. It will please her so much, this engagement with Victor."

"Norah, if you are posing to me as a martyr, if you don't want the fellow, say so, and have done with it. But on one point I will have an understanding. If you don't intend to stick to your word, tell him so at once. Do not wait till all England knows of it, and then back out the last moment. Make your choice now, and let it be final."

Lady Norah drew herself up.

"I do not go back from my word," she said. "You made me break it before."

"Is Norah here?" cried a voice outside.

It was Lady Cannington.

"Yes, mother. Come in and hear my news. I have been breaking it to father. I am going to marry the little duke."

She laughed lightly, the old merry twinkle returned to her eyes, but green eyes are false, and as Norah's gazed at her mother their sparkle lied, and her sudden vitality was the outcome of smothered pain.

Her head fell on his shoulder.

CHAPTER VIII.

A Duty Visit.

John Pluff was a thorn in the flesh to both Sefton and his wife, the former more especially rebelled against the grocer's invasion.

"Don't take the cad's money," said Sir Sefton gruffly, when Georgina pleaded her cousin's cheques were so useful, that she could not afford to shunt him, though of course she knew "he was different to other people," and a trifle too coarse for polite society.

"He's simply the essence of vulgarity," retorted her husband. "I don't know what you mean about 'different to other people,' the fellow is not mad, only low bred, disgustingly common, and what is far worse, puffed up with pride."

He took the little hand tenderly.

"I sometimes think you forget, Sefton, when speaking of John Pluff, that it is a delicate subject."

"Nothing very delicate about him that I can see."

"Your sensibilities become more blunted every day. Don't you remember the wretch is a relation of mine?"

"Well, I have not a chance of overlooking the fact, when you 'Cousin' him about everywhere."

"And now," continued Georgina, "he is death on our returning with him to Clapham. Should you mind a little visit there? We need not stay long."

Sefton turned to his wife with an incredulous, hard, superior smile.

"Go to Clapham!" he murmured, as if the bare idea was too absurd for discussion.

"Yes," answered Georgina firmly. "I don't often ask a favour of you."

"No, I fancy you asked enough before our marriage to last a lifetime. I hope you are satisfied. I trust that being Lady Ravenscroft has come up to your expectations."

Georgina tossed her head at his sneer, and replied deliberately. "You'll go to Clapham as a matter of business."

"I'll be hanged if I do!" muttered Sefton.

His tone forebade argument.

"Then at least you will have no objection to my accepting Cousin John's invitation."

She spoke spitefully.

"Certainly not. Go by all means. It makes absolutely no difference to me."

"Then I will make your excuses as best I can."

"Oh! don't trouble. I can tell Mr. Pluff."

"Yes, and say something to offend him. I know!"

"It is hardly likely I should be rude to any friend of yours in my own house, and if I were, John Pluff would not perceive it. He is too self-satisfied to take a snub." Georgina went slowly downstairs, and explained to her cousin, poor Sefton was feeling unwell, and not up to visiting, that was the reason he seemed silent and queer. She feared something wrong with his brain, and dreaded a doctor's bill.

Anyhow it would brace her up to get change of air, even at Clapham, and accordingly arranged to depart with Mr. Pluff the following morning.

"Pack all your best gowns," said her cousin, rubbing his hands together gleefully, "and I'll show you life on a large scale. If you don't mind a scarcity of dooks and lords, you shall be my hostess at some big dinner parties, where the guests will be smart, if nothing else. Not tradespeople—don't you fear, a bit more spicy than that—folks that live on the best champagne, and know how to dress. You see Mr. Jackson, a friend of mine, is manager at the D—— Theatre, and I am running the piece, providing the capital. Well, one good turn deserves another, I am mighty useful to him, and he has a very large acquaintance. He introduces me, and I entertain. To have Lady Ravenscroft at the head of my table will give me a lift, and it will do you good to have a fling. It ain't very amusing sitting in state waiting for the county toffs to call."

Georgina heartily agreed, for it was chiefly "waiting." The thought of "cutting a dash," as her cousin termed it, amongst people who would look up to her, instead of holding aloof, was alluring in the extreme.

She had ordered herself some beautiful tea-gowns, the bill for which John had promised to settle; they would arrive just in time. So thirsting for dissipation she gladly fell in with her cousin's plans, and commenced designing dinner table decorations of the most costly description. She said nothing of this, however, to her husband, declaring that she was simply going to Clapham for his sake.

"Forgive me for bowing down to the mammon of unrighteousness," she cried flippantly. "You will exist without me."

The last sentence verged on sarcasm. He received it in silence, while Georgina thought with pleasurable excitement of the many titled names among her husband's friends she could slip into her conversation for the benefit of Mr. Pluff's guests.

By so doing she would win his everlasting gratitude.

"But I won't be a snob for nothing," Georgina told herself. "I'll make him pay."

Sir Sefton watched them go with a sense of unutterable relief.

John Pluff did not deeply regret his absence, and boasted to Georgina, as they drove away, of the special railway compartment he had engaged for the journey, and the large tips he bestowed upon her servants.

Douglas Shirling was still at Ravenscroft Park. Numerous and attractive were the house-parties at which he had failed to put in an appearance, owing to his friend's intense need of companionship. Sefton grew daily more depressed and irritable, only cheering up in Shirling's society.

The latter noticed that after Georgina's departure her husband became quite his old self again. It was as if he had determined to throw off the burden while he could, and forget it even existed. He readily agreed to accompany Douglas back to his home—Lord Gatton's seat in Wiltshire. Change was what he wanted, change of scene, and freedom from Georgina.

His mother and Eva were staying at Ermyn Way, which made the prospect all the pleasanter, and the two men left Ravenscroft Park that same day.

"I wish I could afford to travel, I'd go round the world to-morrow," said Sefton in the train. He was thinking how delightful a long absence from Ravenscroft Park would be.

Douglas Shirling read his friend's thoughts, and compared his own happy-go-lucky existence, crowned by every happiness the world could give, with Sefton's unenviable lot.

The marriage was still as great a puzzle to him as the first day he set eyes on the now Lady Ravenscroft.

Douglas took up a paper and read it mechanically, till something made him gather his wits together. It was a paragraph announcing Lady Norah's engagement to the Duke of Malvern.

He went over it twice, then he looked up with a long drawn sigh.

"So she's going to do it!" he said, handing the paper across. "I wonder which of the two will regret it the most?"

A stony look came into Sefton's eyes, as he scanned the news. He was conscious of a burning ache within, a sudden quickening of the breath.

"She can't love that bilious looking puppy," he muttered savagely.

"Oh, no. Those sort of women don't go in for affection, it is out of their sphere, they can't comprehend it. They have the faces and forms of angels, the hearts and souls of devils."

Having delivered himself of this distressing statement,

"I wish I could afford to travel."

Douglas Shirling lit a cigar, buried himself behind a paper and ignored the presence of his friend. He knew just then it was the kindest thing to do, and Sefton felt grateful. He stared through the open window, picturing Norah and her lover in the dear old familiar haunts at Rosemont.

Would she sit on that same seat under the copper beech, talking of twin souls, and ridiculing affinities, with a charming laugh, till her bewildered adorer was reduced to a state of despair? Then, as she had done once before, sink on her knees in an attitude of mock humility, and plead forgiveness. Would she fish with him along the banks of the river, and murmur a pitiful apology to the gasping trout she killed against her boot? Sefton fancied he heard the smack of its head on her heel; while she feelingly declared "She could not bear that they should suffer, the little dears!"

And then the walk on moonlight evenings, when she trailed her dinner dress across the dewy lawn, shrinking from countless imaginary spectres in the bushes, only that he (whoever the lucky "he" might be) would place a protecting arm round her slim waist.

Unending were the memories that crowded back into Sefton's mind as the train whirled onwards.

But memory is only a wave washing the shore of the mind.

It drags back a handful of shingle, and swallows it up in the ocean of circumstance.

When Douglas Shirling spoke again, Sefton woke as from a dream. The waves were still once more, and the paper, with that loathsome announcement, fell unheeded at his feet.

"For the post," she said.

The fresh air dispersed his gloomy reflections, as he drove with Douglas through the quaint old town of Salisbury to Ermyn Way, in the high tandem that had come to meet them.

As they approached the house a group of familiar faces round a tea-table under the trees greeted Sefton.

There was his mother, in her black dress, flushing with pleasure at the sight of her son, and Eva scampering across the grass, just as in the old days, when they had all stayed together in Lord and Lady Gatton's home.

In the meanwhile Georgina was revelling in more ostentatious and less refined luxury at Queen's Gate House. She liked ordering John Pluff's large staff of servants hither and thither, being waited on hand and foot, and not having to think of the weekly books.

"I've got an exquisite idea for your dinner-table to-morrow night," said Lady Ravenscroft. "It is to be all blue and orange, the Ravenscroft colours you know. You can explain to your guests that you had it purposely arranged so out of compliment to me."

"Happy thought! Guess it will look grand," chuckled John Pluff. "I want to do it well for the Pynes to see. They are very rich people, and entertain in South Kensington. I've got an eye to Miss Pyne, between ourselves, Georgina. Her mother was one of the wealthy family of Moses, a decided Jewess, but that don't trouble me. Mr. and Mrs. P. are both going to honour us, likewise Miss Nesta P. and her two brothers."

"A perfect plague of Pynes," sighed Georgina impatiently, her heart beating faster with apprehension, as she thought of the daughter.

Would John Pluff make such a fool of himself as to marry a young girl at his age? She feared it was very likely. The bare idea turned her cold with fear.

"Now, two opinions are better than one," continued her cousin, "and I want you to tell me exactly what you think of Miss P. I am not one to be hurried, and I want the best in the market, so now you know."

"Very well. Then hold back, and rely on my taste. I should like to see you marry someone I should be proud of introducing to the country people at home. She must be good style, or, of course, I could hardly ask her to Ravenscroft Park."

John Pluff rubbed his chin.

"Well they are not so easy to find, Georgina. Now, Nesta (I like to call her Nesta), she is a well set-up fine girl, and dresses awfully smartly. I might do worse."

The conversation was becoming positively painful to Georgina. She longed to take John Pluff by the shoulders and shake him.

"I won't offer an opinion till after to-morrow."

She left him, feeling too aggrieved to continue the conversation, and locked herself into her room to regain her temper. It was maddening to think of a second marriage, when John Pluff's purse was all she had to rely on for suitable gowns to grace her position, and then there was always his death in view. If she wheedled herself sufficiently into his good graces, and steered him clear of designing females, it was even possible.

Georgina paused, and gasped at the thought which crept into her mind, and set her brain on fire.

Money! What would it not mean to her?

Sefton sneered at the wife who had forced herself upon him, but how would he treat her with John Pluff's fortune at her back?

Georgina clasped her hands over her heart to still its beating. These wild day dreams made her dizzy. She was sick of scraping and pinching, the luxury of Queen's Gate House filled her covetous soul with hungry longing.

It was an effort to bring her mind back to the practical reality of her uneasy existence. Surely she could devise some plan to add to her income.

A sudden inspiration seized her. She crossed to the writing table and wrote several letters, tearing them up in turn, but finally satisfying herself, addressed an envelope, and rang her bell.

"For the post," she said, as the maid answered the summons. "I wonder," she thought, "what Sefton would say to it. I don't care, I mean to have my way henceforth —in everything!"

With this resolve Georgina went down and rejoined John Pluff.

CHAPTER IX.

Youth and Age.

The garden of Queen's Gate House was flooded in moonlight, it was a stiflingly oppressive evening.

John Pluff's long dinner had almost exhausted the patience of the guests.

But interminable as the courses seemed, the grateful reaction of dessert arrived, then the welcome signal from Lady Ravenscroft, and a haven of repose reached in the blue satin chairs of a large drawing-room.

All the windows were flung open, crimson lanterns illuminated the verandah without, inviting a stroll in the fresh air.

Georgina had, from the moment of their arrival, subjected the Pyne family to severe criticism. They were her mortal foes, she thought, as she conversed with the overheated Jewess, whose face appeared in a state of melting moisture unpleasant to witness.

Her conversation consisted solely of admiring anecdotes connected with her daughter Nesta, and the "dear boys." She always alluded to her sons as the "dear boys." They were twin youths, tall, dark, and of Jewish countenance. Each wore a black rimmed eyeglass, very high collar, and extravagantly large buttonhole, which stamped them as unfashionable in Georgina's eyes.

"Buttonholes are not worn this season," she informed Mrs. Pyne, who was holding forth on the unique shade of the "dear boys'" carnations.

"Not worn! Why, Lady Ravenscroft, are you one of those unhappy women who follow the flock of sheep trooping to the slaughter-house of Fashion? It makes slaves of us all, not only in dress, but even in mannerisms and tricks of voice. I was told of a Lady-in-waiting who spent all her time endeavouring to sneeze like the Princess of Wales. It was during an influenza wave, and the fashionable sneeze became as well-known as the bonnet of the month."

Miss Nesta Pyne, a raven-haired beauty, gowned in scarlet, was seated at the far end of the room, gazing at a full length painting of John Pluff. Her dashing costume, and white arms and neck sorely disturbed Georgina's peace of mind.

"Just the style to attract him," thought Lady Ravenscroft, as the sound of her cousin's obtrusive laugh could be heard from the dining-room. It was a laugh that always made Georgina hot to her very ears. It generally burst forth after a story that were better left unrepeated. He would listen in silence, then came a sudden indentation of his features, a widening of the mouth, and finally like a cannon's roar—a rushing forth of impetuous sound, all-engulfing, deafening, hideous!

"It does me good to listen to dear Mr. Pluff's merriment," murmured Mrs. Pyne. "It is so robustly honest."

Lady Ravenscroft pursed up her mouth, shrugged her shoulders, and sought consolation by regarding her gorgeously flowing gown in a mirror opposite. She knew which chair to choose for this purpose. She still clung to her old fancy for dull yellow. In the days of Sir Reginald it was mustard coloured crépon, now she affected saffron tinted satin with pepper hued chiffon.

Georgina's swagger convinced these second-class people that she was far their superior, yet sweetly condescending, when promising to appear at various entertainments at their invitations.

"I shall be delighted to dine with you on the twelfth if Sir Sefton can spare me a week longer," or, "Really I ought to return to Ravenscroft Park, but," etc., etc.

She received no letter from Sefton, but found his name in a list of Lord Gatton's house party at Ermyn Way.

This fact was a boon to her throughout the evening.

Nesta Pyne sat silent and pensive till the gentlemen rejoined them. She had an expectant look on her face, as if she were waiting for something. Her expression irritated Georgina, who found herself perpetually tracing in the girl's features likenesses to people she knew.

John Pluff's eyes wandered round the room till they settled upon Nesta, then he took a seat beside her, and became mawkishly sentimental, and boastfully bouncing in turns.

"Sitting under my picture, eh?" he said, in answer to a murmured speech, breathed into his ear by Nesta's carmine lips. "It cost me a clear 'thou,' that bit of a daub, and they have not given me much of a mug either!"

Nesta gazed into his eyes and smiled bewitchingly.

"Sitting under my picture, eh?"

"Does that mean face?" she asked innocently.

John Pluff indulged one of his explosive fits at the innocent question.

"Bless me, you're as bad as my little Georgy there!" indicating Lady Ravenscroft. "She is always quizzing my 'lingo,' as she calls it. I wish we could get out for a wander on the terrace, but I don't know what to do with all these people. They will be following us as sure as a gun."

"Ask my brother Algy to sing, and David will accompany him. Then we can slip away unobserved."

John Pluff gushed up to the "dear boys," with a benign and irresistible smile.

"Give us a ditty," he said, at the same time catching hold of Algy's coat sleeve, and dragged him to the piano.

David whispered he could not accompany his brother, being afflicted with violent indigestion.

His host however declared that was no excuse, indigestion could not attack the fingers, and announced to the company that the brothers Pyne would favour with a little music.

"I say," whined Algy, "David's no good. Nesta accompanies me far more feelingly, it's just twice the effect."

But such an awful paralysing look came into John Pluff's usually good-tempered face, that Algy was utterly quelled, and David, with a martyred expression, struck a chord weakly to command silence.

The hubbub of voices ceased; all eyes turned on the "dear boys."

John Pluff edged towards the open window, Nesta being already on the verandah.

"You are wonderful!" she murmured coyly, as they strolled away. "This reminds me of that beautiful evening at the Richmond Rowing Club ball."

"What a night we had! It makes my heart thump to think of it."

"I—I hope you did not dance too violently. It is very dangerous with a weak heart."

"Come, come my dear—you know my meaning full well, and it's no good beating about the bush. I am a plain spoken man—and I'll put it to you straight. Look here, Miss Pyne—Nesta, my love—I'm yours for the asking!" He announced this marvellous piece of news with an expectant smile, his breast swelling with anticipation.

Why was the girl silent? Overcome by glad surprise? Stunned by the pleasurable shock?

She bent her pretty head, and her face was scarlet as the gown she wore.

"Well!" he cried at last, a trifle nettled at her apparent lack of appreciation.

"I—am—not—accustomed—to—proposing," she gasped, still turning away that he might not see the expression in her eyes.

"Well now that's good—that's rich!" rubbing his hands together. "As if a man ever made a clearer declaration than myself at this moment! Come to my arms, there's nothing to fear. It's all straight and square, and I'll fix it up with Mr. and Mrs. P. to-morrow, as ever is. I'm not one to stick at settlements."

Nesta turned sharply in the bright moonlight, and moved a step or two back, facing him with a look that puzzled and bewildered John Pluff.

It was an expression of intense overwhelming amusement. A merriment that had been suppressed till the controlling of it almost amounted to pain. Nesta was a girl who acted and carried on a joke for her entertainment. She needed no one to share it, her own appreciative powers were enough.

As she surveyed the stout elderly man who offered her his hand in marriage, a laugh she could no longer keep back, rippled forth on the still air.

It was a thoroughly genuine peal, a laugh that refused to be confined, and leapt across her cheeks, dimpled her chin, dived under to her neck, scrambled along her ears, and finally capering across the temples passed away into a realm of smiles.

Mr. Pluff gave an uncertain "ha! ha!" and asked what the joke was.

"Why, you of course, you dear old goose! I do believe you actually thought I should jump down your throat!"

Her host assured her he expected no such acrobatic feat from a lady, especially one so dignified, so self-possessed as Miss Pyne.

This with a mock bow, and effort at sarcasm.

"Well, it's really too funny. As if all the fellows were not after me, and as if I had not my own especial 'best man' coming back from Gibraltar next week to 'fix it all up with Mr. and Mrs. P.' But there, you're a nice old thing, and I ought not to be making sport of you."

"Sport, sport of me indeed," muttered Mr. Pluff, walking back towards the house, with elevated head, and extended nostrils. "Oh! don't imagine I care."

"Do stop a minute, if you go in looking like that everyone will guess."

He paused, aware of the beads of perspiration on his forehead, his swift, heavy breathing, inspired by rage, not love.

It was no easy matter to pacify his wounded pride, and as Nesta Pyne endeavoured to soothe the feelings she had wantonly ruffled, Georgina Pluff suddenly became aware of their absence.

It turned her cold and sick. She saw it all. John had purposely asked for the singing that he might slip away and flirt with that minx in the moonlight. Perhaps he was offering his heart and fortune to the designing creature.

There was not a moment to be lost. They must be disturbed at once. She rose, and moved towards the window.

"There are chairs here in the verandah, won't you all come out. The night is so delicious!"

Her suggestion was immediately taken up.

The first sight that greeted Georgina's vigilant eyes was a red dress walking by a stout figure.

Mr. Pluff looked grave. Had the mischief been done? Was her move—too late?

"Cousin John," she cried, shaking her fist playfully, "you missed two of the most charming songs. Mr. Pyne is quite a genius. Come here, I want to scold you for deserting us, and what is far worse, robbing your guests of Miss Pyne's delightful society."

"That's right," laughed a short, square man at her side, with diamond studs and jewelled rings. "Keep the old man in order, Lady Ravenscroft. He needs a restraining hand, and always marches off with the prettiest girls."

How little the speaker guessed the mental torture his words were giving Georgina.

"He is too old to care about girls," she replied curtly.

"Don't you think it, my lady, the older they get, the worse they become. It's a disease that increases with age, and the young 'uns like it; even when they are as good looking as Miss Nesta. It is a case of the hay-stack, I reckon, and which side the bread is buttered. They like the butter laid on thick, and won't be put off with margarine."

By this time Miss Pyne was safely back among her friends, laughing and talking as gaily as any, coquetting with married and single men, ridiculing their remarks, and making herself generally conspicuous.

When the guests had left, Georgina addressed John Pluff in a tone of utter disgust. "If that is your choice," she said, "I pity you, and, as to introducing her into country society, well, it would be absolutely impossible! Of all the vulgar, pushing, ill-mannered girls, give me Nesta Pyne. She's out-and-out bad style, Cousin John, take my word for it. You won't help yourself on in society by taking up with her."

"I quite agree with you," he replied, to Lady Ravenscroft's surprise. "Her bad taste has never been so blatant as to-night; the scales have fallen from my eyes. I shall not marry her."

A gasp of relief escaped Georgina. "It is very nice of you to take my advice in this matter, Cousin John; I feel highly gratified and flattered," she murmured, calming down.

"No," he said, shaking his head. "They are not the sort of family I should care to marry into. Mr. and Mrs. P. are all right in their way, but I would not trust the daughter."

Georgina kissed her cousin affectionately. For once she felt loving towards him, and retired to her room well pleased.

"I've squashed that young woman," she said to herself. "There is one danger removed. I shall have to keep John well under my eye, he is so easily led away, but becomes instantly docile under my influence. How they pandered to me to-night—those parvenus!"

By the Night Train.

"You must travel alone, then, Ned. my boy. It is a tiresome thing, but it can't be helped. At latest, I shall be at C—— in good time on the wedding morning. Tell Carry so, with my love," said my father, laughing off his vexation at being thus peremptorily detained in London.

These were the circumstances of the case. My engagement—a two years' engagement, insisted upon by my own parent no less than by Admiral Lethbridge, that the "young people might know their own minds," most unreasonable and unnecessary as the delay had appeared to those principally concerned—was drawing to a happy close. I was to marry dear, pretty Carry Lethbridge, with the full consent and approval of both families. The wedding-day was drawing near, and my sister Clara, who was to be one of the bridesmaids, was staying at C—— with Caroline and her mother and sisters, in anticipation of the ceremony. Rear-Admiral Lethbridge resided at C——, and there, of course, the marriage was to take place. And my father and I had intended going down to C—— some three days before the wedding, and taking up our quarters at the hotel there. By the merest hazard, or apparent hazard, the execution of this plan was prevented, so far as my father's share in it was concerned.

My father had been summoned as a witness before a Parliamentary Committee of the House of Lords, and it had been notified to him that although, in consequence of frequent adjournments, his evidence might not be called for for a day or two, it was necessary that he should be in actual attendance, lest "My Lords" should find the private bill in hand pass more rapidly through its preliminary stages than was expected. The Parliamentary lawyer by whom my father was subpœnaed was civil enough to add that the committee could by no means dispense with Mr. Henley's very valuable testimony and advice.

"Very complimentary; but uncommonly tiresome," said I, really annoyed, in spite of the usual unselfishness of a young man and a lover; for my father and I were on terms of much confidence and affection, and I was aware that he had looked forward to this trip as one of his rare holidays. "The Lethbridges will be sorry, and so will Clara also. Cannot you come, after all?"

My father laughed.

"No, no, Edgar," said he; "I should expect to see Black Rod draw my curtains at the dead of night, come to take me into custody for treason. Committees must be obeyed. But never mind! I shall be with you on Saturday, before the wedding breakfast is laid out. And now I must be off to Westminster. You go by the night train, of course?"

My father and I shook hands, and I turned into Bond Street, where a double stream of carriages flowed slowly and strugglingly past, and where the crowd of lounging foot-passengers was at its height.

My first call was at the shop of the well-known Court jewellers, Miles and Henderson, and its object was to fetch away a certain set of pearl and ruby ornaments which my father had ordered, and which were his present to his future daughter-in-law. Mr. Henley had looked forward with pleasure to placing these costly toys in the bride's hands; but since he had been compelled to postpone his arrival at C——, he had good-naturedly but firmly insisted that I should take the jewels down with me, and give them to Carry in his name. I had not seen the design of the ornaments, but I was aware that the device was a new and well-chosen one; and from my father's liberality, of which I had since childhood received so many proofs, I had little doubt that the gift would prove to be a splendid one.

As I was in the act of opening the jewellers' door, a man passed me so closely as to brush my elbow, and, turning his head, looked me for a moment in the face. His own face was a remarkable one, or rather would have appeared remarkable elsewhere than in London, where the natives of all countries are every day to be met, jostling each other unnoticed in the midst of the great seething stream of restless human life that fills our streets.

This person, evidently a foreigner, was about forty years of age, wore spectacles, a bushy, red-brown beard, and a threadbare suit of black, shabby, but well brushed and neat. So far his appearance corresponded, more or less accurately, with that of a legion of professors, doctors, and philosophers, dubious hangers-on of the learned professions, whom Red Republican tenets and police hostility have landed in the limbo of Leicester Square.

But I could not help feeling a thrill of repugnance and dislike at the aspect of that broad, flat, white face, with its Tartar coarseness of feature, the sharp white teeth just visible between the thin lips, and the long, narrow eyes blinking catlike through the glasses of the spectacles. Can you fancy a white-faced tiger, badly pitted by the smallpox, walking erect in human guise, and stealthily pursuing his way through a jungle, not of the trees but of houses? Such was the impression which the first glimpse of that foreigner's face made upon me. In the next instant, I laughed at myself for my folly.

"The poor man cannot help his ugliness," said I to myself, as I followed the shopman to his employer's office on the first floor, near the glittering showrooms. He is a Russian, of course, too advanced in political ideas no doubt to please the Tsar and the police Prefect. Not a very pleasant person, though, to trust with a guillotine if his party should ever be uppermost."

And then Mr. Miles, bald and florid, came civilly forward to welcome me, and I forgot the Russian and all connected with him.

"Certainly, my dear sir, certainly," said the jeweller, unlocking the strongest of safes with the tiniest of Bramah keys, and tossing over a quantity of écrins labelled with the names of half the duchesses and countesses in the Red Book.

"Here is the set that your esteemed father, Mr. Henley, was so good as to order. Very old and respected customer of ours is Mr. Henley. I sold him—dear me! thirty years ago it must have been—a set of emeralds for Mrs. Henley's wearing. Not a very costly set, but in good taste, in capital taste. Mr. Henley had but lately come back then from Calcutta. His was a new name then on the Stock Exchange and in the Bank parlour. No name higher now; but his taste was always excellent, always. Here are the stones. I sent a set nearly similar last week for the wedding of Lady Florence Fetherton, but not so fine, I give you my word, as a tradesman of fifty years' standing, not so fine."

I think these words were either uttered in a louder tone than the rest of the jeweller's discourse, or a lull in the roll and rumble of the carriages made them unusually distinct, but at any rate three or four of the passers-by turned their heads inquisitively towards old Mr. Miles and myself, as we stood in the open doorway. And among those three or four was the ugly foreigner with the red-brown beard. He was repassing the shop coming from the opposite direction to that in which he had previously been walking. A coincidence, no doubt! Merely a coincidence.

I beckoned to the driver of a hansom, sauntering past on the look-out for a fare, and rattled down to my club, and after a quiet dinner drove to the station, first assuring myself that the precious jewels were safe in my pocket.

"Your luggage is labelled, Mr. Edgar, and ready to be put into the van," said old Jones, my father's confidential servant, touching his hat respectfully. "I have put the rugs and sticks and fishing-rods into an empty first-class carriage third from the bookstall to the left."

"Very well, Jones. Just see the luggage put in. I must get my ticket," answered I, and hurried to the ticket office where several impatient passengers were hustling and elbowing one another, while a stout lady, one of those voluble but unprotected female travellers who are the scourges and torments of all officials, was blocking up the window and holding a long and discursive argument with the booking-clerk on the subject of her fare, her change, her preference for slow trains, and the best way in which she could reach some cross country line some eighty miles off. At last, however, even this lady voyager's demands, or the clerk's patience, being exhausted, I managed to crush my way to the window, and to take my ticket for C——.

"First class to C——, monsieur!" said a peculiarly harsh and strident voice at my elbow, with a slight but perceptible foreign accent in its tones, and I glanced round at the man, who was thrusting a half-washed, muscular hand, decorated by a heavy gold signet-ring, past me to lay his money on the counter.

With some surprise I recognised the Russian whom I had seen twice on that very afternoon in front of the jeweller's shop. The recognition did not appear mutual. He never looked at me, but re-demanded his ticket in a quick, angry manner, and having got it, he fell back and mingled with the crowd.

By the time I had reached the carriage in which Jones had arranged my lighter luggage, I saw him approach with the guard, who unlocked the carriage, held open the door for my entry, and, having received the usual silver compliment that has now become a vested interest on railways, closed and relocked it, saying that I should "have the compartment to myself if I wished to smoke."

On the well-lighted platform outside the usual bustle which precedes the departure of a train was going on. Porters were wheeling heavy barrowloads of luggage rapidly past me, all the quicker in their movements because the warning bell had begun clanging for the first time; mail-guards were dragging along the huge sacks of letters that were impatiently awaited by the sorters in the post-office carriage; newspaper boys were thrusting evening journals into the faces of nervous passengers, wistfully leaning out to see after the safety of those trunks that the porter had glibly assured them would "be all right"; and paterfamilias was gathering his strayed family round him, or wrangling over a charge of overweight.

"Open this door, you guard. Halloa, guard! Open the door of this carriage, will you?"

It was thus that my reverie was broken in upon. A strange traveller, with a railway rug over his arm, was roughly shaking the door of the compartment where I sat alone. The guard came up rather reluctantly. Railway guards are discriminating persons as to social conditions, and the new-comer's coarse manners and husky voice were not calculated to inspire respect.

"First-class, sir?" asked the guard, and when the man produced his ticket, the guard was still too loyal to my tacit compact with him to permit the invasion of my privacy without an effort to preserve it.

"First-class to C——, sir? This way, please. Plenty of room here." And he tried to draw the intruder towards a distant carriage that was half full. But this manœuvre failed.

"There is plenty of room in this carriage. Look sharp and let me in," said the obstinate traveller; and the guard, being an English and not a French official, succumbed and unlocked the door.

He apologised to me in a gruff whisper: "Couldn't help myself, sir."

"Never mind," said I smiling, and applied myself to observing the new-comer, who sat down, not opposite to me, but in the middle partition full in the glare of the lamp.

In a very short time I had, as I thought, taken the measure of this not very delightful fellow traveller. He was a young man, perhaps a year my senior, strongly built and with rather a handsome face, sadly marred by very evident traces of dissipation. He wore a coat of sporting cut; a blue "bird's-eye" scarf with a horseshoe pin in it, and a great deal of dubious jewellery in the shape of rings, watch-chain, and dangling trinkets. The railway rug that lay across the knees of his tight-fitting drab trousers was of a gaudy pattern, yellow and red. His eyes were bloodshot, his voice thick, and he smelt strongly of bad tobacco and worse brandy. To all appearances he was a betting man, or sporting "gent" of the lower substratum of that uninviting class.

The bell rang for the last time. There was the customary final rush and scurry of belated passengers and porters, and the voices of the newspaper boys grew shriller and more excited. Then the guards sprang to the steps of their vans, and the station-master looked warily up and down the line preparatory to signalling to the engine-driver. At that moment a man came darting across the platform, tore open the door, jumped in and sat down opposite to me. A policeman ran up and shut the door.

"All right behind!"

The train began to move. I looked at my opposite neighbour, and could hardly repress an exclamation of surprise and vexation. The Russian! Yes, there was no mistaking the man. I knew that red-brown beard, that flat tigerish face, those long crafty eyes, black and narrow as an American Indian's, perfectly well.

I had seen the man at the ticket-window, certainly, but that was more than ten minutes ago, and I had been confident that he had long since taken his seat in some other compartment of the train. Such however was not the case. Had he dogged me all that evening, tracking me with a bloodhound's pertinacity from the jeweller's door to the railway carriage? It was possible, though not likely. But in vain I tried to dismiss the idea as silly and romantic. It recurred again and again. And yet why should he or anyone dog my steps?

The answer to this self-question soon came. The jewels, the costly set of pearl and ruby ornaments I carried about me, and of which this man had probably overheard the garrulous old jeweller make mention! And yet the Russian had hardly the air of a pickpocket. There was something defiant and arrogant in his look, and an undefinable air of education clung to him in spite of his shabby exterior. And as for violence, I had a young man's confidence in my own power to cope with any single antagonist, and beside I was not alone with him.

So far my thoughts had gone, while I gazed abstractedly from the window, as if marking the last lights of the London suburbs as the dark hedges and dim meadows succeeded to houses and factories, but then I cast a glance round and saw a sight which caused me an involuntary thrill of alarm. The two passengers in the carriage were rapidly and secretly conversing by means of signs.

There could be no doubt upon the point. The two men who were my sole companions in that rapid and lonely journey, ill-looking desperadoes each in his separate style, were accomplices. Up to that moment I had not for an instant suspected any collusion between the two. They came at different times, one was English the other a foreigner, and between the shabby lecturer and the betting man sodden with drink, and attired in flashy finery, any previous acquaintance seemed improbable. Yet, there they were rapidly communicating with one another by means of some thieves' alphabet of finer telegraphy, unaware as yet that I had observed them. So far as I could make out, the foreigner was urging the other to some course which the Englishman was reluctant to pursue.

I am not, I believe, one whit more disposed to timidity than most of my fellow countrymen, and yet I must confess that my blood ran cold and my heart almost ceased beating as the truth dawned upon me. I was the victim evidently of an artful and treacherous scheme. That cab—that sudden appearance of the Russian at the terminus—that persistency of his English confederate to occupy a seat in the carriage where I sat alone. All was clear to me now. Robbery, no doubt, was the object of the two villains in whose company I was shut up, and probably they would hesitate at no crime to obtain possession of the valuable jewels I so incautiously carried about my person. Both were strong men; probably armed, too; and though I braced my nerves and set my teeth for a struggle, I had little hope of a successful resistance, none of rescue. The train was racing fast through the black stillness of a moonless night. There was to be no stoppage short of C——, and more than an hour must elapse before that station was reached.

At that moment when my thoughts had travelled thus far, I made some slight movement; the Russian looked up, and our eyes met. The villain saw that his by-play had been observed, and instantly threw off the mask. Grinding out an oath between his set teeth, he rose from his seat. I rose, too; and as the Russian noticed the action he sprang like a tiger at my throat, grappling with me so closely that the blow I dealt him but partly took effect. Linked together we wrestled furiously for a few seconds, rising and falling; but I was the younger and more agile of the two, and had nearly overpowered my enemy, when his confederate came to his aid and dealt me a succession of crushing blows upon the head with some heavy weapon, beneath which I fell, stunned and helpless, with my face covered with blood and senses gone. When I came to myself again, the ruffians were rifling my pockets as I lay on the floor of the carriage. The Russian had opened one of the morocco cases that held the ornaments, and he was examining the gems by the light of the lamp overhead. The other villain was searching for fresh plunder. He was livid with agitation, I noticed, and his face was blotched with crimson and damp with heat drops, while his hands trembled very much. He it was who first spoke, in a husky whisper.

"What shall we do with him?"

"Toss him out. The fall won't hurt him," sneered the Russian.

It was plain that they believed me to be dead. I lay still, resolved that no cry, no twitching of an eyelid, should betray that life was still not extinct. Too well I knew that mercy was hopeless, and that my chance would be far better if flung out, at the risk of being mangled and crushed beneath the whirling iron wheels, than if I remained in that luxurious first-class carriage with those two wild beasts in human guise ready to finish their work at the first sign that I yet lived.

The Russian leant out of the window, and cautiously opened the door. I felt the chill of the fresh night upon my cheek as I lay. Then I had to summon all my resolution to my help to repress a shudder as the murderers stooped and lifted me up, one taking me by the head, and the other by the feet, as butchers carry a slaughtered calf. The Englishman breathed hard and trembled perceptibly as he dragged me towards the gaping doorway.

"I don't half like the job," he growled out.

The Russian gave a scornful laugh.

"Pitch the carrion out, blanc bec that you are! One, two, three, and over with him."

I remember one agonised moment of suspense as I was violently thrust forward, one hurried, frenzied prayer that rose from my heart to my lips, but was drowned by the roar and rush of the long train of massive carriages as they tore along the iron way. I was launched out, and felt myself falling, and then I dropped with a crash, and my brain reeled and sensation seemed again to desert me.

On coming gradually to myself, my first vague perception was that I formed a part of some vast moving body speeding swiftly along, swinging and swaying, but rushing fast through the cool night air. Then, as memory returned, I began to realise my position. In falling, when the assassins had thrown me out of the carriage where the robbery had taken place, I had dropped upon the wooden plank that runs like an elongated step below the carriages, and my hand had closed mechanically, in a clutch like that of a drowning man, on some projecting portion of the ironwork above, which I presently conjectured to be the prop of one of the iron steps by which passengers ascend. And there I clung instinctively, like a limpet to a rock, while the swerving, swinging train flew madly on through the black night.

It was a position of fearful peril. True I had escaped immediate death; but to all appearances my fate was only deferred. The train was not to halt till it reached C——; I despaired of being able to hold on till then, for already my cramped sinews seemed to be stiffening, and my attitude was a painful and uneasy one. And by night there was no hope that my danger would be observed, and an alarm given, as I was hurled helpless and despairing through the darkness. The wounds I had received in the head caused me a dull aching pain, and I was weak with loss of blood; but my thoughts were coherent and clear.

I knew my risk well. If I fell now I must certainly be left behind a mutilated corpse, torn to fragments by the cruel wheels that whirred and spun close by me. My only chance was to hold on—to hold on till I reached C——, if my strength lasted so long. Once or twice I essayed a cry for help, but my feeble voice was lost in the noise of the train. And presently I felt thankful that it had not been heard, for, from the window of the carriage to the left of where I lay crouching, was protruded the head of a man who peered into the night; and I shrank still closer to the woodwork as I recognised in the faint lamp-light the flat white face, the red-brown beard, the tigerish grin of the Russian, my late fellow-traveller. He did not see me, however, but resumed his place with a well satisfied air.

On we went through the silent country, with scream and rush and roar—now diving into tunnels, now ploughing our way between deep banks, now among the dark trees and hedges. On past the lighted stations, where the signal was made that the road was clear, and where porters and passengers, waiting for some slower train that stopped there, were to be seen watching us as we flew past. But they never saw me as I clung, with desperate grip and aching limbs, to the swiftly-hurrying mass of wood and iron.

Twice during that phantom ride I heard the shriek of the steam-whistle of a coming train, and twice I saw the red lamps and flame of the advancing engine glaring through the dark like the angry eyes and lurid breath of some monstrous creature rushing down upon its prey. And then, with clang and clash, and deafening roar, and in the midst of a gush of wind caused by its rapid progress, the long array of carriages went by me. On, on, as if impelled by a demon's force, we flew; and still feebler grew my arm, and I felt despair and fatigue benumb my faculties and was half tempted to let go my hold and drop and face the worst at once beneath the grinding sway of the merciless wheels.

Should we never be at C——? How long would that hideous night continue? Was it possible that my tired muscles would much longer endure the strain upon them? And then came a new thought. I remembered that in dear Carrie's last letter she had made me a half-playful promise that she and my sister Clara and the rest would come down to the station and meet me there on the arrival of the night train. That recollection filled my tortured heart with a new anguish as I thought of our mutual love, of the wedding day so soon to come, and of poor Caroline's grief when she should be left widowed of the betrothed bridegroom of her choice.

And then the mental pain was conquered by physical weakness and distress, and my dulled brain preserved nothing but a vague terror lest I should fall—fall beneath those pitiless iron wheels so close to me. And then I seemed to fall again into a waking dream, through which the lights of C—— station gleamed very brilliantly.

Of what followed I have no very clear idea. I remember, in a sudden access of strength and fury, leaping up and springing wildly at the door of the carriage from which I had been thrown. I have a faint recollection of a struggle—of loud shouts and then—darkness.

Afterwards I learnt that the Russian and his confederate had been arrested after a brief struggle, while I had been carried in an unconscious state to a neighbouring hotel. Though badly injured I recovered after many weeks of suffering, and Carrie—who nursed me with the greatest devotion through my illness—wore her jewels at our wedding after all.

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 396.] For the Week ending August 1st, 1896. [ONE PENNY.

THE CURSE OF THE BELL

Should a babe be born by the church-side near,
When the Passing Bell is toll'd,
Lo! a curse on its life will cling and fall,
Nor broken by prayer—nor gold!

OLD SUPERSTITION.

SOLEMNLY the Passing Bell began to toll, its muffled note sounding clear in the summer air.

The nurse moved across the room and closed the window of the sick chamber hastily, as she did so a feeble wail came from the bed.

She took the child up in her arms tenderly. "Poor little mite, poor little thing!" she said. "Will it live?" she asked the doctor curiously.

"Live, woman! of course it will; it is as strong a baby as I have seen," he answered testily. "I wish I could say as much for the mother."

The nurse sighed.

"Then the Curse of the Bell will be on it," she muttered, as she stilled its wailing cry.

* * * * *

Stella Fairfield opened her window and looked out; the sun was streaming across the Rectory garden, throwing the shadow of the belfry tower from the adjacent church across the mossy lawn.

rights reserved.]

As she stood there smiling, a girl with a roll of music under her arm came out from the porch into the sunlight.

"Where are you going?" cried Stella, leaning out to pluck a rose.

"To the church. I am going to practise; I do not want to be in the way, you know. Roger will be here directly, I suppose?"

Stella laughed merrily and threw the rose at her cousin as she crossed the lawn.

"I believe you are afraid of him, Mona," she cried to the retreating figure. "You always try to run away when he comes."

The girl had slipped into the shadow cast by the belfry, and Stella did not see the colour flood her usually pale cheeks.

A step in the room behind made Stella turn abruptly.

"Why, nurse, have you come to wish me many happy returns? I thought you had forgotten that to-day is my birthday."

"No, miss, I had not forgotten," the old woman answered as she looked from the window across to the still churchyard.

"Then have you no greetings?" the girl began, but a cry from the nurse checked her.

Across the summer air came the solemn toll of a bell.

"Shut your ears, dearie, don't listen; I will close the window quick."

The girl laughed.

"How silly you are, that is for poor old Jimmy the sexton. Did you not know he was dead?"

The old woman closed the window with shaking hands.

"To-day of all days," she muttered.

Then she sat down on the window seat and covered her face with her hands.

"The curse, the curse is coming," she moaned.

"But, Nannie," the girl broke in, "you have heard that bell so often, you never minded it before."

"It has not tolled on the 15th of June for twenty years, Miss Stella. When last I heard it——"

"I know," again interrupted the girl, then she went to the window and opened it once more.

"Poor mother!" she said softly, and she too looked out at the still churchyard.

The nurse shook her head feebly.

"It's the living, not the dead I was thinking of," she said, but Stella did not hear, she was gazing up at the belfry.

"There is to be a wedding to-day, and we are all going up to the belfry when the bells ring. Roger says it 's such fun."

The old nurse started up in alarm.

"Don't, Miss Stella, don't go up there to-day, you will come to harm for the bell is spiteful——"

She broke off, for the Rector was heard calling his daughter.

"I expect Roger has come," Stella cried; and, breaking away from the detaining hand of the old woman she ran light-heartedly downstairs.

"The curse, the curse is coming."

Stella Fairfield was an only child, her mother had died at her birth, and she had grown up the spoilt darling of her father, and the idol of her nurse's heart. When she was sixteen, her father, thinking it bad for a girl to grow up without the companionship of those of her own sex and age had sent for her cousin Mona, one of a large family and therefore easily spared; the two girls lived happily together, the one light-hearted, impulsive, and passionate, with the strong feelings of her Spanish blood (her mother had been of that race), the other quiet, cold, self-effacing and some said feelingless.

And now into Stella's life had come a new joy. Her old playmate and neighbour, Roger Thorlay, had asked her to be his wife, and before long the old church bells would ring their merry peal for her.

But now and then a cloud had dimmed her sunlight, a vague, uneasy feeling filled her heart; it was hardly jealousy—and yet—and yet——

Why did Roger consult Mona so often? It was to Mona he went for advice and help, to Mona he unfolded his plans and hopes. She was no longer a child to be played with and petted; she had Roger's laughter and caresses, but to Mona he took his troubles and asked for sympathy.

She could scarcely formulate her feelings. "It is because we both love you so," Roger said, when she had upbraided him for consulting Mona about her future, and his answer had silenced her.

As the first peal of wedding bells rang out, Stella skipped up the belfry stairs, humming a wedding march, Roger and Mona following.

Suddenly the footsteps behind her ceased and Stella stopped to listen.

"I cannot go on. Leave me, I am giddy; go without me. Don't think of me, dear Roger."

Dear Roger! The colour flamed into Stella's face, and she called out sharply:

"Come along, Mona, I will give you a hand. Come with us."

Roger stood aside as Stella came bounding back; she seized her cousin's hand angrily and pulled her up the winding stairs. At last they reached the belfry floor. Stella opened the door and drew Mona in with her.

"Come along," she cried as the other drew back. "What are you afraid of?"

"It is so dark, and it looks so dreadful down there. I feel as if I should fall."

"Nonsense, I have your hand tightly," Stella answered with a laugh. "I did not know you were a coward before. See, the bells are beginning again."

Mona gave a scream.

"Take me away, take me away. I shall throw myself down. I shall go mad! Stop them! stop those bells, Stella!"

Stella gave her companion a look of contempt, and, pushing her against the wall, walked steadily along the narrow platform to where the largest bell was hung.

She stood looking up at it with a strange feeling of impending misery and pain.

Suddenly she reeled and almost fell. Across the swaying bells she had looked at Mona. Roger was standing by her side. She saw Mona's outstretched hands, then the great bell came between, and when she looked again, Mona was clasped in Roger's arms.

For one second she stood hot and trembling, then she sprang across to Roger's side, struck the white face of Mona a stinging blow with her hands, and tore madly down the belfry tower, across the Rectory garden, and up into her own room.

When there, she threw herself on the bed, but no relieving tears came; she sprang up and paced the room angrily.

"She loves him," she muttered, "I saw it, and he held her in his arms. I hate her! I hate her!" the words came in short gasps, passion and jealousy were raging in her heart, and she tore at her slender fingers in mingled rage and pain.

Down the dark belfry stairs came Roger Thorley, a girl's limp form in his arms. He, too, crossed the churchyard, and, carrying his burden, deposited it on a seat almost beneath Stella's window.

His voice was curt and harsh as he summoned aid.

"What is the matter?" asked the old nurse who bustled up at his call.

"Mona has fainted! Poor child, she was nearly mad with terror. Stella has behaved disgracefully."

The last words floated up through the open window and reached Stella's ears. She bit her finger until it bled.

"What did she do?"

"Dragged her up to the belfry against her will."

"I didn't," muttered Stella, as the words came up, "I only told her Roger would laugh at her if she was frightened."

Then she moved nearer to the window: "She fainted; had I not caught her, she would have fallen."

Stella began to laugh mirthlessly.

"Into his arms; yes, I saw her. I hate her!" she muttered.

Presently the Rector's voice was heard. "Stella, I want you immediately."

His voice, too, was hard and stern. Stella shivered; never in all her life had she heard her father speak like that to her.

She turned the key in the door and remained obstinately silent.

Presently there was a tap at the door. "Mr. Roger wants to see you, dearie," said her nurse.

Stella did not answer, the anger in her face had not died down, and she could not see him yet.

"Leave her alone, nurse. I would rather not see her; her behaviour has both shocked and surprised me," she heard Roger saying.

A choking sob rose in her throat; but she changed it to a hard, bitter laugh.

"Go and comfort Mona," she cried as she listened to the retreating footsteps.

All the next day Roger Thorley did not come, though Stella watched and waited for him anxiously.

Then she heard that he had called early in the morning to ask after Mona and leave her some hot-house grapes.

She turned the key in the lock.

Mona seemed nervous and ill, her fright had affected her system; but Stella did not notice it, she was thinking only of Roger, and the Rector preserved a chilling silence towards his daughter.

The next day and Roger did not come; on the third Stella saw with beating heart his familiar figure crossing the Rectory lawn. She was springing to meet him, but suddenly she drew back, paused a minute, then rushed to her own room instead.

Mona was on the lawn with outstretched hands, crying: "My preserver, how can I thank you?"

All that day Stella did not go down, and her lover waited patiently, reassured by Mona's sympathy and advice.

"Leave her to herself, she will come round; don't write, don't attempt to see her, if you do so her temper will increase. If she submits of her own free will, it will cure her for ever." She advised, and he waited.

A week passed away and Stella grew white and silent, the laughing, bright-eyed girl had gone, the Stella of old days had departed, still she would not see Roger; and Mona, always quiet and gentle, comforted him, and told him how she had failed in her attempts to soften Stella's heart.

Then Stella took to absenting herself, and for hours no one could find her.

"Mona, my child," said the Rector one afternoon, "will you look for Stella? I want to see her in the study; do not tell her, however, that Roger is with me."

Mona smiled sadly.

"I am afraid I do not know where she is, uncle; I have looked for her so often."

She stood at the door for a few minutes, then she strolled in the direction of the church. She paused at the foot of the belfry tower, then very slowly she began to ascend.

She looked in at the ringer's chamber—it was empty; no bells would be rung to-day. Then she ascended the next flight more boldly.

"Stella," she called softly, "Stella."

"What do you want?" came a sullen reply.

"Come down, Stella, I want to speak to you."

There was no answer.

Mona paused for a few minutes with a curious smile on her face, then she went on up the stairs.

As she gained the belfry room Stella sprang up from the floor.

"What do you want?" she cried angrily. "Go! go away, I came here away from you; I thought you would be too frightened to pursue me here."

Mona looked up at the bells.

"It is their ringing which is terrible. You don't know how frightfully they fascinate me. If I were left alone with them I should go mad, and throw myself down; I could not endure it. I do not mind them now."

"What have you come for?" demanded Stella fiercely.

"To talk to you about Roger," Mona answered calmly.

"But I don't want to talk to you about him, I—I—" —gasping—"don't think I want to see him again."

Mona smiled.

"He says the same thing, too. What foolish children you are."

Stella's eyes blazed ominously.

"What is it you want?" she asked.

Mona looked meditatively at the empty air.

Stella stamped her foot.

"Go away," she said, "I hate the sight of you; don't you think I can see you love Roger?"

"Yes, I love him," said Mona calmly.

"And you would take him away from me?" cried Stella.

Mona shrugged her shoulders.

"Are you trying so hard to keep him? Do you think sulking and passion likely to prove attractive?"

Stella choked a rising sob.

"I hate you," she muttered.

"I am perfectly aware of that," answered her cousin, 'and at present you are doing your best to make everyone hate you."

Fell to the ground insensible.

In the silence which followed Stella threw a half imploring glance at Mona. She was fighting the passion within her. Had Mona opened her arms, and let Stella sob her rage away, the end might have been different; but she only stood with a smile upon her lips, humming Roger's favourite song.

"Then you shall stay here until I choose to let you out," Stella cried, suddenly backing towards the door. Closing it with an angry bang she turned the key in the lock and ran down the steps.

As she ran, Mona's voice reached her, screaming to her to come back, now angrily, now in terror; but she only shook her head, and it grew fainter and fainter in the distance, and at last died away.

Stella ran down the lane by the church and out into the open fields. She walked on with a sense of pain and misery fighting an angry battle with herself.

"Go back and let her out," her better impulse prompted.

"I won't, I mean to punish her; she has made me suffer, let her be frightened."

"What if she should fall?"

"Let her, I don't care," and Stella quickened her footsteps.

"Do you know what you would be if she fell?—a murderess."

"She won't fall, it is only nonsense on her part; I want to frighten her badly. She does not mind if the bells don't ring—I wish they would ring."

"Is there a service to-night? No, to-morrow, she will be all right; I will let her out before supper."

Farther and farther from home went Stella, her anger carrying her at a rapid pace.

Suddenly she paused and stood irresolute.

"There is a service to-night; I had forgotten," she exclaimed aloud.

Should she go back or forward? She hesitated, looked behind her, but the church was no longer in sight; then setting her teeth hard she went on again.

"You will be a murderess. You don't care? Yes, you do!"

"I don't," screamed Stella, "how dare you say so!"

"Murderess!"

"I'm not a murderess, I only want to punish Mona."

She stopped again with a gasp. "Was that a bell?"

A vision of Mona's face still and white arose before her; she put out her hands as if to ward it off.

Twice she went on but stopped with a shiver, then very slowly she turned her face homeward; as she did so distant bells rang out.

Stella turned deadly white and began to run. "What had she done? Was she a murderess? Would she be in time? Why, oh, why could she not go faster?" As she ran on and on, her breath came in choking gasps, and in her ears the wind shrieked "Murderess!"

She was trembling with fear and exhaustion when she reached the Rectory garden. A few more steps and Mona would be free. Why had she shut her up there? "Mona, forgive me, forgive me!" she gasped as she looked up at the big grey tower.

She would ask Mona's pardon. Never again would she let her anger——

"Good God! What is that?"

Across the lawn something was being carried on a stretcher.

Stella bounded towards it.

It was Mona, still and cold.

Stella clutched at the air convulsively, for the big grey tower was going round. She uttered a shrill scream, which turned to a wild, gurgling laugh, and fell to the ground insensible.

* * * * *

When Stella recovered her senses she was in bed, and the room darkened. She lay still, with a curious sense of lightness, regarding her fingers with a puzzled expression, they were so thin and white; then she lifted her hand to her head, a little cry escaped her, her long black hair had gone; she tried to sit up but fell back weakly on the pillow. Presently the sound of the organ came in through the open window. What were they playing? Mona's favourite hymn. Was someone dead? She tried to hum the air.

When our heads are bowed with woe,
When our bitter tears o'erflow.

There was a rustle behind the bed curtains.

"Is that you, Nannie?" asked Stella.

The nurse came from behind the curtain, wiping her eyes surreptitiously.

"Is someone dead, Nannie?"

The nurse shook up Stella's pillow in silence.

"Have I been ill?"

"Yes, dearie, lie still, don't ask questions now." Nannie's voice had a quivering sound.

"Is that Mona playing?" Stella asked presently.

The old woman gave a sudden start at Stella's words and let the cup she held fall from her fingers with a crash on to the floor.

A perplexed frown deepened on Stella's brow.

"Where is Mona? I want her," she said fretfully.

Then she looked at Nannie.

"Mona, I have come to save you!"

"What are you crying about?" she screamed. "Tell me quick, quick. I dreamt something about Mona. Why don't you answer me? No, I won't lie down—don't say she is——"

Stella paused, her eyes dilated with horror, as slowly the memory of the past came back. She was struggling out of bed. She would go to the window. She must lift that blind. Who was in the churchyard out there?

"Mona!" she cried, with a frightened catch in her voice.

Nannie put her arms round her charge and laid her gently down on the bed.

"Mona is dead," she said softly.

Stella stared blankly up at the ceiling.

"Dead!" she muttered. "No, she is in the belfry; Roger will bring her down."

Nannie wrung her hands convulsively.

"There, there, why did I tell her? I have sent her off again, poor lamb."

Late into the night Nannie watched by Stella's bed. Would she never sleep again? Oh! that moaning, it was terrible. Then Stella became still and quiet, and Nannie, with a sigh of relief, stole into the adjoining room, leaving the door open. Her head had scarcely touched the pillow when she fell asleep, worn out with watching.

When all was still Stella again opened her eyes and slowly got out of bed. "Mona is in the belfry. It is dark. I must go and let her out," she muttered.

Slipping on a dressing-gown she crept downstairs, pausing in the hall for the keys. They were in the same old spot; then she softly drew back the bolts of the door and stole out. The pebbles on the gravel cut her feet, for she had no shoes on, and the night air blew keenly through her fever-stricken frame, but she hurried on, muttering to herself and striving to collect her wandering thoughts.

How still it was. There! was that Mona calling?

"I am coming, coming," she called feebly as with trembling hands she opened the heavy oaken door.

Would she be in time?

"I am coming, coming," she called again as she began her weary climb.

Up the long dark winding stairs she crept. "Mona!" she cried, "Mona!" but only a long, wailing echo repeated "Mona."

She could hear the flutter of wings in the darkness; strange, weird noises broke the ghostly silence, and she shivered with terror.

"Mona, where are you?" she cried again to the blackness, and her voice sounded strange to her ears.

Her temples were burning, and bright lights began to dance before her tortured eyes. Now her hands were like fire, now damp with an icy chill, as with difficulty she felt her way up to the belfry tower.

The old doors shook with the force of the wind which howled and moaned about it. Stella fumbled with the rusty key, but it would not turn. The noises behind her grew louder; they sounded like the pattering of invisible feet.

"Mona!" she shrieked again, and threw herself against the doorway. It was not locked, and the fastening was worn and almost broken. It gave as her light weight touched it, and she fell headlong into the room.

There was a low, shivering sound among the bells. To Stella's disordered fancy it was full of menace.

There in the darkness she knelt.

"Mona, I have come to save you!" she whispered as she stretched out her hands. In the silence there was a laugh—a wild, harsh metallic laugh—it came from the corner where the tolling bell was hung. "Are you there?" whispered the girl tremulously. "Hush! I will come to you;" and she cautiously began to feel her way towards the sound.

Suddenly it began again, a harsh mocking laugh, above her, behind her, around her.

Where was she? In the belfry alone in the dark—and Mona? Mona was dead; she was a murderess. What was that laughing at her up there in the blackness?

Yes, it was Mona. Mona, dead, and she was laughing, laughing horribly. She could feel her icy breath; she was touching her; she was throwing her down!

Stella gave a wild scream, and threw up her hands as if to protect her face from an unseen enemy; she swayed to and fro for a minute, then fell headlong into the deeper darkness below. There was a wild laugh up among the bells, then silence for a minute. Then, solemnly, mournfully, into the night air floated the muffled toll of the Passing Bell.

MARY WEST.

ST. PATRICK'S CHOICE.

THERE was a dew upon the hedgerow cobwebs, and in the air a faint hint of early violets. Since daybreak, a garrulous blackbird had been lilting from the old thorn tree above Tobe-Patrick well, and now the Ballycarney mass bell sent its summons across the valleys.

Two persons were coming towards the crossroads in answer to that clangorous call—the one a man, old and of feeble bearing, the other a girl, the prettiest in all the barony.

By the crossroads stile they met and gave each other "good-morrow."

"Yarrah, Maureen," said the ancient, leaning heavily on his staff, "you're the picture of good looks! But where's your shamrock? Sure, you didn't come out without the shamrock on Patrick's Day, did you?"

Maureen blushed under her shawl. "I—I gave it to someone," she stammered.

"Aha," he grunted. "An' this is how the land lies? Sure I was thinkin' Peter O'Hara wouldn't be keeping his daughter long. And who's the lucky boy? I don't know."

"Then you won't know, either, Mehaul," she said with some spirit. "'Tis none of your business at all."

Mehaul chuckled and made haste to guide the affronted beauty over the stile.

"Sure, I wouldn't offend you for all the gold between here an' Dublin town. All I asked you was because 'tis a serious matther to give shamrocks away on Patrick's Day—a mighty serious matther."

"How is that, Mehaul?" asked the girl, interested and somewhat mollified, as they set forth along the road together.

Mehaul Reagan winked furtively as he produced his odorous short clay pipe and filled it with tobacco. He was the recognised chronicler general of Ballycarney affairs, and, as such, it behoved him to discover the identity of Maureen O'Hara's swain.

Mehaul had all the traditions and superstitions of the county Kilmore at the ends of his gnarled fingers, and he now proposed to use his knowledge as a means of worming the desired scrap of information out of his fair companion.

"How about giving the shamrock away, Mehaul?" repeated Maureen eagerly.

The sly Scheannachie lit his dhudeen, fitted on the tin lid with care, and began to smoke contentedly.

"Well, alannah," he said, after a pause, "'tis an old superstition his riverence would be calling it. They say that when a girl gives a boy a shamrock on Patrick's Day she does it to test his true love."

"To test his love, Mehaul?"

"Aye, that's what my grandmother said. 'Twas like this, Maureen. I heard the old grandmother tell no less a fine lady than Dame Carney herself. I was only a slip of a boy when Dame Carney—she was Miss Fitzgerald then—came to consult the wise woman."

"'Tell me, Mrs. Reagan,' says she, 'if Sir Geoffrey Carney loves me.'

"The old grandmother took a bunch of shamrock that myself had plucked (for it was Patrick's Day) an' gave it to Miss Fitzgerald.

"'Miss Honor,' she says, 'if you want to find out the truth, give that shamrock to Sir Geoffrey. Then unbeknown to him, or anyone else, go by the hill path to the well of St. Patrick this very night, when the moon is high. There will be a blackbird sitting on the thorn tree over the well. 'Tis a fairy blackbird, Miss Honor, but it won't hurt you if you repeat St. Patrick's name three times, an' dip your little fingers into the water.

"'Then the blackbird will fly away to fetch the man that loves you best. Wait till the full of the moon, an' when twelve o'clock strikes from Castle Carney clock tower, you will see your true lover's face in the water of St. Patrick's well.'"

"Oh!" exclaimed Maureen, who had not lost a syllable of the reminiscence. "An' did she see him, Mehaul?"

"See him, is it? Sure of course she did. Next day she comes to my old grandmother an' gives her five golden sovereigns."

"'Mrs. Reagan,' she says, 'the spell came true. I saw Sir Geoffrey's face in the well last night, an' this morning I promised to marry him.'

"Marry him she did too, an' mighty happy they were. Now, Maureen, if you go to the well to-night, an' the boy that you gave the shamrock to really loves you, you'll see his face in the water."

Mehaul's dhudeen had gone out, and he stopped to light it. When he turned round, the operation performed, he was surprised to hear what sounded like a sob from Maureen.

"Eyah, Maureen, is it crying you are?" inquired the Scheannachie, peering under the coquettishly draped shawl.

Maureen was crying, not very bitterly, perhaps, but still undoubtedly crying. Mehaul Reagan's scheme had succeeded even better than he expected, and it only needed a little diplomacy and sundry words of fatherly comfort to make the girl unburden herself of her griefs.

"I've r-ruined it all!" she wailed. "O Mehaul, I've ruined the spell. Sure, I had two bunches of shamrock, an' I gave both away—to different boys. Now I must wait till next Patrick's Day to find out which loves me best."

But Mehaul came to the rescue.

"An' is that what you're crying for?" he shouted. "'Tis laughin' you ought to be. Sure, the two bunches won't hurt the spell, Maureen, for only one of them can be the fairy bunch. Never you fear, but go to the well at midnight, an' you'll see the face o' the boy that you're goin' to marry. By-the-way, alannah, who were the two boys you mintioned? The names have clean slipped my memory."

In Maureen's delight at hearing that the shamrock spell held good still, she revealed her heart's secret to the wily Scheannachie.

The two favoured "boys" were Bryan Kavanagh and Denny Nowlan—both strapping youths and promising withal.

They had plagued her with their intentions for a twelvemonth until she was utterly at a loss to choose between them.

"An' you've no choice at all?" queried Mehaul.

Maureen pursed her pretty lips.

"N-no—I've no choice. I did think I liked Bryan better, but then Denny came back from New York an'—an'——"

"An' he looked so fine in his broadcloth you couldn't resist him?" said Mehaul.

"No such thing!" cried Maureen. "He knows more in a day than Bryan does in a year. But where's the use o' talkin'? if the spell is as good as you say the well will show me the man to take."

"Aye, that it will," Mehaul answered.

Mehaul went chuckling across the churchyard after parting from Maureen.

The old man had a pretty little scheme in view. He, Mehaul Reagan, would himself be the deus ex machina in this interesting love episode.

Accordingly, after mass, the Scheannachie seated himself in a cosy corner of the churchyard where the young men on Sundays and holidays were wont to foregather. To-day being the festival of the patron saint there was a considerable assembly and the conversation was animated.

Mehaul smilingly noticed the twin bunches of shamrocks borne by Bryan Kavanagh and Denny Nowlan.

Young Kavanagh being a farmer's son and country-bred wholly, carried his bunch in the traditional manner—in his hat. His rival, however, had picked up some notions among the Americans, and sported the verdant keepsake as a buttonhole.

The stay-at-home seemed honest, but heavy; the returned American was a happy type of native Irish rumours, grafted on transatlantic experience. Oddly enough, they were old friends and swore by each other.

Which should be picked out for Maureen? Which sent at midnight to peep over the girl's shoulder into the mirror of Patrick's well? Such was the Scheannachie's crafty scheme for making his spell work—such the manner in which he hoped to render Maureen happy for life.

Finally the girl's own words rose to his mind. She had said: "I did think I liked Bryan better, but then Denny came back from New York——"

Moreover, she had added that Denny "knew more in a day than Bryan did in a year," and dwelt upon Denny's promise to take her to rich America. Clearly the girl secretly favoured Denny Nowlan. Therefore it was right that Denny she should have.

"Denny avic," he said, "you're after Maureen O'Hara?"

"You can bet I am," answered Denny.

"Very well, ma bouchal. I'll give you a spell to win her. Hold your ear close."

Then the Sheannachie unfolded to young Nowlan a wonderful phishogue by which he was to look into the waters of St. Patrick's well by midnight and there behold the face of his true love.

Now Denny was sceptical as regarded phishogues, but he shared the local respect for Mehaul and took care not to let that worthy see him laughing in his sleeve at this utterly ridiculous way of winning Maureen.

Thus it came to pass that old Mehaul went home sure of the success of his plan, and determined to be a third party by St. Patrick's well that night, while Denny Nowlan, laughing gaily, told the story of the proposed spell to the churchyard loungers.

"You go in my place, Bryan," said Denny to his rival. "For my part I prefer to court Maureen by her father's turf fire."

Bryan Kavanagh was the only one present who did not join in the laughter. He was thinking over the Sheannachie's spell.

Old Mehaul crouched in the copse behind the wall that Patrick's night as pretty Maureen came falteringly up the path. He heard her repeat the name of St. Patrick thrice, kneeling to dip her fingers in the water, and noticed with a grin that the "fairy" blackbird frightened from his nest, flapped through the branches even as he had promised.

Then he saw Maureen fix her eyes steadily upon the moonlit surface of the well.

"Clang!"

Out chimed the clock from Castle Carney, ringing clearly through the stillness of midnight, waking the watchdogs with its brazen voice. At the twelfth stroke there was a rustling in the bracken and some one stole past Mehaul's hiding place.

Next moment the old man uttered an exclamation of astonishment, for the tall figure that leant over the well in the moonlight did not belong to Denny Nowlan but to—Bryan Kavanagh!

There was a startled cry, and Maureen turned from the pale reflection of Bryan's face in the water to find herself clasped in the strong arms of a real, palpable Bryan.

"Ah, then, Bryan darling," so Mehaul heard her say, "'tis myself is glad you've come. Sure I was afraid it would be Denny Nowlan."

As the astonished Sheannachie crept out of his lair, and down the hillside, all he could say to himself was: "St. Patrick is a better match-maker than me, after all."

IN AN OPERA-GLASS.

"Would you like to use the glass, sir?" asked the whimsical looking man who sat in the row of orchestra stalls in front of me at The Lady of Lyons.

I had been watching him closely, on account of his odd physiognomy. He had a big face, carefully shaven except behind the jaws, and a throat-beard leaving his chin clear. His mouth looked as if it had been pressed flat by a determined hand, and had never since been able to reassert itself. His eyes, big, too, were heavily indignant in expression, suggesting that he had never quite got over the affront which Nature had put upon him by fixing his lips permanently in that shape.

I took his lorgnette with thanks, and gazed through it at the Pauline of the evening; but as I leant over to hand it back, "Wait a moment," he said, looking full at me in a singular way; "you haven't seen the best of it. Hold it up, small end down, at half arm's length, and see what the effect will be."

Doing as he suggested, I met with no unusual result. He saw from my face that I was puzzled; and bending near, so as not to attract attention from those around us, he asked:

"Don't you see a woman's face looking up out of the lens?"

"No," said I, rather curtly, thinking that he joked too familiarly for the brevity of our acquaintance, and that he had perhaps been drinking too much.

I mutely insisted on his taking the opera-glass again, and drew back into my own chair, leaving him rather disconcerted. He soon got over this, and continued to follow the acting, though without lively interest, and with an air of reverie. I noticed also that he did not use his glass on the stage, nor on the audience, either; but he several times lifted it in the way he had pointed out to me, and, after adjusting it to suit himself, contemplated the large end with rapt absorption.

I began to consider. I had noticed on the convex glass surface broken reflections from different parts of the theatre, the central cluster of lights, or dim fragments of the gold ornamentation of the gallery, and a Liliputian host of spectators, among whom were some of the ladies in charming costumes behind us or at the side. These had flitted over it as I changed the angle, but the images were so minute that I hadn't thought of them in connection with the lorgnette owner's eccentric inquiry. It now struck me that he might have more imagination or better eyes than mine.

So, at the end of the play, while he was putting on his overcoat, I touched him on the shoulder, and told him I had a word to say when we could get into the lobby. Having reached it, I asked him if he could direct me, a stranger in the city, to a good place near by where I could get supper before going back to my hotel. He told me of one, and I instantly asked him to come with me.

"I'm curious to know something more," I added, "about that opera-glass of yours. I'm afraid I didn't understand it."

He appeared pleased, and after a moment accepted my proposal to sup together.

"Speaking in confidence," said he, as we went along the street, "I'm not sure my wife will like it, my staying out any later. She's already jealous of me going to the theatre when I go alone. Though she doesn't say so, yet she fancies there's some woman in the case, you understand." Then after a pause: "If she only knew! There is a woman in the——" here he shook the leather receptacle in which he was carrying the glass—"literally, a woman in the case. Ha, ha!"

The revival of this fantasy and his odd frankness quickened my curiosity. At our restaurant there were, fortunately, little boxes partitioned off at one side, with curtains in front, and, taking refuge in one of these, I ordered a supper of roast oysters and a beverage which we were weak enough to call punch, and which was strong enough to bear the opprobrium of that name.

"Now for enlightenment," said I, when the glasses were refilled.

My companion had taken off his hat in deference to the oysters. His flat-pressed mouth, his indignant eyes, his crimson forehead, and grey hair jutting up oddly behind his head, all contrasted strangely with the singular tale he proceeded to relate.

"You see," he began, "I'm a plain man, without any show of romance. I'm level-headed in my affairs, and well-known in business circles. I don't go in for amusements or pleasures, and you couldn't engage me to read a novel. But there's one thing in my experience that would astonish my business acquaintances, if they knew it. I tell you because you're a stranger, and I've taken a fancy to you, and I think it may do you good, as a young man, to learn how to look below the surface."

Here the narrator gave a sly chuckle, glancing towards the lorgnette—which stood on the table—in a way that suggested a double meaning.

"I married late," he went on, "and some years ago, before my wedding, I was at the theatre one night, when a lady of decided beauty and fashion attracted my notice. She did more than that—she made me feel what I hadn't felt since I was a boy. When I went home to my bachelor quarters that night I had to admit that I was in love. I wasn't a society man, so my chances for seeing her again were few; but I found out after a time who she was, and met her once or twice in the streets. There came a very memorable evening when I met her in the theatre again. They were playing The Lady of Lyons. Between the acts, as I sat thinking of nothing, I was startled by an exclamation like a faint scream in the balcony just above my chair, for I was at the back of the orchestra stalls.

"I looked up at once, and saw this opera-glass falling through the air directly towards my head. It was so near that I didn't dare to move my head, for fear that if I took my eyes from the falling object I might dodge just where it would strike me all the more dangerously. I just put my gloved hands up, kept perfectly cool, and caught the glass as neatly as you please. There was a murmur of approbation from the people around me, and some impertinent applause, but the main thing was that, while I still sat looking up to see who had let the glass fall, my beautiful young lady's faced peered over the cushioned edge of the balcony, and her eyes looked down into mine. The opera-glass was hers! So instead of breaking my head, it simply broke my heart.

"The lady drew back at once, and another person peered over—a highly finished young man with coral studs and a white necktie—a sop, sir." (The old gentleman at once showed great anger and intolerance.) "Why wasn't I made, I wonder, with a face shaped like an almond, and not much colour in it; and why wasn't I taught to wear a moustache with a curl on the top end of it like the loose end of a banjo string? As I hadn't these charms, and the young man in the balcony had, I knew of course that there was no chance for me. But one thing I immediately resolved upon. When I started to go out of the door after the play, I naturally found the young jackanapes waiting for me. But instead of the opera-glass I handed him my card, saying: 'You'll learn my standing from that, sir; but I can't consent to part with this article. I will replace it with a new one. When a man has saved himself from hurt, as I have, without troubling anyone, he ought to have a reward, and I claim this as mine.' I put in that touch of humour, but the young man didn't take it humourously at all. He threatened to call a policeman and arrest me if I didn't give up the trifle.

"'Do,' said I, 'and have a ridiculous item in the papers to-morrow, with Miss N.'s name mentioned.' Some of the dispersing audience began to notice us, and my hint quieted him. He merely said: 'This is unjustifiable. You will hear further from me,' and went off. When you think of it, it was extraordinary; but I stuck to my point, and have always kept the souvenir, though there was some talk of a suit, and even of a duel with the young fellow Hefflebower."

"Hefflebower!" I exclaimed.

"Pshaw! yes. I oughtn't to have told you the name. But never mind. Gad, my blood was up. That was my time for romance, then or never, and I didn't even wink at the thought of fighting."

"But what became of the young lady?"

The whimsical gentleman suddenly got up from the table (having eaten his oysters and emptied his second glass of punch).

"I must go home," he said gloomily. "Miss N., of course, married Hefflebower."

"But I thought you spoke of being married, too?" I reminded him.

"Look once more in the glass, the way I told you," he proposed, ignoring my remark.

I took it up impulsively, and did so. Was my new acquaintance a magician, or was I deceived by some subtle influence in the punch, or overexcited by this story? Certainly on peering into the opera-glass I discerned somewhere between the large and the small end what looked like the interior of the place of entertainment we had left, and among the reflected faces that of a beautiful young woman especially prominent. Behind her, at one side, I was sure I could make out my friend Hefflebower.

"You see, I have it all there," exclaimed the owner of the glass, with triumph. "No one can take away these memories or associations, and they have the unusual advantage of being visible."

I glanced a second time in the lenses, but the figures I had seen were now gone. Before I could demand an explanation, my singular companion had said good-night, and disappeared, taking his visionary tubes with him.

I made no further attempt to clear up this mystery, and will make none now. But I spent some time in the restaurant box, ruminating on the queer abiding places of the romantic. The old man's case seemed to show how the poetic part of some lives stands in about the same relation to the prosaic as if seen through the wrong end of the opera-glass.

I afterwards learnt that this eccentric gentleman was Sheale, the bank director, who, after his disappointment, married his housekeeper, and was never seen at the theatre except when The Lady of Lyons was playing.

HIGH PLAY.

A COMEDY OFF THE STAGE.

By George Manville Fenn.

SUMMARY.

The story opens with an interview between Lady Braetoun and her son Roderick, in which she endeavours to induce him to give up fast living and marry Olive, Isaac Emsworth's heiress. After the interview he goes to see his racehorse in the country with Lucy Lee, a chorus girl, familiarly known as "Baby," who rides the horse round the field.

CHAPTER III.

The Shadow Begins.

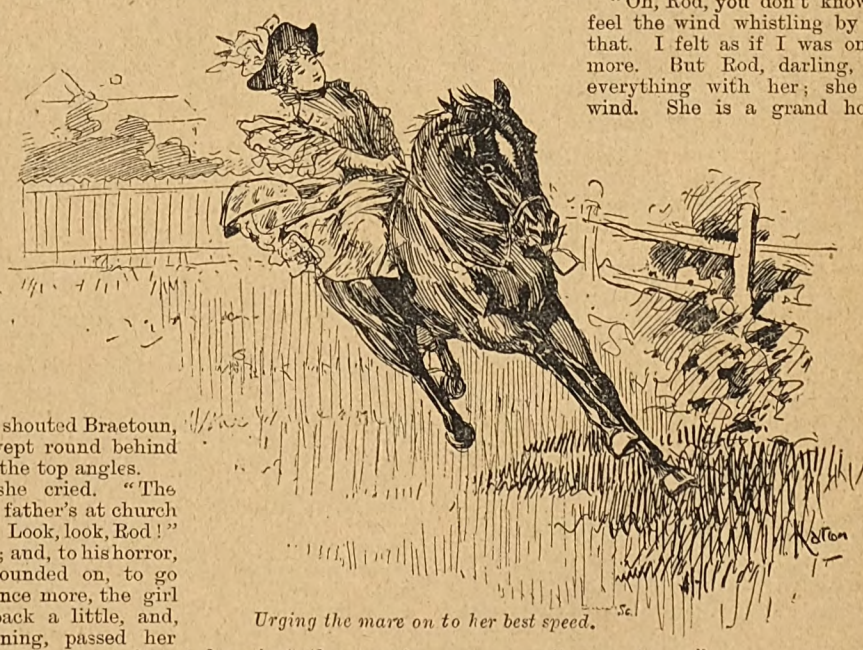
Braetoun stood as if turned to stone, while the mare skimmed over the grass like a swallow. He felt paralysed, expecting every moment to see the frail little figure thrown.

But after the first few wild leaps Lucy recovered her balance and sat nearly upright, her yielding figure giving rhythmically to the graceful movements, while the mare answered quickly to the light hand upon the rein.

As they swept round the great field, and began to turn, the girl's face was flushed with excitement.

"Stop, stop!" shouted Braetoun, as the mare swept round behind him, cutting off the top angles.

"No, no!" she cried. "The boy's gone; his father's at church—no one to see. Look, look, Rod!" she cried loudly; and, to his horror, as the mare bounded on, to go down the field once more, the girl threw herself back a little, and, quick as lightning, passed her right leg over from where it rested against the mare's shoulder, and rose again, seated califourchon, as the French term it, riding like an Eastern woman, and urging the mare on to her best speed.



Urging the mare on to her best speed.

"She is mad," muttered Braetoun, and the moisture gathered upon his temples and in the palms of his hands. "She must come off now."

Setting his teeth, he watched her gliding along and fully prepared for the catastrophe as the corner was turned at the bottom; but though the mare skimmed round there and at the next, leaning over like a horse in a circus, with the light lace and tulle of the girl's costume fluttering behind, nothing happened. This time she began to check the mare, and as they neared the top, easing more and more, and pulling up just beyond her companion, to wait smiling till he walked up looking black as night.

"There," she cried with a merry laugh, and her eyes sparkling with excitement. "You said I had no grip. That's how I used often to ride when I was a girl."

"You little fool!" he cried angrily. "I saw you the first time in burlesque; I nearly saw you the last time in tragedy. Are you mad?"

"Oh, Rod, you don't know what it is to feel the wind whistling by you again like that. I felt as if I was only twelve once more. But Rod, darling, you must win everything with her; she goes like the wind. She is a grand horse."

"How could you!" he panted, with his hand upon his breast; "you've given me a horrible palpitation."

"What! Did I frighten my darling boy? What nonsense! It was delightful; it made me feel so young and happy again. It was just like being at the old farm before I came up to Aunt Duncan and the theatre."

"Pity you ever came it seems to me."

"Oh, Rod, dear, don't, please, please, look so cross. It was only a bit of fun."

"So wild, so dangerous," he said, looking white, and as if his nerves had had a nasty jar. "I stood watching, expecting to see you fall with your foot in the stirrup, and be dragged to death."

"Oh, how horrid! To go thinking such things! I wasn't a bit afraid. I don't think I could be afraid of anything."

They drove on back to town.

"I know that," he said.

"Yes I am. There's one thing frightens me."

"Eh, what's that?"

"I often wake in the night and lie and think of it, and it makes me shiver, Rod."

"Bogey under the bed?" he cried mockingly.

"The bogey of my life, Rod."

"What is it—want more money?"

"It frightens me so that I lie there and cry."

"Poor little Baby! What is it, then?"

"What I talked about before I rode."

"Nonsense!" he said hastily. "Here! Hi! Vinnis, come and take the mare. Now then, jump," he continued, as he thrust his arm through the rein, and placed a hand on either side of the little waist.

She glanced towards the farm buildings, put her hands on his shoulders, and let them glide onward, as she leapt into his arms, clasping his neck and kissing him quickly twice before he shook her off.

"Don't be a fool, Baby. Do you want that boy to see? Here, come and take the mare. When is your father coming back?"

"'Spect him every moment, m' lord."

"You lying young scoundrel, you don't expect him for hours! Tell him from me that if ever I come down again at such an important time and find he has left the mare with no one to look after her but you, I shall get another trainer."

"Yes, m'lord," said the lad, as he walked away with the mare, and then to himself: "Likely. Who'd manage her but him or me? Kick 'em to the middle o' next week. He won't do that."

"Isn't one boy enough to look after her, Rod?" said the girl some time after, as Braetoun mounted beside her in the phæton, and he began to drive back.

"No. Half-a-dozen are not amongst such a set of rogues and thieves. Some one'll be getting at her and spoiling her for the next race. Bah! I get sick of it all."

"Oh, Rod, dear," she said with tears in her eyes; "don't spoil our delightful day."

"You make me," he said bitterly.

"Rod! When I am loving you more and more every time! I am so sorry if I haven't done what you like."

But the shadow gathered blacker as they drove on back to town, and the dinner and champagne did nothing to chase it away.

CHAPTER IV.

PAPA'S BLUNDER.

ISAAC EMSWORTH, a thick-set, keen-looking man of fifty, with strongly marked features, and over-hanging eyebrows of the same grizzly hue as his closely-cut hair and beard, sat in his library at Eaton Place, reading a letter.

"Confound 'em!" he said; "no sooner is the cat away than the cursed mice begin to play. I shall have to go. Such a nuisance, too, just now."

He banged the letter down on the table, and took out an old silver hunting watch by a piece of much frayed string.

"Quarter past ten, and not down yet. I could have put on five hundred bonnets and shawls."

Keeping the watch in his hand, he rose and rang impatiently, occupying the time that elapsed before the bell was answered by walking up and down the thick Turkey carpet.

"Come—come—come!" he muttered; "what a while you are. Oh, there you are, Johnson."

This to a very important-looking butler, who glanced rather contemptuously at the old silver watch lying open in his master's hand with the frayed string hanging down and ending in a roughly-tied knot.

"Is the carriage at the door?"

"Been there a quarter of an hour, sir."

"That's right! Send up to Miss Emsworth's room and say it is waiting."

"Yes, sir."

The important butler marched out—it was not a walk—and Isaac Emsworth, late of Laurentstroom, South Africa, stood opening and shutting the old well-worn silver watch with a series of sharp snaps.

"Yes, d——n 'em. I shall have to go and she won't like it. More do I! These things always happen at the wrong time. I shall have to ask Lady Braetoun to——Oh, Olive, my dear, what a time you have been! I could have—Humph! Ha! Yes! Well, you do look very nice."

He began frowningly and impatient of speech as the door opened, closed, and light seemed to have come into the gloomy room to brighten it in the shape of a charmingly dressed girl of twenty, whose dark brown hair, creamy complexion, and large, soft eyes, suggested the appropriate choice of her name. Then his voice grew softer, the hard, business look gave way to a smile, and father gazed proudly at daughter as he ended with the above homely words.

"You like my dress?"

"Hang the dress, my dear! I was thinking of you. H'm, yes, like the dress, too! But, I say, my dear, time's money, you know. You have been a deuce of a while!"

"Oh, papa, what nonsense! Why, Melson half scolded me for hurrying so."

"Oh, she did, did she? Strikes me, my dear, that I shall have to put my foot down with some of these fine gentlemen and ladies here. But there, let's be off."

He began throwing his letters into an open case, after thrusting his watch back in his pocket, leaving the string hanging outside. Then, as he banged down the lid and locked it, his daughter came close up.

"Eh, my dear, what is it?" he said, for she began smilingly to tuck the frayed string after the watch into his waistcoat pocket.

"You ought to have a gold watch and a handsome chain, papa, dear," she said, as she reached up and kissed him.

"I? What for? I wouldn't change that old watch for the best in London. Good old friend, my dear. Ha! that's nice; give us another," he continued, with his hard look softening more and more. "Don't be afraid, pet; I shan't get tired. You don't know how hungry I was for a few all those years when I was out there."

"And so was I, dear," said the girl, clinging to the muscular arm, and repeating the salute. "Madame Duvaille was so good and kind, but I often used to feel as if I must run away from St. Cloud to come over to you."

"H'm, yes, I wish you had, my darling. No, I don't. It wouldn't have done. H'm, what nice soft cheeks! But you look very pale. I mustn't have you ill."

"Now you are fidgeting again, papa, dear," said the girl earnestly; "and I really am quite well. Only a little tired, perhaps, with being out too much. Let's go somewhere into the country for a month, so as to be quiet and together more."

"H'm, yes, it would be nice, my dear, but—no, no, can't at present; I'm too busy, and you've too many engagements."

"Yes, papa," said the girl rather sadly.

"But I mustn't have you ill. Can't have you going away and leaving me as your poor mother did."

"Oh, papa!"

"My darling!" he said softly, with his eyes moistening. "But none of that nonsense. No use for me to make a big fortune for you, and you not spend it. But there; come along."

"Where are we going, dear?"

"Eh? Going? Oh, you'll soon see. Just to make a call on somebody."

"So early? And how mysterious you are, dear," said the girl merrily.

"Am I? Well, the mystery will soon be at an end. Now then."

He opened the door, and followed the graceful girl into the hall, holding up his head proudly, and putting on a stiff, important mien, as the footman waiting hurried down to a handsome barouche and magnificent pair of horses, and the butler handed hat, gloves, and cane.

"Seven hundred and nine, Wimpole Street."

The footman touched his hat, mounted to his seat beside the coachman, the horses started at a rapid pace, and Isaac Emsworth threw himself back and sat proudly watching with his eyes half closed, the bright eager interest his child took in the busy streets, the gay-looking park they crossed, and, above all, he felt his breast swell as he duly noted the looks of admiration that were darted at the unconscious girl.

Very little was said till Wimpole Street was reached, and then Olive said quickly:

"What a great, gloomy, dull place, papa! Please do tell me whom we are going to see."

"You'll know in a few minutes, pet. There, don't look like that."

The carriage was drawn up at a wide door bearing two brass plates, the footman knocked and rang loudly, his person preventing his young mistress from reading on the upper plate, "George Murray, M.D.," and on the lower, and much newer, "Allan Murray, M.D."

The door was thrown open. The footman returned after a brief colloquy with a grave-looking man in plain clothes, the steps were rattled down, and directly after the visitors were ushered into a large gloomy-looking room, the man taking away the card handed to him from a much-worn pocket-book.

"Why, papa!" cried the girl flushing, and then turning pale, as she caught excitedly at her father's hand. "You've brought me to a doctor's."

"Well, well, well, pet," he said, smiling, as he held and patted the delicately-gloved little hand. "Suppose I have? You're not going to be frightened by a dose of physic."

"No, no, papa, dear," she whispered in agitated tones; "but—but, indeed, I'm not ill."

"Of course not. Not ill. You see, darling, I didn't want to alarm you, but you have scared me. Your poor dear mother was so delicate, and you have changed so lately that, eh?—ha—ha—ha!—don't you see, your poor old dad wanted you to consult the best physician in London so as to make him happy, eh?"

"Yes, yes, you dear, kind old dada," said the girl in an excited whisper, as he ended his blundering speech and forced laugh, which sounded very dreary; "but, but—but——"

"Now, now, now, my own darling, but you must not be foolish and hysterical. Come, be brave. Why, pet, Olive, he won't want to cut off a leg; it only means pills every night and morning—well shaken before taken, and that sort of thing."

"But, papa, darling, you don't understand. You oughtn't to have brought me. I ought to have come with a lady friend, and——"

"Eh? Oh, I didn't think of that, my dear," said Emsworth, looking aghast, "I thought——"

"Doctor Allan Murray will see you now, sir," said the servant at the door.

CHAPTER V.

Papa's Blunder, which the Doctor Caps.

Olive rose from her seat, calm and dignified of mien, ready to face the difficulty.

"I sail in the 'Greyberg Castle' on Friday."

"Come, papa," she said.

"But—er—if you think that we ought, my dear?" whispered her father.

"It is too late now, dear," she whispered back, and she walked firmly to the door, followed by her father, who looked the more agitated of the pair, as they were shown into the doctor's consulting-room, where Olive changed colour on facing; instead of some grey, benevolent-looking old gentleman, a grave, dark man of some three or four-and-thirty, who rose and motioned them to seats, slightly raising his eyebrows at the rather unusual character of the visit.

Slight as was the movement, Olive Emsworth, in her then highly-strung, excited condition, saw and resented it; but, making an effort over herself, she was the next moment perfectly calm.

"I find I have done wrong, Doctor Murray," said Emsworth hurriedly. "I ought to have understood the etiquette of such matters better, and left my daughter to come with a lady friend; but I am a rough man. I could only think of checking whatever was wrong in my daughter's health, and hearing your opinion. There, sir, I beg your pardon, I beg my dear child's, here, for my mistake—I—I meant it for the best."

His voice sounded a little husky as he ended, and Olive's hand stole into his, while her beautiful eyes beamed upon him with a look of love.

As she turned now to meet the doctor firmly, the blood rose again to her temples in a warm flush, for she found that he was gazing at her intently, but with a quiet tact he turned at once to his other visitor, to say, in a grave, calm way:

"Perhaps it would have been better, Mr. Emsworth, and, of course, it is the custom for a lady to accompany a patient on such a visit; but I quite understand your position, and I feel sure that Miss Emsworth fully grasps a father's anxiety, and, under the circumstances, will excuse any little questions I may ask her—if," he said with a quiet smile, as he turned to her again, "I think it necessary to ask any."

Olive bowed coldly, but she felt as she now met his gaze, that he was looking at her differently. She could not have analysed and described the two glances, but she knew that now it was the physician addressing her, and the sensation of resentment from which she suffered grew less painful.

"By-the-way, Mr. Emsworth," continued the doctor smiling pleasantly, "I ought not to sail under false colours. You must have been thinking of my father when you spoke of the first physician in London. He has to all intents and purposes retired from his practice, and only sees a few of his oldest patients. I would, however, if this were a serious case, ask him to see Miss Emsworth."

"Then you don't think it is, sir?" said Emsworth excitedly.

"My dear sir, no. The matter is so simple that I can see at a glance what is wrong. Moreover, I can guarantee that in a very short time your daughter will be in perfect health."

"Then you don't think—her mother—that terrible——" faltered Emsworth.

"My dear sir, no. Look at your child's face. Nothing of the kind, I assure you. Pray tell me if I am wrong, Miss Emsworth," he said quietly. "You have been into society a great deal lately?"

She coloured at the directness of the question and bowed her head.

"You have been to a good many concerts, balls, and theatres?"

"Oh, yes!" she said naïvely, "a great many."

"And, I suppose, to many of those health-destroying crushes which fashionable ladies give and call 'At Homes?'"

"Oh, yes, for the last three months," said Olive, smiling.

"My dear young lady, do you keep pets? Have you a bird—linnet or canary?"

"I have a goldfinch," she said, feeling now half annoyed.

"Exactly. Then let me tell you this: If you had hung that bird's cage in one of the suffocating drawing-rooms that you have visited, the mephitic air it had to breathe would have poisoned it—the bird would have died."

"Ah, yes," said Emsworth quickly, "of course."

"Exactly. There, my dear sir, can you wonder that your daughter looks a little worn and pale?"

"But do you think that is all, doctor?"

"I am sure it is all, sir, and I hope Miss Emsworth will not be angry with me and feel vexed at having for a time to change her way of life."

"Indeed, no," she said eagerly, as the last trace of resentment died away.

"Then," he said, smiling, "I shall prescribe with the greatest rigour. Give up society for a time, and then enjoy 'At Home's' sparingly. Mr. Emsworth, take your daughter for three months into the country—the seaside for preference. A sea voyage would be better; but that is, perhaps, proposing what might be a difficulty."

"Eh? No, I think not," said Emsworth, starting. "If you would not mind, my dear?"

"Mind what, papa?"

"Going with me."

"Going with you?" she said, changing colour a little.

"Well—er—you see, my dear—letters—only this morning—I haven't had time to break the news to you; I was so anxious, too, about coming here. The fact is, I am obliged to go out to the Cape in the next boat."

"Oh, papa!" she cried, laying her hand upon his arm.

"You—you wouldn't like to go with me, of course?"

"Yes, yes. Don't go and leave me behind."

The curiously intent look came into Doctor Murray's eyes again, as he watched the beautiful face before him, and saw the quiver about the lips and the agitation which ruffled the brow.

"I don't want to, my darling," said Emsworth dolefully; "but what does Doctor Murray say to that—would it do?"

"My dear sir, nothing could be better. Miss Emsworth would find it, I presume, a delightful trip."

"Then, by George! Olive, my darling, we'll go together. I shan't mind it then a bit."

The girl's face lit up with content again, and she turned to look gratefully at the doctor, but felt almost startled at his earnest gaze, which once more passed away.

"May I ask you what vessel you would go by?" he said.

"The Greyberg Castle is the next."

"And you will go by it?"

"Certainly, if I can get berths; if not, by the next."

"This is a curious little world, Miss Emsworth," said the doctor, smiling, as he turned to her; and once more she felt quite at ease.

"I do not understand you."

"I mean that it is singular how we are all linked together in some form or another. I shall surprise you, I am sure, when I tell you that I sail in the Greyberg Castle on Friday."

"You do?" cried Emsworth boisterously. "Capital! Then you will be on the spot in the event of my daughter requiring medical aid?"

"My dear sir," said the doctor, "throw that idea entirely away. Miss Emsworth requires no medical aid—nothing but that which nature will give her. Lord Bourne——"

"The ex-Prime Minister?"

"Yes. He is an old patient of my father's, and he is rather exhausted by the late Session of Parliament. My father has prescribed a sea voyage and rest, and is coming back to take charge of the practice so as to set me free to go with Lord Bourne upon this trip—very much against my inclination, Miss Emsworth," he continued; "but good Prime Ministers are scarce, and we may want his Lordship again."

"I am delighted, doctor," said Emsworth warmly, "and if money can do it we shall go by the Greyberg Castle, sir. We will go. I'll buy somebody out if all the berths are taken."

"I shall be glad to meet my patient again," said the doctor quietly, turning to Olive, "though I have only quelled a false alarm."

"You've set me at rest, doctor," said Emsworth heartily; "but you'll write her a prescription or two, eh?"

"Write down 'Take all the fresh air you can,' Miss Emsworth; 'live well, and have a good quantum of sleep.' Surely that is not necessary?"

"But is that all, doctor?"

"Everything, my dear sir. I could do no more."

He looked as if the interview were at an end, and Olive rose, to hold out her hand and say naïvely:

"Thank you, Doctor Murray, for setting my father's mind at rest; thank you very much."

"I wish I could set every troubled parent's mind at rest as easily, Miss Emsworth."

He walked with them to the door, after touching a bell, while somehow Olive felt as if she would rather he had not taken the fee her father pressed into his hand.

But she did not see that it remained there after she had gone, and that as the door closed, the doctor stood gazing dreamingly after them, with the former intent look in his eyes, till there was a step on the floor-cloth outside, when he started with an angry gesture.

"What folly!" he said quickly, and resuming his chair, he thrust a rustling note into a drawer, and sat there ready and prepared for the next patient who was ushered in.

A dozen more came and went, before the grave-looking manservant brought in a card.

"No, no, Rouch," he said petulantly; "it is not fair. Let the patients come in their turn."

"Yes, sir; but his lordship said——"

The doctor glanced at the card.

"Oh, well, show him in," he said; and Lord Braetoun, looking very haggard, entered the room and threw himself in the patient's chair, to sit gazing in his medical adviser's face.

"Well," said the doctor coldly, "what do you want Roderick?"

"What do I want? Look at me. I'm d——d bad thi time."

"Yes, you do look bad, but why do you come?"

"Why did I come? I like that! I tell you I never was so bad before. I can't sleep; I can't eat; I can only take champagne, or brandy, or both."

"So I see. Your hand's like an aspen leaf. Who's the next heir to the title?—a distant cousin, I think."

"Hang it all, Allan, don't talk to a fellow like that! I'm half dead as it is; do you want to kill me right off?"

"If I did I needn't take the trouble. You're killing yourself. I've told you a dozen times, only you don't believe me."

"But I do believe you, old man. Oh, hang it, do set me up again; I will follow out your advice."

"Not you, never; but you've pretty well done it this time. Your nerves are regularly shattered."

"I've had an awful bit of luck."

"Turf?"

"Yes. Something that was a dead certainty."

"There is only one dead certainty," said the doctor coldly.

"Oh, I say, don't, don't! I want help, not for you to jump on me. I was as sure as sure this time; and it would have pulled me round a bit; but a set of cursed scoundrels worked the favourite that way, and I lost."

"Serve you right."

"Well, do you think I don't know that?"

"So as soon as you found you had been swindled, you went to the glass?"

"Yes," groaned Braetoun; "regularly ran amok."

"Well, I can't help you, and I have important patients waiting."

"Oh, don't talk like that, old man. I tell you I'm so run down that I could sit and cry like a child."

"An idiot, you mean."

"Don't, don't be a brute to me, Allan. For old Eton and college day's sake, stick to me and wind me up again. Start me once more, and I'll turn over a new leaf."

The young man reached over and caught the doctor's hand, clinging to it with tears in his eyes; and Murray looked down at him with pitying contempt.

"It's waste of time to do anything for you, Roddy, lad," he said. "You'll promise anything, but you've no moral power left to carry it out. You're no longer your own master. There's only one thing that would bring you round."

"Yes: what is it? I'm ready to do anything now."

"Very well; I'll try you. Go upstairs to my bedroom and lie down till all my patients are seen, and then I'll take you."

"Take me—where?" cried Braetoun wildly.

"To an asylum. There is no other chance for you!"

"Yes there is," cried the young man fiercely. "I have a revolver in my drawer at home. Six shots. I've got the pluck to fire till one of them does the business."

"Go and read what Hamlet says about that, and don't talk nonsense."

"I shall have to do it, but I don't want to, for the mater's sake. The old woman has picked out a wife for me."

"A what?" cried Murray contemptuously. "You with a wife! Why you'd do a kinder act in killing a woman than in marrying her. It would be an outrage."

"Yes, I know. It would be now, but I'm going to reform—I want to, now. I do, upon my soul."

"Poor oath. I don't believe you've got one, or a heart either. You are a complete wreck: morally and physically gone."

"Yes, yes, I know, old man; and it's horrid to think of being completely gone at two or three-and-thirty."

"Oh, I don't know. You have outlived all pleasure in life."

"Quite," said the poor wretch sadly; "but look here; you could pull me up again, and—and a wife would save me in the other way."

"One with a large fortune, I suppose?" said Murray scornfully.

"Well, a man must have money."

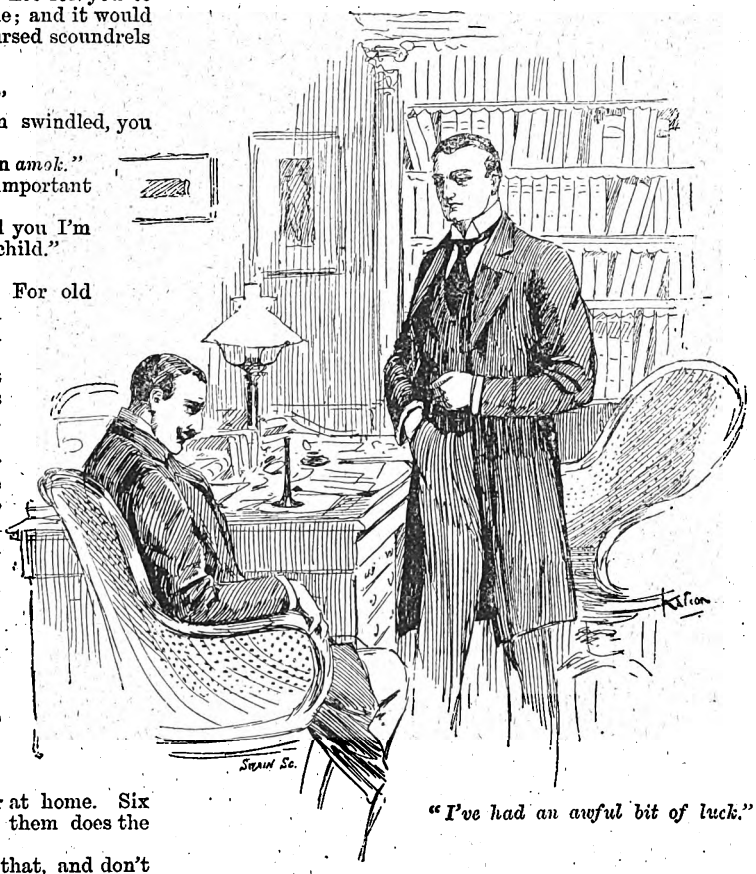
"To fool away. Braetoun, it would be a crime for you to marry an innocent woman, and I'm not going to be your accomplice by giving you the chance."

"Oh, you doctors are brutes—brutes—brutes!" groaned the wretched man. "I've told you I'll turn over a new leaf."

"I've proved the value of your promises a dozen times."

"Give me another chance, Al, old fellow, for the mater's sake."

"Go to some other doctor."



"I've had an awful bit of luck."

"No, no. There isn't a man in London who understands me but you. They'd kill me before they could get into the right treatment."

"Nonsense! Go and try."

"I won't," cried the wretched man fiercely; "but I swear that if you don't take me in hand again I'll use the revolver."

"You haven't even the courage to do that."

"Haven't I? You'll see; and when I've done it they won't stick a stake through me and burn me at the cross roads, will they?"

"No; they'll call it, correctly, temporary insanity: for you are mad."

"Almost raving. Well, when I'm gone I'd rather be the dead man than be you with a kind of murder on your conscience. Am I to go and do——?"

"Look here, Rod, I'll give you your last chance. If you don't do as I tell you and follow out my instructions, as well as lead a new life, I swear I will wash my hands of you for ever."

"I'll do anything—anything, old man."

"Very well; I'll give you something to take now, and as soon as you are a little better, break the news to your mother, and then pack up."

"Break the news—pack up—what do you mean?"

"I mean that I am going on a voyage to South Africa."

"You are?"

"Yes, and I will take you with me. It may mean your salvation."

"But—but I can't leave London. There is my horse—and the mare, and—and—I don't see how I can get away."

"From the intended?" said Murray, with a look of contempt.

"Yes, I meant that," said Braetoun slowly; "but—but—yes, I will. I want to get on the right track again. I will go."

Murray took a sheet of paper from a stationery case, wrote out a prescription, and handed it to his visitor.

"Call at Bell's to get that made up, and take a dose before you leave the shop. Come and see me at twelve to-morrow."

"God bless you, old fellow!" cried Braetoun piously.

"Better leave His name out of our dealings, my lad. There, be off, off now. I'm busy."

"Won't you shake hands?"

"What is the use? I like to grip the hand of a man I respect."

"And we were such friends from boyhood," said Braetoun bitterly. "Never mind, I can wait, Allan, old chap. I really am going to turn over a new leaf now."

"Let's see, then," said the doctor quietly.

The next moment he was alone, gazing in a peculiar dreamy way at the chair where Olive Emsworth had been seated, seeing her there once again, recalling every look and gesture, the quick animated play of her countenance, and the soft pathetic tones of her voice.

A tap at the door made him start back into everyday life, feeling irritable and annoyed with himself, though he could not have explained why.

"Shall I show in the next patient, sir?"

"Yes, of course; I am waiting," he said quickly.

The dreamy picture was gone, and his last patient came into the mental field.

"Going to take a wife with money. Going to turn over a new leaf, eh, Roderick?" he said softly. "I wonder what will be seen on the next page?"

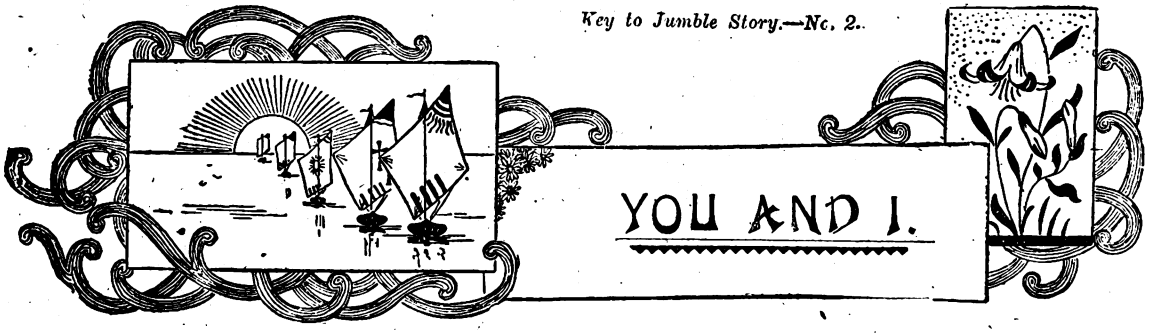
Key to Jumble Story.—No. 2.



A MAN and a woman. A pathway white with the milky pallor of the moon. Shadows lurking on every side, emblematical of their two lives.

Lovers. Oh, yes—or why was her cheek stained red as those roses sleeping within reach of her fingers, which were locked in the man's palm? He tried to speak, but his voice was choked by emotion. This was good-bye.

The woman raised her eyes, her lips, and the anguish of parting was forgotten in the ecstasy of a long embrace.

"I shall remember," she whispered, "always! You and I have been more than all the world to each other, you and I!"

These three words were repeated in lingering accents, that faltered and ended in a sigh.

"Stay," he answered passionately, "life is only an hour; take all that it can give while love is in your soul. To-morrow the summer may be over, the flowers will shrivel up, and we shall be old."

"And age spells death," murmured the woman with a shudder.

The man gazed rapturously on the beauty of her face. How pure it looked in the pale light! What a mask, what a mockery!

Yet, good or evil, he loved her; and the fragrance of the summer night was creeping into his very being; everything spoke of hitherto undreamed possibilities.

"Why must you go?" he asked fiercely, "you have no tie in New York! Your home? Bah! What is a woman's home before she marries? Stay, and be my wife."

The woman untangled her fingers, and passed them over her brow.

The grass was wet with dew, and there were drops of agony upon her forehead.

One word broke hoarsely from her lips: "No!"

"If you love me, why in the name of——"

But she clasped her hands, intreating silence.

"Ask for no explanations. Would I had never come to England, to lose my soul in yours. I return to-morrow, it is inevitable. I have two things to seek, Heaven only knows if I shall find them."

"What?" he questioned.

"Rest and repentance!"

As she spoke she broke away, rushed wildly on, till the shadows hid her white gowned figure, and she was lost in mystery.

The following day she sailed, and the man saw her no more.

He only treasured a few parched rose leaves, and her address in New York City.

But the fire of love burnt still in his soul, and at last he wrote to the woman who had said "No."

"I must follow you" (he penned the lines feverishly) "to your home, dearest, and plead again for the love you gave and denied. Remember your own words: 'We have been all the world to each other—you and I.' Cable me the single syllable, 'Come,' and as fast as the seas will bring me, I will come to kneel at your feet."

* * * * *

A woman was lying dead, with roses white and yellow in her hands. She was beautiful in death as in life.

She had found what she sought, rest and repentance!

Beside her still image sat her husband, his head bent, and one hand stretched across his face hiding the awful expression thereon. But the veins on that sinewy hand seemed bursting through the flesh, while his parted lips were dry and bloodless.

Between his trembling fingers he held a letter, addressed to his dead wife in her maiden name. He had only just opened it.

That morning's mail made the cold form of marble beauty horrible in his eyes. Vengeance was turning his soul to gall, mingled with the awful jealousy of the bereaved.

"He shall follow her to her home," he muttered, crumpling her lover's letter with suppressed passion.

Then he wrote the cable: "Come!"

* * * * *

Two men stood face to face. A lover and a husband. One with hope in his heart, the other maddened by his wrongs.

"You have come for my wife," he said slowly, "she is not here, but you shall go to her."

The lover staggered back, and fell heavily with a groan to the earth.

Only a cloud of smoke rose between his body and the woman's husband.

No horror crept through the murderer's veins.

"They are together now," he said, "in the land of falsehood and treachery. Let them love there, if they can."

Two days later the police received a detailed account of the crime, written by the slayer's hand, telling them where to find the murdered man.

"You need not seek for me," he wrote in conclusion. "I have gone where no one will discover me. Justice has been done, that is enough——"

Here the writing ceased abruptly, and the two men the woman had deceived were buried in oblivion.

The Duel at Las Salinas.

Don Mariano Delgado and his English friend, on their way to Las Salinas, rode to the edge of the Mesa where it drops abruptly down to the lower levels. They were forty miles east of the Rio Grande, and fifty or sixty miles from Albuquerque. There lay before them a wide plain which rose into low tablelands off to the south and east. Far to the north-west towered the bold, handsome contours of the Sandia Mountains. Upon the plain, miles away from the foot of the Mesa, two large circular spots shone dazzlingly white. Don Mariano pointed them out to his companion.

"They are the salinas," he said. "Now let us look for the waggons. They should be in sight by this time. Ah, there they are. They will get a loading by noon."

Three waggons, each drawn by four mules, came round a bend of the Mesa at its foot, crawling along towards the white spots on the prairie. They were part of Don Mariano's ranch outfit going to the salinas for salt.

"Let us ride on to the salinas and await them there," said Don Mariano, and the two horsemen picked their way down the rough burrow trail to the plain, then put their horses to a long gallop, which brought them in half-an-hour to the salt lakes—for the salinas literally are lake basins packed solidly with salt. Part of their surface was smooth and level, like a water surface. Other places were rough, and dug out in great holes like cellars, showing where salt-gatherers had been at work. Deeply worn trails led to the lakes from the north, the west, and the south, and the ground about them was trodden with the feet of sheep, horses, and cattle and the wild beasts of the plain, drawn hither by their hunger for salt.

Going out upon one of the basins for a closer examination, the Englishman found that the pure white salt seen upon the surface was only an incrustation a half-inch thick, and that beneath this stratum the salt was darker, as if discoloured by earthy matter.

"How came the salt beds here?" he asked Don Mariano. "Are there salt springs at the bottom of the basins?"

The Don shrugged his shoulders. "Quien sabe?" he answered. "They have always been here. The Spanish colonists who first came to New Mexico, 300 years ago, got their salt here, and their descendants have done the same to this day. Since the railway came the salt we use on our tables, and much that we use for other purposes, is brought from the States. Yet many of the native people still get their salt from here, as my teams come to-day to get the year's supply for the stock upon my ranches. The trails you see centring here are worn by the travel of hundreds of years. And the buffalo and antelope in old times knew the salinas. Ah, I did not think an antelope was left so near the Rio Grande."

At the further end of the further basin three antelopes stood at the edge eagerly nibbling salt. Their hunger for salt had overcome their fear of man, and they acted as if unaware of the two men, who watched the timid, graceful creatures as the Don went on:

"I can remember the time when we had to have weapons in our hands and be a good-sized party when we came here for salt. The Mescalero Apachés and the Navajoes were liable to come as far as the salt lakes, and they were always hostile. The Comanches were supposed to be friendly with the New Mexicans, but even they were not always to be trusted when they met a weak party out on the plains. There has been a good deal of Indian fighting, first and last, about these basins and the trails leading to them. There was a duel fought here many years ago that was very remarkable. It occurred long before I was born, but the story has been handed down in our family, for my grandfather, Don Porfirio Delgado, was present when it occurred. It came about though a foolish promise that a Mexican made a Comanche chief, which he thought he would never be called on to fulfil.

"The man was a Comanchero as we say, who went out on the plains every year to trade with the Comanches. To carry through a bargain, or to help himself out of some tight place, he promised the Indian that he would give him his daughter for a wife when she should have grown large enough to marry. He was not called on to redeem his promise, for he was dead when the Indian demanded the girl, but it made trouble enough for other people, as you shall hear, if you care to listen to the story.

"It came about in this way. My grandfather, Don Porfirio Delgado, had come from his hacienda out to the salinas in August with a large party of his people to get his year's supply of salt. They came with a caravan of pack mules and carettas, as we call the old-fashioned carts made wholly of wood and raw hide, and drawn by oxen yoked by the horns. So many of his men at that season of the year were away herding sheep and cattle that to fill up his party he had brought with him some of the women that lived on his estate to help in their places.

"Among them was Manuelita Trujillo, the Comanchero's daughter, then an orphan girl, sixteen years old. Our people, you know, mature early, and she was a young woman at that time, and a handsome one. Francisco Segura, a young vaquero in my grandfather's employ, thought so at any rate, and since she was one of the party, he had come along to herd the cattle and mules of the outfit.

"On the third day after arriving at the salinas they had all their carts and pack mules loaded with salt. They were yoking up the oxen ready for a start for home, when a band of Indians came riding towards them from the menas. Not knowing to what tribe they belonged, the Mexicans drew their carts into a circle, secured mules and oxen, got their firearms ready, and waited. When the Indians came near our people saw that they were Comanches, and felt easier in their minds; but still they knew that they could not trust them very far, in spite of the fact that they were at peace with the New Mexicans.

"The Indians halted just out of gunshot from the caravan, for they saw that our people had firearms and were on their guard. But their chief, a large fine-looking Indian, with war paint on his face, gave the peace sign and rode towards the caravan. Before he had come half-way down Don Porfirio recognised him, and the Mexican, who had fought against the Comanches in the past, said: 'It is Santarito.' All knew the name, for he was of the bravest and most warlike of the chiefs that rode on the plains. Manuelita knew about him, and at his coming she shrank behind the other women, and drew her reboso about her face, but he saw her.

"My grandfather has often described to me the way Santarito looked as he rode up to them on his war horse, a splendid mustang, full of fire and speed. He wore a hunting shirt, fringed leggings, and mocassins of buckskin, and in his black streaming hair were three eagle's feathers. Hung to his neck by a buckskin thong, and resting on his broad, sinewy chest, was a great star of gold set with precious stones, that he had taken from the uniform of some dead Mexican officer of high rank. Across his back was slung his bow and quiver of arrows, and he carried his long lance in his hand.

"When he had come quite near the party he stopped and spoke to my grandfather, calling him by name, for they had met before in war and peace. He spoke in Spanish, for it was told of him that he had been educated at a Franciscan Father's school, from which he had run away to join his wild tribesmen.

"'Señor Delgado,' he said, 'will you choose peace or war?'

"'We would have peace,' answered my grandfather. 'Why should we fight? The Comanches and the New Mexicans are friends.'

"'Then give up to me the girl Manuelita. Her father promised her to me when she was a child. Give her to me, and there shall be peace and gifts between us.'

"Don Porfirio looked towards Manuelita. She had sunk to the ground, her face ashy pale, her look full of horror.

"'What is this the chief says?' asked the Don of her. 'What does he mean by saying that your father promised you to him? Is it true?' She lifted her head. 'It is false,' she cried. 'My father never meant it. He had no right to give me, a Christian girl, to an Indian.'

"Don Porfirio looked very grave. He saw that some sort of a promise had been made, and knew that whether or not the father had spoken in jest, or had a right to give it, it would make no difference with the chief, who was there with his men behind him, and meant to have the girl. No one knew better than my grandfather the dangers and evil consequences of a fight with the Comanches at that time out on the lonely plain, encumbered with his loaded waggons, and far away from water.

"A third of his party were women, and the Indians outnumbered the men by two to one. The Comanches had no firearms, but they were brave fighters, and could do deadly work at close quarters with their bows and arrows. And then the women! If the Indians were victorious there was a certain and terrible fate for the men, but that of the women was as certain or worse. Manuelita was only an orphan girl whose father had been of no very good repute, and she had no relatives living to take up her cause.

"'Let the Comanchero's daughter be given up to the chief,' whispered some of the Mexicans whose wives and daughters were with them. 'She is but one, and it will save the lives of many. Her father liked the Comanches well enough, and she may get along as well among them. And did he not promise her to Santarito?'

"Manuelita heard, or felt, these whispers, and shuddered beneath the reboso she had drawn over her face. But there was one who came with her, and took her hand in his, and stood by her, saying that he would protect her while his life should last. It was Francisco Segura, the vaquero, and his example gave courage to others. Don Porfirio was not a man of a coward's way of thinking. He would protect his own whatever might befal, and Manuelita was of his household. He knew the risk he was taking for himself and his people when he said:

"'Santarito, the girl is not willing to go. Her father had not the right to say who would have her when she was a little child. She is under my protection, and shall remain with her own people, since she so chooses. See, here is a colt, fit for breaking next year, which I have reared to be my own horse. I will give him to you in acquittance of her father's promise.'

"The chief laughed scornfully, and made a gesture of contempt.

"'I will give you my own saddle besides,' the Don continued, 'so that you may be equipped in a manner befitting a great chief when you mount the colt next year.'

"Santarito's look was black, and he plainly was impatient to do the talking.

"'I count nothing for your colt and saddle,' he said. 'The girl I will have, with no words or waiting. For the last time I ask you, shall I take her in peace or in war?'

"'Let it be war, since you will have it so,' said Don Porfirio growing angry in turn. 'I have offered you all I have to give.'

"Santarito gave a swift glance round towards his band and lifted his lance. But he remained where he was and did not give the signal to his men to attack. He was not the head chief of his tribe, and it might be a serious thing for him to break a treaty on his own responsibility. Besides, he knew that if it came to battle some of his men would be killed, however the affair turned in the end.

"'We may settle the matter another way if you choose,' he said. 'Come out and fight me single-handed before all our men. Face to face we will decide whether I or your people shall have the girl. Or, if you are too old, send one of your younger men.'

"He looked as he spoke to Francisco Segura, standing at Manuelita's side. At this word, Francisco took a step forward.

"'I will fight you,' he called out. 'Don Porfirio, give me leave to fight the Comanche chief.'

"Santarito looked at him, and his lip curled. 'I am a chief,' he said, 'and he is only a cowherd. But let him come out and be killed. I will carry his scalp on my lance when I ride with Manuelita back to our rancheria.'

"'Go, since you ask it, and God be with you,' said the Don to Francisco. 'But ride my black horse. You know him, for you broke him as a colt. He will not flinch or fail you.'

"On the Don's black horse, the swiftest in the Rio Grande valley, Francisco rode out to meet the chief. He carried in his hand a gun, and upon his saddle horn his braided lasso was loosely coiled. The women lamented and the men looked very grave at his prospects, for he could give but a single shot with his gun, while the Indian's quiver was full of arrows, every one of which he would send in surely in the time it would take Francisco to reload his piece. And then there was the lance, and Francisco had none.

"Santarito rode back, keeping to the left until he had reached a point equally distant from his band and the caravan. Francisco took up a similar position on the right, and the two faced each other a hundred paces apart. The Indian laid his lance in the loops of his saddle and took his bow and half-a-dozen arrows in his hand. Then with a shout to his pony he dashed upon Francisco, waiting to receive him with fusil raised. Half way to him the Comanche swung down sidewise from his saddle, so that his pony's body should protect him from a shot, and swerved the animal to pass Francisco in a circle. At the same time, from under its neck he sent arrow after arrow at him as fast as he could count.

"The second arrow sent struck Francisco's saddle, and the next passed through his sleeve, grazing his shoulder. At the same moment he fired, aiming to hit the Comanche's head beneath the pony's neck. The bullet missed Santarito, but it was a lucky shot for all that, for it struck the bow, breaking it. Instantly the Indian swung up in his saddle, grasped his lance, and charged straight at his enemy.

"Francisco set spurs to meet the charge, at the same time lifting from his saddle horn the coils of his lasso. With the gun held in his left hand, he parried the lance thrust, wheeled his horse behind the Indian's pony as it went by like a flash, and flung his lasso after Santarito. His aim was true. The noose fell over the Comanche's head and shoulders, and, before he could throw it off, Francisco had caught a turn of the braided rope about his saddle horn, wheeled his horse, and set the spurs hard into his flanks.

"With a bound the fiery animal was off and away, jerking the Indian from his saddle, over his pony's back, and dragging him helpless over the prairie. As he fell to the ground the lasso slipped above his shoulders, but tightened again about his neck, and held.

"At sight of this, the Indians gave their war cry, and started for Francisco. He did not pull rein till they were half way to him. Then he checked his horse, leapt to the ground, threw the lasso from the Indian's neck—the neck was broken—plunged his knife twice into the Comanche's heart to make his work sure, took the gold star from the chief's breast, and springing into the saddle dashed back to the caravan with a score of arrows whistling after him. The Indians pulled up their ponies before getting very near the Mexican party, and turned back to where their dead chief lay. They made no further hostile move, but seemed stunned and downcast at the result of the duel. They did not wait long but rode away to the eastward in the direction where their rancherias lay carrying with them Santarito's body bound across the back of his war horse.

"This is the story of the duel at Las Salinas. Francisco, of course, was a great hero after the affair. He married Manuelita that autumn, as he had wanted to do for years past, and he became head vaquero on my grandfather's ranches, so they were both prosperous and happy.

"When, after many years, his working days were over, his son took his place on my father's estate."

Just as Don Mariano finished his story the sound of hoofbeats near at hand caused the two to look round. The approaching waggons were still a mile away, but the foreman had ridden ahead to select the spot where they should haul up. He was a stalwart, handsome Mexican, about forty years of age, and the American noted his perfect seat in the saddle. He rode up to them, bowed respectfully, and stood awaiting any orders that Don Mariano might have to give.

"Have you your gold medal with you, Francisco?" asked the Don after their talk about the location of the waggons was ended.

For answer the Mexican put his hand inside his shirt collar and drew forth a large star of gold, somewhat dulled and worn, but still holding several of the brilliants with which it had once been thickly set.

"Yes, I see. You are taking good care of it," said Don Mariano. Then turning to the Englishman, "It is the gold star that his grandfather took, seventy years ago, on this spot, from Santarito."

MELODY.

The August number of this delightful musical magazine, which is published on the first of the month, contains an excellent variety of compositions by some of our best known musicians. There are songs by Liza Lehmann, Benjamin Godard, Blumenthal, G. H. Clutsam, Miss Davis, Cotsford Dick, Milton Wellings, besides solos for the organ, piano, violin, mandoline, and guitar, by other well-known composers. The number is completed by a polka expressly composed for Melody by R. Farban, and some notes on musical topics by Mr. R. S. Hichens, and Dr. Joseph Bennett.

Such a musical treat, as above indicated, can only be enjoyed in one way, and that is by buying the August number of Melody, price sixpence.

Please remember that no musical magazine is so well printed or contains so many original compositions as Melody, whilst the fact that Melody is printed on paper full sheet music size has made this popular musical magazine at once take the premier position, a position which becomes more and more impregnable as the volumes of Melody appear month by month.

The Chaplain's Story.

For ten years I was chaplain of Her Majesty's prison in Portland.

To a prison chaplain are often revealed the inner workings of the passions that produce crime, and during my term of office many a heart was laid open to my inspection.

Still there were some who were unfathomable; but of all the convicts, many of them the lowest scum of society, I was brought in contact with, there were none whom I understood less than Edward Dominey.

There was nothing of the criminal in his appearance, rather the opposite. About thirty, tall, muscular, and well proportioned, with frank, open countenance, he was the beau ideal of attractive manhood. Nor was physical appearance all. He was well educated, well bred, and of engaging address, and all the faults in his character that I could discern were an overbearing and resentful temper.

He was serving two years for forgery, and forgery so heartless that the judge told him that his sentence would have been more severe if it had not been for his excellent character.

But what puzzled us most was his behaviour in gaol. Notwithstanding his intelligence and refinement, he was always being punished for some glaring offence, and singular to state, his insubordination was periodical.

The Governor, doctor, and myself were greatly pained and greatly puzzled thereat. I often spoke to him about it, and when these fits of misconduct were absent his behaviour could not be more exemplary. He was examined to see if he suffered from mental derangement, but the doctor could find nothing wrong with him.

Every punishment then in vogue was inflicted on him; even applications of the dreaded "cat." At first the Governor was disposed to overlook his faults and sent me to remonstrate with him, but the only result was that his conduct became more outrageous the more leniently he was dealt with, and there was no course open but to apply the lash.

Never shall I forget his first flogging. He seemed to feel the degradation more than the torture, and Heaven knows that was awful enough. Twenty lashes with the dreaded instrument is a prospect that makes the hardest and most callous tremble, and he was neither. He seemed to feel that this punishment put him out of the pale of respectable men—that the scars would be the ineffaceable stamp of his degradation.

To him, who hardly knew the meaning of physical pain, the torture must have been inexpressible. He writhed in agony and groaned aloud at every stroke, and fainted before the full number had been administered. And still he persisted in his misconduct, though his stripes were increased in number and severity.

Here was an enigma, and an enigma that baffled all our attempts at solution. I reasoned, implored, expostulated, prayed with him, but all to no purpose. Although he was nearly heartbroken on such occasions, his answer invariably was: "It cannot be helped; it must be as it is."

* * * * *

Two years passed away from the time he was first flogged, and I almost despaired of ever having any effect on him when an accident occurred in the quarries.

A party of convicts, among whom was Dominey, were removing a large block of stone, when from some unexplainable cause it gave way and Dominey was caught under it. He was rescued as soon as possible, and taken to the prison hospital. The doctor soon came to the opinion that his spine was fatally injured, and that he could only live a few days at most.

As soon as he could speak he expressed a desire to see me, and I went. He took my hand in silence, and after a pause, said: "I am fatally injured, Mr. Selame; I should not like to die without thanking you for your goodness to me, although you thought it all thrown away. Do you know why I am here, sir?"

"Yes, you were injured by the stone falling."

"No, I don't mean that. Do you know why I am in gaol and why I behaved so badly since I came?"

"You were sent here, you know, for forgery."

"Yes, that is why I was sent here by the judge," he rejoined solemnly, "but I am here, sir, because I am a murderer."

I looked pityingly and incredulously at him, for I feared his brain must have been injured, too, in the shock. He saw my look and said earnestly: "It is true, sir, I am here because I am a murderer. If it had not been for that I should not have been here on a charge of forgery. Murder is my offence. But I will tell you my history and then you will see what an overbearing temper has brought me to."

After consulting with the doctor I complied, and he narrated the following strange and fearful facts:

"I was brought up at a small town in the Midlands. My father was a gentleman farmer and intensely proud of me, who was his eldest son, and spoken of on all sides as a sharp boy. He sent me to a preparatory school, thence to a country grammar school, and at the age of eighteen I was placed in the branch bank in our town with the prospect of rising to a decent competence.

"I said it was an overbearing temper that brought me here. The truth is that my temper from infancy had always been ungovernable. I was petted and spoiled at home; I was not allowed to be crossed, and, being a sturdy lad, I generally got my own way wherever I went.

"I fear I was a bully at school, and I was more than once in danger of being expelled. But the masters were proud of me, for, speaking frankly, I did them credit, and no one knew that better than myself.

"Six months after I entered the bank, Edgar Sturmell, who had been my rival at school, and disputed precedence with me in everything was, by some strange fatality, appointed to a post in the same bank. The struggle for the mastery between us became a thousand-fold intensified. We disputed precedence in our work; we were members of the same club, and there was a jealous rivalry between us in billiards; we were both good athletes, and on the cricket ground and river our mutual hate and jealousy had plenty of food to feed on.

"This continued for about six years, and all might have gone on as heretofore, when (fatality again!) love came like a sword between us.

"The wife of Mr. Willis, our manager, died, and his sister came to keep house for him. Sturmell and I were regular visitors at the manager's, and, truth to tell, I believe invited us so often that we might heal our dissensions.

"Soon after her arrival Willis gave a party to introduce her to his friends. Sturmell and I were there, of course. Would to Heaven I had never seen her! Would to Heaven that she had never crossed my path!

"Ethel Willis was a tall, dark girl of twenty. I believe I forgot good manners, and stared in wonderment at her. All the beauties of our town were plain compared to her. Her features were as regular as those of a Greek statue; her form and carriage were those of a queen. Her voice seemed more musical than any voice I had ever heard.

"But her eyes! There was the charm! To describe them would be impossible, but it seemed to me that one glance from them meant that no man could look but to love.

"Time after time since then have I cursed the Power that created her and her eyes. Fate, I have told myself scores of times, formed them to destroy me.

"Everybody there sought her out and owned her sway. She, quite unaffected, not one whit prouder, moved among us with a sunny smile and irresistible look that conquered all.

"I noted with a jealous eye that Sturmell was very attentive to her, and like the vain fool that I was, I cursed him in my heart for his presumption. From that hour he and I were rivals, in love as in everything else.

"It was at this time that an instrument was put in my hands by the Evil One that wrought my everlasting ruin. I went to London for a few days, and whilst there attended a séance of hypnotism. I was intensely interested; I sought an interview with the professor, and to make a long story short, I found that I was possessed of that dread power myself. A knife in the hands of a homicidal maniac would not be so dangerous.

"Nearly a year after Ethel Willis came to her brother's, I asked for an interview with her. I was shown into the drawing-room where I found her alone.

"'Ethel,' I said after a few commonplace words, throwing the burden and passion of my soul into the tone, 'I have sought you to-night to tell you that I love you. I never saw a woman like you before; none has ever touched my heart except you. I would do anything or give up anything for your sake. Tell me, oh, tell me,' I shrieked with wild passion, as I did not see what I sought in her face, 'tell me that you love me.'

"Alas for her answer! With infinite distress and in a voice that almost choked her, she told me that she would give worlds to say otherwise, but she did not love me, and asked to be allowed to be my humble friend.

"Passion reasserted itself, and I laughed bitterly. Then a light broke in upon me, and I asked in a schooled voice: 'Is Edgar Sturmell the favoured one?'

"She trembled like a leaf, and I read her answer in her face. 'Then he shall never have you,' I cried; 'you shall both die first. Look at me,' as the remembrance of my power come like a lightning flash. She looked. I exerted my will to the utmost to control her. But she neither quailed nor moved a muscle. When a woman loves she is proof against any other power. I saw that I had lost, and left the room. I never saw her again.

"From that day for many months I was a madman. I gave full play to every evil passion with which I was tempted, till my heart became a hell.

"About a week afterwards Sturmell, blind fool, said to me genuinely delighted, though with a little superiority in his tone. 'Congratulate me, Dominey, I proposed to Ethel Willis last night, and was made a happy man. Willis gave me his brotherly blessing. To tell you the truth, old fellow, I thought you had your eyes in that quarter, and I was horribly jealous.'

"'Oh, no,' I replied with as off-hand a manner as I could assume, and, putting the greatest possible amount of sting into the words, ended the sentence with a laugh.

"Sturmell looked at me in silence; then turned on his heel and left me without another word.

"Then the resolve grew upon me that Sturmell should never have her. It must have been the devil that put the remembrance of my fatal power into my head again. I laughed wildly. Yes, Sturmell might succumb. I tried my power on him, and found that sometimes I could control him. But to separate them was not enough for me now. I must have revenge. I must wreck their happiness as mine had been wrecked. It was only charitable to believe that I was insane.

"One night Sturmell and I were engaged till late in balancing the books. There was no one in the bank but ourselves. Mr. Willis had gone home to dinner, and would return to relieve me. Sturmell had already been to his meal.

"Some fatalism or some devil caused Sturmell to begin talking of his sweetheart. Oh, why in the name of Heaven did he? He showed me a smoking cap she had embroidered for him with his initials. It was too much for me to bear. I literally thirsted for his blood. I tried to put him under my power. I succeeded. Then a terrible idea flashed across my mind, and I acted on it. It was born in a moment, but that is no palliation, for it was my brooding hate that gave birth to it.

"I suggested to him, while he was under the hypnotic influence, that Mr. Willis did not look with much favour on his engagement. Then I wormed out of him that this was really the fact, and that he had been much irritated in consequence. Then, like the devil I was, I suggested to him that he should that night murder Mr. Willis.

"The next morning broke with the news flying swiftly through the town that Mr. Willis had been foully murdered the previous night in the bank, and Edgar Sturmell had been arrested.

"I cannot describe my feeling for the next month or two. I longed to go and confess, but the same devil that had tempted me to the deed, kept me back, and told me I had done well.

"At the assizes Edgar Sturmell was found guilty.

"He declared that he must have been insane, for he had no recollection of the deed, and his feelings for the murdered man were of the kindliest.

"As the judge's solemn words pronounced his doom, there was a wild shriek in the court. Alas! only another weight in my burden of guilt—Ethel Willis is now the inmate of an asylum, hopelessly insane.

"Edgar Sturmell did not live long enough to feel the hangman's rope. One morning he was found dead in his cell. How he met with his death was never ascertained.

"These are my crimes: I had murdered two and deprived another of reason. Can there be forgiveness for such as I?

"My crimes brought their own punishment. I have known all the pangs of the lost. I dared not confess, nor would confession have undone my crimes; I took a strong course. I committed an act of forgery that I knew would place me here for a number of years.

"I may say that I have always looked upon penal servitude as a living death, compared with which the hangman's rope is a thousand times more preferable.

"But since I came here I found that that was not punishment enough. Hence I became insubordinate that I might taste the 'cat.' You can think what that meant to me.

"But my scarred back, my tortured spirit, my living death have not brought peace. They are nothing to the pangs of conscience. I have suffered—oh! how I have suffered! Can there be mercy for me? Tell me, Mr. Selame, was ever guilt so black as mine? Could an eternity of suffering wash out of remembrance such crimes as mine are?"

* * * * *

Very tenderly and gently did I point him to the Great Consolation, not minimising his guilt, not pretending that his self-inflicted punishment could win pardon for him, but showing him that eternal mercy could even forgive such as he. He lingered for three days with only momentary gleams of consciousness, and his spirit fled without further conversation between us.

The tale he told me seemed so wildly improbable that I was at pain to verify it. I found on visiting the town where he had lived that the facts were quite in accordance with what he told me.

REGINALD BAIRD.

A Little Lunatic.

THE last good-bye had been said, and the comfortable country carriage, drawn by its two glossy bay horses, had disappeared round a knoll.

"They is do'rn," remarked the baby, as if just in possession of a solemn fact.

"Torse they is do'rn, you blessed baby," answered Florence, his fifteen-year-old sister, stooping down and lifting him in her strong arms and kissing him.

The baby, let me remark, was a sturdy boy of four, with bright brown eyes and red cheeks—cheeks so plump that when you had a side view of his face you could only see the tip of his little pug nose.

"Well, if anybody has earned a holiday, they are father and mother," said Cassie.

"Cassie, dear, your sentiment is better than your grammar," laughed Rose, the eldest of the three sisters.

"Never you mind my grammar, Miss Eglantine. I mayn't have much 'book larnin',' but I've got a head on my shoulders, as father frequently remarks—which is a good thing, for I couldn't bear to look at myself in the glass if I hadn't—and, besides, how could I do my hair up so neatly"—Cassie's hair was the joke of the family—"if I hadn't? And now I'm going upstairs to cry, and I'll be down in three minutes to help with the supper."

It was a pleasant scene in the old-fashioned, roomy kitchen an hour later. Supper was laid, and Rose had just stopped to ask the baby whether he would rather have honey or preserves, when a stealthly step was heard upon the porch. A moment later the door was pushed slowly open, and a man walked in.

"Good-morning, ladies. Is your father at home?"

"N—no," faltered Rose, trying to settle to her own satisfaction whether this dirty-looking stranger might be some new neighbour, who had come upon legitimate business, or whether he was her one horror—a tramp.

"Any of your big brothers in?" with rather a jocular manner.

"N—no, sir."

"And I don't see anything in the shape of a bulldog loafin' round," he added.

"Our dord, he is dead," explained the baby solemnly.

"Well, then, ladies, since you are likely to be alone, I think I'll stay and keep you company; and since you press me, I will have some supper and spend the evening here. Don't go to any extra work for me, though; it looks very nice. I'm rather hungry, so you may dish up that ham at once. I've usually a very fair appetite, and I'm sure I will relish it."

He tossed his hat down beside the chair which he drew up to the table.

With the light falling on his dirty, insolent face, Rose knew that her greatest dread was before her. With her knees sinking under her she started towards the stairs, for she felt that she must let the intrepid Cassie know—and find out what she advised.

"Where are you goin', my dear?" asked the tramp suspiciously. "You've not got any big cousin or uncle or anything of that kind upstairs that you are going to call to tea, have you?"

"Oh, no, there is no one upstairs but my poor sister," she managed to gasp. She could not have told why she said "poor sister," unless it was from the sense of calamity which had overtaken them all.

Rose dragged herself up the narrow inclosed stairs, and into Cassie's room.

"Well, Rose, you must be about tired out. You come upstairs as if you were eighty," said Cassie, looking up from the shoe she was fastening. "Why, what ails you? You look as if you had seen a ghost?"

"Oh, Cassie, there is one of them downstairs!" came in a whisper.

"What do you mean, Rose? A ghost downstairs?"

"No—no—a tramp."

"Whew!" and Cassie gave a low whistle. "And I suppose you're scared?"

"Oh, Cassie, I feel as if I were choking! Do hurry down; he may be killing poor little Florence and the baby. What shall we do? The baby has told him we are all alone."

"The baby ought to be soundly spanked for that."

"What can we do? Try to think."

Cassie sat swinging the button-hook in her hand, and thinking very hard and fast.

"Does he know I am here?"

"Yes; I've told him."

"Then it would be no use for me to pretend to be Ned," thinking aloud.

"I'm afraid not."

Another silence dedicated to thought.

"Rose?"

"Yes."

"I'm going to be crazy. I'm going to chase him off the farm."

"Oh, Cassie, you can't! He is a great, big, impudent wretch. What folly to talk about chasing him off the farm!"

"It's our only chance."

"Don't count on me. I can't help you. My teeth are chattering with terror, and my legs are doubling up under me this very minute. I couldn't help chase a fly."

"You can scream, I suppose?"

"Oh, yes, I can do that."

"Well, you can do the screaming, and I'll do the chasing. Rush downstairs and scream, and bang the door, and just shriek: 'She's out—she's out—she's coming downstairs!' And you'll see what a perfectly beautiful lunatic I will be. It's a good thing I have this old dress on, and only one shoe. Now make a rush and scream."

Rose's overstained nerves were her best allies, and as she flew down the stairs it was the easiest thing in the world for her to give one piercing shriek after another. They resounded from the narrow stairway through the kitchen, and for the moment seemed to paralyse its inmates. As she burst in upon them, Florence was transfixed midway of the table and the fireplace, with the plate of ham in her hands; the baby had climbed upon a chair, and the tramp had risen with a bewildered air from the table. As her skirts cleared the door she turned and slammed it, and flung herself against it, shrieking: "She's out—she's out of her room!"

To the mystified Florence there came but one solution to her behaviour—fright had overthrown her sister's reason, and with a wail she rushed towards her, crying: "She's crazy! Oh, she's crazy!"

"Who's crazy?" yelled the tramp.

The baby, now wildly terrified, set up a loud weeping, while from the stairway came a succession of blows and angry demands that the door be opened, a moment later it was forced ajar, and a head crowned with a mass of tossed hair was thrust out, and quickly followed by a hand in which was clutched a gun.

"She's got the gun! Oh, Florence, run to the baby!" cried Rose.

"Who's that?" demanded the apparition, making a rush towards the tramp.

"Here, keep off! Leave me alone!" backing away and warding off an expected blow.

She stood before him, tall, strong and agile.

"I won't leave you alone. What do you mean by locking me in that room? I'm no more crazy than you are. What's this?" as she stumbled over the hat which the tramp had laid aside, and into which he had deposited the silver spoons from the table. "Oh, I see; you are all in league to rob me of my gold and precious stones!" and catching up the hat on the muzzle of the gun, she gave it a whirl which sent the spoons glittering in every direction; then advancing upon him she thrust hat and gun into the face of the horrified man. With a volley of oaths he sprang backwards, upsetting his chair and falling over it.

"Oh, don't kill him, Cassie! don't kill him!"

"We'll have a merry time," gaily dancing about him, and prodding him sharply with the gun as he tried to scramble to his feet.

"Keep off with that gun, can't you?" he yelled. "Can't you hold her, you screaming idiots?" and half crawling, half pushing, he gained the kitchen door, which had stood partly open since he had entered.

"Where are you going, my pretty maid, don't you try to get away?" shouted Cassie, as she sprung lightly after him. The tramp stayed not to answer her question, nor to obey her command, but clearing the door, fled wildly away through the dusk.

"Here's your hat: I'll fire it after you," she called, and a sharp report rang out on the quiet evening air, then all was still.

The three girls stood for a moment in the door, watching the dim outline flying across the meadow in the direction of the highway.

"He'll think twice before inviting himself to supper another time," quietly remarked Cassie, with a satisfied smile.

"Oh, Cassie, darling, you have saved our lives," cried Florence, flinging her arms round her sister.

"I don't know about that; but I've saved the spoons, anyway."

"There, there, baby," going to the still afflicted boy; "don't cry any more. Sister Cassie was just making a dirty old tramp hop; she didn't really shoot him, she was playing."

"Oh, Cassie, you splendid, brave girl. How did you ever happen to think to go crazy?" asked Rose, as she looked over her shoulder from the door she was barricading.

"Well, I knew something had to be done, and that just popped into my mind. I was doing 'Ophelia' the other day up in my room, so I was in practice, and didn't I make a sweetly pensive maniac? Now, I hope you girls will never again make disrespectful comments upon any little private theatricals of mine. If I had never cultivated my dramatic talents, what would have become of you, I'd like to know?" EDITH SUMMERS.

MAN O' WAR STICK.

Briefly, the situation was this: Lord Douglas had in a moment of pressing need, had tied himself down for a suitable trinket for a wedding present.

He was a hard working, capable man, if not particularly brilliant, and he had every right to expect that she would like to shriek. Here was an opportunity by which she might work the combination of Lord Deane."

For they had noticed that his lordship made himself dropped right at her feet. She had only to stretch this plot that she had devised. It was a chance, however, game. She had thought all the morning of some means to send the parcel which I received by mistake in spite of the fact that with every package he inclosed flowers and jewels. Certain it was that she was now pretty Mrs. Montague, and here was the solution.

And it was known that she was for ever in dearth of Douglas' compliments.' I still keep the necklace, and something less acceptable (and less substantial) than life to a very ineligible personage.

Now Diggles, as all the world knew, was brother-in-law to his old college friend, Deane; he had, in fact, intimated that he was. With his wife, however, it was different. Two roads lie before me, and I do not know which to take. Craven Road, Park Lane,' and below: 'With Lord Douglas and his jealous wife, and Lord Douglas and Rubett. As an esteemed customer she was privileged to leave her down in the country, through fear that she was brother-in-law to Mrs. Montague.

That afternoon Mrs. Deane dropped in at the well wife as they were taking their first sip of coffee one of unique form.

Perhaps, for this reason, she cultivated Lord Douglas, as every year advanced. Finally, he was compelled to reach his wife's ears that anything beyond the strictest known jewellers of Bond Street, Messrs Brightstone and declined to give the appointment of Minister of Pepotoi this post.

The blow had fallen on Deane and his pretty little letters. Among others was one which made him turn out her hand and take it, and she would win her uneaten breakfast. She read the letter through, and kept very well supplied with them.

He himself bore his years well, and looked, especially to Mrs. Montague; but whether this had anything by the five-o'clock post without fail. Would his lordship of Pepotoi, had long lived in hopes of obtaining the offering.

It should be mentioned, moreover, that Lord Douglas, line of acquaintanceship passed between Mrs. Montague and, with a mumbled apology, he gathered his other in his long frock coat, every inch the Cabinet Minister was in town.

His wife looked wistfully after him, and then at his post.

And Mrs. Deane chuckled to herself when the next man enter.

"Then you may leave it," said Lord Douglas. Although engrossed in the tray of knick-knacks which the the firm continued, holding up for inspection a necklace in his formal letter, that he had selected Diggles for the one, but a different one. and one of superior quality. On I ordered a pearl necklace, and this morning I receiv d two immense bronzes had been placed for the time. She seemed to grow stouter and shorter and redder counter. They were very sorry, but it had not arrived; this morning from Messrs. Brightstone and Rubett with the purchase.

"Lord Douglas has just ordered a similar one to this," in a loud voice, and strode angrily from the shop.

Messrs. Brightstone and Rubett bowed low to the glass doors swing open, and a tall, commanding-looking assistant was displaying, she noticed, herself unseen, the morning at breakfast. His face fell as he read the letter, post came in.

Could they send it off for his lordship? It would go it would come in a couple of hours.

Lord Douglas read this letter through three times; a card inside was written: 'To Mrs. Montague, 203, and himself.

"Is that pearl necklace ready yet?" he demanded.

Mr. Deane, the disappointed aspirant to the Ministership be good enough to give the address?

"203, Craven Road, Park Lane," replied his lordship. papers together and hastily left the room.

It meant a good deal more to him than people might have one at a bargain.

To make the situation clear, it should be added also "I have decided, after all, to give the position to direct to you, and hear what you said. Yesterday of ousting Diggles, and not to be missed.

Mrs. Deane's heart stopped beating. She felt as though her mouth took a determined expression.

"Have you any pearl necklaces?" she asked.

Messrs Brightstone and Rubett had a few in stock, to do with the matter it was not known. People said it had.

It happened that her search led her to a counter where very pleasant to that lively and vivacious widow.

Mrs Deane concluded the bargain, and drove away but, unfortunately, all of an inferior quality. Madame grew still paler.

She wondered, as she went home, if it was very wicked, it should have been his. It was clear to see that Diggles supposed.

At his office next morning the first thing Lord Douglas should be mistaken for his housekeeper, whenever he wander about the shop at will until she should chance on that letter to Diggles yet?"

No, my lord," the man replied; "I was about to address the envelope."

It was written in a feminine hand, and ran as follows:

"Dear Lord Douglas,—I am in terrible perplexity: I ought, I feel, to let your dear wife know everything I did was to write to Diggles, informing him of his appointment as Minister of Pepotoi. Then he looked at his very pale when he had read it. He studied it again, and that his lordship lived in mortal dread lest it should have learnt. But on second thoughts I determined await your reply as to what I shall do with it.—Yours had obtained it merely on account of the fact that he then he bit his lip hard, and his voice was very shaky, as, turning to his secretary, he said: "Have you posted sincerely, Mary Deane.

"P.S.S.—I still feel that I ought to write to your wife.—M. D."

"P.S.—Your letter was such a disappointment. Will you not reconsider your decision?—M. D.

PAUPER BLUE-BLOOD

SUMMARY.

GEORGINA PLUFF is a governess in the employ of the Ravenscrofts. Her charge is Eva, daughter of Sir Reginald and Lady Ravenscroft. Sefton, the only son, is engaged to Lady Norah Cannington, whose father, hearing on good authority of Sir Reginald's impending ruin, compels his daughter to write a letter to Sefton, saying that the engagement must be broken off. Before the financial crash arrives, Sir Reginald commits suicide in his own grounds, and Sefton's cup of bitterness is filled by the arrival of Lady Norah's letter. Georgina Pluff is aware of the late Sir Reginald's past, and threatens to expose his misdeeds unless she is married to Sefton. After the wedding Georgina visits her wealthy cousin, John Pluff, a retired grocer, and impresses him with her social position. Lady Norah receives a visit from a friend of Sefton, Douglas Shirling, who gives expression to his opinion concerning her treatment of Sefton. Georgina goes to stop with Pluff at Queen's Gate House. Lady Norah becomes engaged to the Duke of Malvern, but at the cost of her own happiness. Sefton's mother and sister go to stop at Ermyn Way, and he joins them.

CHAPTER X.

TOMMY'S JOKE.

THE Hon. Miss Shirling was wrapped in beautiful abstraction, her arms folded, her body sunk into the recesses of an enormous chair, half of which was occupied by a sleek red setter. At a table by the open window Sir Sefton sighed over a letter, which evidently caused him some annoyance, for he eventually tore up the sheet and an envelope addressed to Lady Ravenscroft at Queen's Gate House. He crossed to a sofa on which lay a pile of newspapers, selected one, and stood reading it at the back of Miss Shirling's chair.

This was her own most private sanctum, into which she had invited him to wipe off his arrears of correspondence, a strangely unfeminine room. The walls were decorated chiefly with a fine collection of horns, sporting pictures, and photographs of horses and dogs. Her literature ranged from the QUEEN to the PINK 'UN. Every imaginable paper lay strewn about, no books, save a volume of "Modern Dogs," and a racing calender.

Wrapped in beautiful abstraction.

She and Sefton had been chums since childhood. Her acquaintances knew her as Sarah Shirling, but to her intimates she was "Tommy," always Tommy, nothing more. That was the name she loved the best, the name that seemed part of herself. Petite, with the trimmest figure and the brightest eyes, she was one of the prettiest and smartest little women in the county. Some people called her empty-headed and wild, on account of her daring horsemanship and passion for the stables, but none could deny she was a Shirling to her finger-tips, her natural refinement was her salvation.

She leant her head as far back as possible, and tried to look at Sefton over her eyelids.

"It gives me an uncomfortable sensation, the feeling that you are standing there, like a ghost behind me. Won't you come and sit down?"

He did not answer her remark, but stiffened out his paper, and gave vent to a low laugh.

"What's the joke?" asked Tommy, passing her white hand over the setter's waving coat.

"Listen. Did you ever hear such an advertisement? What are we coming to? 'A lady of position would be received sub rôsa as paying guest in a titled family. County society; old family mansion; carriages kept; terms £500 a year.'"

"Who ever can it be?" asked Tommy curiously, rising to the disgust of the dog whose nose and front paws used her knees as a pillow. She took the paper from Sefton, and scanned the paragraph.

"I should like to know! Couldn't we find out? It would be such fun!"

Her suggestion was made purely for the sake of a joke, and from no prying meanness. She was utterly thoughtless, and in harmless merriment resolved to unearth the "titled family" for her own amusement.

"I know," she cried—"I'll write a letter, and ask for particulars."

"Wouldn't that be rather a shabby trick to play?"

"Not if we keep it quite to ourselves, don't tell a soul. I have all my letters forwarded from the club, and will use that address."

"But probably these people, whoever they are, will know all about you, and guess it is humbug."

Tommy shook her head wisely.

"I am not going to give my name, and there is just the chance they may not trouble to look me up. See," crossing to her writing table, "I shall word my epistle something like this."

She tore out the paragraph and pinned it on the top of her letter.

"Let me see," biting the tip of her penholder. "Oh, yes, I have it. 'A lady of position would be glad to have particulars of the above advertisement, name of family, and in what county the "mansion" is situated, address:

"'The President of the Sportswoman's Club,
"'106, Piccadilly.'"

"You ought not to do it, really," Sefton protested, hoping she wouldn't take his advice.

But feminine curiosity prevailed, and Tommy, laughing at his scruples, stuck down the envelope, addressing it in her dashing masculine hand.

The letter was posted, and the subject forgotten for the time.

His visit to Ermyn Way was making a fresh man of Sefton. No one had failed to notice on his arrival his altered looks, and unmistakable depression. They one and all determined to rouse and cheer him, and thought it a thousand pities that since his marriage he cooped himself up at Ravenscroft Park, and dropped most of his old friends.

"You see, mother," he explained, when the Dowager Lady Ravenscroft took him to task about this. "I absolutely have not the money to go into society, or Heaven knows I would not stay a day at home. It seems almost foolish clinging on to the old place, but I believe you would break your heart if it were sold, even though you never go there now."

"You are right, Sefton. It is a horrible idea to think that after centuries it should pass out of our family."

Biting the tip of her penholder.

Her son bowed his head without a protest. It appeared quite natural and right that he, as head of the old house, should martyr himself for the sake of the estate.

These days at Ermyn Way, with his mother and sister and a host of affectionate old friends, were very dear to him, though destined to be all too short.

Miss Shirling was always up early and had generally finished her breakfast before the rest of the household were down. Since Sefton's advent she had a companion at her lonely meal, for to sleep late on summer mornings was impossible to him.

She was pouring out his coffee and running her eyes over a pile of correspondence when a letter, re-addressed from the Sportswoman's Club and marked "Personal," met her glance. She held it up with a merry smile, addressing Sefton across the table.

He could not see the writing, only a large purple seal.

"Here it is at last," she cried. "The letter from the titled family."

But even as she spoke jestingly, a sudden qualm of conscience crept over her soul. Perhaps it was mean after all! What did it matter to her who these people were, or how they added an extra £500 per annum to their income? Now the answer was actually in her hand—the flavour of the joke had fled. It was tame, unkind, unnecessary.

She almost longed to tear it up unopened, but was loth to reveal her penitence to Sefton.

"Read it out," he said expectantly, an amused twinkle in his eyes.

"Wait a moment. Let us toss who shall open it—you or I!"

"Very well," replied Sefton, drawing a coin from his pocket.

"Heads, you; tails, me," said Miss Shirling. "Which is it?" as the shilling fell and rolled along the cloth.

"Heads!"

"Catch!"

With a sigh of relief she threw the letter at him. It fell in a dish of scrambled eggs.

He picked it out (the mauve seal still uppermost) and cut it open with a knife.

A strange look passed over his face as he read, his brow grew dark, the lines round his mouth deepened, the strong likeness to his father had never been more distinct.

Miss Shirling could not fail to notice the change. What could the letter say to upset him so? His hand shook, his lips were set, and the silence in the room became oppressive.

As they drove through the green country.

"Well?" she asked softly, raising her eyebrows and leaning her elbows on the table.

Sefton rose and came across to her, the letter crushed in his clenched fist. He spoke with an effort, the flash of anger in his eyes.

But they grew pleading and wistful as they met hers.

"I want to ask you a favour, Tommy. Will you let me destroy this answer without your seeing it?"

"Why?"

"Because it comes from someone I know intimately—a woman. We both know her—myself more especially. It is not fair to her or the husband. Their secrets can be nothing to you. They are well-known people, and we had no right to make fun of their poverty for the sake of our own diversion. May I?" holding the sheet ready for destruction.

Who could resist his earnest tone? Certainly not Sarah Shirling. She nodded her head and turned again to the coffee pot.

"By all means," she murmured. "I was feeling desperately ashamed of myself when we tossed."

Sir Sefton tore the letter to shreds, and walked gloomily back to his seat, but he ate no breakfast, and hardly spoke.

Tommy's sympathetic eyes watched him furtively, seeing he was thoroughly perturbed, and tactfully refrained from pressing food upon him.

He read his own letters silently, perhaps something in them troubled him.

"Are you driving into the town this morning?" he asked.

"Yes. The cart is waiting for me now."

"May I come with you? I want to send a telegram."

"Certainly."

"And Tommy, I must go back to-day."

"Go back—go home—to Ravenscroft Park?"

"Yes; I have been away long enough. Things are going wrong in my absence—very wrong."

"I am so sorry. Any of the horses ill?" with anxious inquiry.

"Oh! no. But——"

She waited for the solution of that "but," only it never came. Sefton thought better of it, and walked out of the room, leaving his sentence unfinished.

"I shall be ready in a minute," she cried, running for her hat.

Sefton snatched a cap in the hall, and went out to cool his boiling blood.

"How dare she!" he muttered fiercely between his clenched teeth, the overwhelming pride of his nature stinging and cutting him through and through. "Curse her!" the words were wrung forth involuntarily, the outcome of a sudden and awful hate for Georgina. At first he had tried to make the best of his wife, but gradually the strain of her presence told on his nerves, and this last action, the advertisement, inserted sub rôsa without his knowledge, awoke an unholy loathing in his soul.

"A paying guest at Ravenscroft Park! Bah! I would sooner break stones on the road. We may have sunk low, but not far enough down for that, not to harbour boarders under the dear old roof. It's enough to make my father turn in his grave."

Sefton thrust his hands in his pockets, and paced the gravel walk, indulging resentful thoughts, and rehearsing the scene he should have with Georgina, the forcible language wherewith to bring her to her senses. She did not realise her position, when she proposed to make a lodging house of her husband's home, and as to the county society, who would look at Georgina and her paying guest?

It only showed him what a fool the woman was—not to be trusted a yard out of his sight. Perhaps even now she was haggling over terms with possible customers.

So his thoughts ran on till Tommy's voice broke this unpleasant reverie with: "Are you ready?"

He started as if aroused from sleep, and took his place beside her in the dogcart.

"I've ordered you an early lunch. I suppose you will catch the two o'clock train?"

"Yes. Thanks for thinking of it."

The beauty of the morning was lost on Sefton as they drove through the green country. The telegram he wrote was addressed to Georgina, at Clapham, tersely worded, but to the point: "Return to-day. Must see you."

When Lady Ravenscroft opened it she was starting for a drive to Hyde Park with John Pluff in his landau.

"I call that real cheek!" exclaimed her cousin as she handed the message to him. "'E gives you no reason, just sends an order as if you was his servant instead of his missus—with no regard to your engagements or my convenience. Don't he know we are entertaining, and that you're my hostess, at least to the week end?"

"It's just a draw to get me back," said Georgina. "If it was anything of importance he might have spent sixpence extra in telling me."

"Oh! he's getting home sick at Lord Gattons, and wants his little wifey, is that it?" asked Mr. Pluff, calming down. "Let him come and fetch you, Georgina, that's the way to treat a young husband. Make him run after you. It will do Sir Sefton a lot of good."

Lady Ravenscroft hesitated.

"I think if you don't mind, cousin John, I will go to-morrow; but to-day it is impossible, I have a business appointment with a lady—she is coming to see me while you are out at the Owens, and of course to-night I must go to Mrs. Humphery's musical evening. She would be quite broken-hearted if I failed her. I like her immensely, she is such a charming, affectionate little woman, and asked me to write to her when I go home."

"Please yourself, Georgy, but you know as far as I'm concerned the longer you stay the better. Perhaps you'll pop up again soon, and bring the young man with you, eh?"

"Perhaps."

Georgina spoke wistfully.

"I will write out a wire to Sefton 'Returning to-morrow, have engagement in town to-night.'"

"Add an 's,'" said John Pluff, "make it engagements, and we'll look in at the Gaiety first, and dine at a restaurant for a change."

"How I love life!" murmured Georgina, as they rolled away in the direction of Hyde Park Corner.

CHAPTER XI

The General's Widow.

That same afternoon Georgina sat in state in the large drawing-room, awaiting the advent of Mrs. Rathbone, who had answered her advertisement, and requested an interview. She adorned herself in costly array, smothered the tables, piano, mantelpiece, and chiffonier, with the loveliest flowers to be bought at Gérards, and practised her greeting and elevated hand-shake before the mirror.

Presently the sound of wheels reached her ear on the gravel without; the rustle of a skirt in the hall, and "Mrs. Rathbone" was announced in a sonorous voice by the footman.

A lady, feigning to be young, but past the bloom of girlhood, advanced with a simper. Her eyes were certainly strikingly magnetic, her face well moulded, but her whole appearance marred by a very palpable red wig, dressed high on the head. The coils and twists of brilliant hair were marvellous beyond description, while a tiny bonnet of lace and blossoms rested on the summit of a much curled fringe. Her figure was slimmer than nature intended, much compressed by whalebone, and the excessive tightness of a close fitting bodice.

"Lady Ravenscroft, I believe."

"Lady Ravenscroft, I believe," she said.

Georgina bowed and motioned her to a chair with the sweetest smile.

"It was just a chance my being in London. I return to Ravenscroft Park to-morrow. It is so much pleasanter to have a personal interview."

"Yes, indeed. Your advertisement was just the very thing that I was looking for—a comfortable home in a good family. I have not many friends in England, having lived abroad for a great many years. I must tell you, Lady Ravenscroft, that I am the widow of a General, and before my marriage was one of the Bottlemeads of Basingstoke."

She muttered these words proudly, and Georgina dared not expose her ignorance by asking who the Bottlemeads were.

Mrs. Rathbone's face grew keener.

"Your mention of 'county society,'" continued Mrs. Rathbone, "was especially attractive to me. I suppose you have a very large acquaintance?"

Georgina shifted her eyes uneasily.

"I fancy you will have no cause to complain," she murmured, her heart sinking, "though, of course, it is not gay like London. Since I came here my engagements have been numberless. I am perfectly worn out. No one could wish for a more ideal place than Ravenscroft Park—so stately, so imposing! My husband, as I dare say you know, is one of the oldest baronets. Lord Gatton's son stays a great deal with us."

Then the conversation drifted to the bathrooms and domestic arrangements.

Mrs. Rathbone desired to bring her maid, for which she would pay extra, informing Georgina that it was all her own money, left her by the Bottlemeads. The dear General had not a penny, but was very well connected, and a most charming man in society.

"How soon may I come?" asked Mrs. Rathbone. "I am living now at a South Kensington hotel, where I am not at all comfortable."

"I will consult my husband and let you know the day after to-morrow. The fact is, I have had several answers to my advertisement, and among them a lady who writes from the Sportswoman's Club in Piccadilly. My husband is very fond of sport, and there is good hunting in easy reach of Ravenscroft Park."

Mrs. Rathbone's face grew keener, and her voice more persuasive on scenting a rival.

"But I am sure, Lady Ravenscroft, I should give you far less trouble. These sporting women rise so early in the winter and want endless attention."

Lady Ravenscroft murmured: "Do you think so?" and rang for tea.

As the two ladies continued their conversation and Mrs. Rathbone had all but extracted a promise that she might settle in early the following month, John Pluff returned earlier than Georgina expected. The sight of him annoyed her beyond measure. She particularly did not wish "the lady of position" to meet this vulgarian under whose roof she was staying.

"Introduce me, Georgy, dear," he said, bowing low to the smartly-attired widow. "Delighted to make your acquaintance, Mrs. Rathbone," as Lady Ravenscroft muttered the name, inwardly fuming at his untimely appearance. "I've been stewing myself at a big At Home, left early, and here I am!" plumping his heavy figure on to a chair beside her and ogling with his ugly eyes.

The widow blushed and appeared delighted.

"What a charming house," she cooed. "I admired your garden, too, so much, as I drove in. Perhaps you would show me the grounds after tea? I am fond of shrubs and things. I see you have a great quantity."

Mr. Pluff beamed.

"It ought to be a decent garden, considering what I pay my head gardener."

"Oh! John," broke in Lady Ravenscroft for once daring to omit the "cousin." "I am sure his wages cannot possibly interest Mrs. Rathbone."

"Really you are quite mistaken, I want to hear all about it," as John Pluff swallowing down a second cup of tea, rose to escort her round the grounds. "I left my little sunshade in the hall, but please don't trouble to fetch it," as Mr. Pluff rushed away, and returned with a flimsy chiffon parasol, of a pink rose-tint that clashed with the red of her wig.

"I will come too," said Georgina, a determined ring in her voice.

"No, no, my dear, I positively won't let you," exclaimed Mr. Pluff. "You are looking just fagged out by this sweltering weather, and a rest will set you up for your dissipations to-night. I don't want to drag you about 'alf fainting. Bide a bit, and don't you make a fool of yourself. 'Ealth is 'ealth and we can't afford to despise it, can we, Mrs. Bathboney? I beg your pardon, but I get so mixed over names," as a horrified protest broke from the widow. But she smiled and forgave him, as she sailed away, murmuring that she was a Bottlemead once before the General—etc., etc. Georgina watched their departing figures with a sinking heart.

Was John Pluff never to be free from designing females? Had she herself placed a fresh danger in his path? Mrs. Rathbone could not be a nice person, or she would have been disgusted at the vulgarity of the ex-grocer. Georgina almost hesitated at taking her into her home, but the £500 a year was very tempting. Lady Ravenscroft sat watching the clock, becoming momentarily more annoyed. How long they were? What could they find to talk about all this time? Eventually she peeped through the open window.

She moved back unperceived.

They were coming towards the verandah. She could hear the widow's affected voice, and her cousin's lusty laugh.

As they approached she moved back unperceived, but they had no intention of returning to Georgina, and passed on heedless of her frowns.

"I never saw such a bold-faced creature!" exclaimed Lady Ravenscroft, back at the window again. "If she has not lured that foolish old man away to the seat under the trees."

When about half-an-hour later Mrs. Rathbone returned to say good-bye, Georgina's manner had stiffened.

"I will write," she said simply, in reply to the widow's gushing intreaties that she would not keep her in suspense.

"I am so looking forward to sharing your beautiful home, Lady Ravenscroft. I see we shall get on."

When John Pluff returned from a final farewell with Mrs. Rathbone at the hall door, he asked his cousin bluntly "if she'd got the hump?"

"My dear John, what an expression! I am sure I could never be annoyed with you," laying a tender accent on the word, "but how you could have dangled round and danced attention on that Judy with a wig is past all comprehension."

"Wig!" cried Mr. Pluff, bridling up. "It was certainly nothing of the sort. I do not know if you were jealous, but the texture, the colour, and the quality, were quite uncommon. I have never seen anything so tasty and more to my liking."

These words were as thunderbolts to Georgina.

"Nevertheless, it was a wig," she muttered resolutely. "I would stake my last farthing on it."

"A most fascinating woman," replied her cousin, "and one I should like to know more of."

Oh! how bitterly Georgina repented asking her, inwardly reproaching and then justifying herself.

"How could I tell the creature would have that disgusting red hair and those brazen manners?" she thought as she went sadly to dress for dinner, thinking of the £500 a year she must now resign for the sake of her cousin's absurd fancy. "He shall not meet her at my house—the old idiot. I knew she was a serpent the first moment she returned his preliminary stare. My life won't be worth living till John has made a will in my favour, and is safely in his tomb."

Then she rang for one of John's servants to do her hair, and enjoyed herself for the rest of the evening at his expense.

Every now and again the thought of the woman in the red wig came to Georgina's mind, but she consoled herself by saying:

"I'll take the lady from the Sportswoman's Club instead. She will have got my letter by now, and I shall probably hear from her to-morrow. I don't suppose John will ever see Mrs. Rathbone again."

* * * * *

Sir Sefton Ravenscroft left Ermyn Way amidst general lamentations, Miss Shirling being the only one who did not drive him nearly distracted with pressing invitations to stop.

His mother and Eva argued that there could be no reason for his return yet, and Douglas counter-ordered the carriage, while Lady Gatton put off the lunch.

Now all this, though doubtless flattering, was highly trying to Sefton's temper.

Lord Gatton eventually came to the rescue, declaring he would not see a fellow so bullied, and accused his family of illegally detaining their guest.

Eventually Sefton found himself steaming back to his homestead made so distasteful by the presence of Georgina, with war in his heart against the paying guest.

Man-like, he had never thought to inform the servants of his advent, thus he arrived to find the house in a general state of discomfort, and no dinner prepared. The worst of it was he could blame no one but himself.

Georgina's telegram annoyed him. He could not bear to think of his wife, Lady Ravenscroft, bandying the name about in John Pluff's circle. His pride suffered again, the pride that was destined to endure so much, and be driven finally beyond endurance.

The following morning another telegram came from Georgina stating the train she wished to be met by.

Sefton handed it to the servants, and went out riding.

"You've done me no end of a service coming here, and giving me the benefit of your title and 'igh bearing," said John Pluff, as he signed a farewell cheque for Lady Ravenscroft, before bidding her good-bye.

He saw her to the station, in order to buy a first-class ticket for her return.

"Here's a basket of apricots, some books, and papers," he said, placing his purchases in the railway carriage "Ta-ta, my love, and keep your pecker up. You are wonderfully strong and hearty, or I would not let you travel alone."

As she waved him a last adieu, her thoughts turned to the pecuniary profit of the visit.

"The penalty of his smacking kiss on the platform was worth a small fortune," she told herself. Embraces in public were always embarrassing, but from John Pluff they were positively outrageous. Still, after all, Georgina had no cause to complain.

Though she would not own it even to herself, she had secretly, in a half-ashamed, apologetic manner, enjoyed her stay at Clapham immensely.

The admiration she excited among her cousin's friends, and the respect with which they treated her, proved soothing in the extreme to Georgina's conceited nature. She recalled their honeyed, and frequently ungrammatical phrases, with a pleasurable tingling of her unblue blood.

She would repeat them for Sefton's benefit when he was in a good temper, and she could induce him to listen. There was also the scheme of the paying guest to unfold, and if one—why not many? The idea developed as the train sped onwards. She saw the disused rooms at Ravenscroft Park occupied with men for the shooting, and dreams of a fabulous income from these profitable people passed through her vision.

It was not till she stood alone on the country station looking for Sefton, who, however, was not forthcoming, that a nervous tremor disturbed Georgina's calm.

What if her husband's wretched pride frustrated all her plans?

Well then she would laugh at him, point out the folly of it, and gain her end victoriously.

No sign of Sefton as she drove up the long avenue, nor was he at home to greet her.

An hour later he came into her room, with a look on his face that boded ill for Georgina, already piqued and nettled by his neglect.

There were fresh streaks of grey in the young baronet's hair. Never before had she traced so vividly the resemblance he bore to Sir Reginald. Yet how different to the guilty but warm-hearted lover of departed days. The dark light in Sefton's eyes was as significant of hate as his father's had been of devotion. The contrast appalled the erect, defiant woman who advanced to meet her husband.

She opened her lips to speak, but his chilling expression froze her sentence.

He closed the door behind him sharply.

"I want a word with you, Georgina!"

PETRUS THE INTERPRETER.

Colonel Greet was one of those men who have been everywhere, seen everything and know everything. Not that he was conceited; on the contrary, he was the most unaffected man I have met. His father was English, his mother French. Brought up in France and England, he joined the English navy when a boy, and after having served five years or so he deserted and joined the French Army, retiring some years later with the rank of Captain.

Then he went roaming about all over the world, filling various positions—manager of a company in New York, explorer, engineer in charge, and much else besides until 1870, when he returned to France and took up arms against the Germans. He continued in the service of the French Goverment for years, and finally retired and settled down in Paris in 1890.

I made his acquaintance at a club in Paris. It was his delight to relate stories of his adventures to two or three of his club friends who were English. He spoke our language perfectly, with just a trace of the French accent and a dash of American humour which pleased them considerably. I only heard him narrate one incident and that he shall give in his own words as nearly as possible.

* * * * *

In 1885 I was in charge of a small station at Long-Sai. My duties were not particularly agreeable, for they consisted in dealing out summary justice to Annamite pirates and robbers. These malefactors were brought to my headquarters—a few huts—on the shore, and I had to see that the sentence of death was carried out. We had a small vessel anchored close to the shore, and some of the sailors were told off to act as hangmen.

It was quite a common sight to see five or six strong fellows swinging on the gallows; and although in such places and circumstances very little is thought of the life of a black, yet I soon got tired of it and felt that I should like to hear what these poor wretches had to say for themselves. Perhaps some were not so bad—even innocent—and I might get them off. But not one of them could speak a word of any language but their own, and I could find nobody to act as interpreter.

"I must have an interpreter!" I exclaimed one morning.

The boatswain of the vessel mentioned, who was acting as hangman-in-chief, and liked the job, suggested that I should apply to the French mission in the interior.

"Right you are, Jack; I'll try it!" I said.

He was English. I like your English sailors, they can be so confoundedly cool and independent.

The application was made and the priests promised to send a man along.

The next morning came a batch of seven malefactors for execution; objects of pity they were in appearance, and I longed for the arrival of my interpreter, so that I might have a chance of ascertaining whether they were really as bad as their record seemed to show. And just at that moment up came a long thin shadow of an Annamite, and, with a polite bow, handed me a letter.

This was the interpreter. The letter was full of his praises: he was a thoroughly honest young man; one of their most promising converts; would certainly rise in the world and so on. He would be useful to me as an interpreter, and they had christened him Petrus.

"I've got a treasure here!" thought I. And I decided to make use of him at once.

"Pierre," I said, addressing him in French, "ask that fellow when he committed his last murder."

The interpreter looked at me vacantly for a second or two and then shook his head.

"Ego sum Petrus" (I am Peter), he replied in excellent Latin.

It was my turn to stare at Petrus, who began to reel off some more of what sounded like the language of Cicero. Then the truth dawned upon me; the idiots at the mission had actually taught this fellow Latin! He couldn't utter a word of French!

I muttered some tolerably good strong French under my breath and proceeded to make the best of a bad job. I brushed up my best school Latin, and by means of that and a few gestures, I got along pretty well.

It is a relief to know something about the crimes of a man you are about to help into another world; and it is annoying to hear a man swearing at you and not be able to appreciate his remarks in the slightest degree. Petrus was a conscientious interpreter; he never tired in his endeavours to make me understand, and such swear words as were too strong for such a flexible language as Latin he did his best to explain. You can't translate swear words to advantage; the original and the translation bear the same relation to each other as a landscape and a bad photograph of it.

I signalled for the boatswain and his men to come on shore and do their work. The escort had orders to return as soon as they had handed over their prisoners. I told Petrus to make himself comfortable in one of the huts till I returned, and I went off into the interior to inquire into another little matter—my presence was not required, for I knew that Jack could do his work.

It was about three hours later when I returned. I saw the row of robbers hanging, and Jack smoking his pipe, seated outside one of the huts. For form's sake, I strolled up and counted the bodies. One, two, three, four, five, six, seven, eight.

"Why, there are eight, Jack!" I exclaimed.

Jack took his pipe out of his mouth and pointed to each one as he counted.

"K'rect, cap'n! That the proper number!"

"But it isn't the proper number at all!" I shouted. At least, that was the meaning of what I shouted, but I put it a little more forcibly. "Why! Yes! You've hanged the interpreter, Petrus!"

"Petrus," repeated Jack stolidly. "There was one of 'em who knew a little English and kept saying: 'He go some Petrus.' But I soon gave him Petrus!"

It was useless to argue the point; all the talking in the world wouldn't bring him back to life. I was really sorry for the poor fellow, and I didn't care about the prospect of facing anyone from the mission. I was therefore glad for more than one reason when, on the following morning, I received orders to start for another post. I have often wondered whether the mission-folk ever learnt how high in the world poor Petrus actually did rise!

George Day.

THE TWO KINDS OF LUCK.

THE other day a lady I know was walking along Regent Street on a shopping excursion. Suddenly her eye caught the gleam of some bright thing on the pavement. She stooped and picked it up. It was a beautiful and valuable diamond pin. It had no doubt dropped out of some gentleman's scarf.

"What a stroke of good luck!" said the lady, as she stowed it carefully away in her purse.

"What a confounded stroke of bad luck!" said the owner, when he came to miss it.

So there you are. What is bad for one is good for another. One cries and another laughs over the same job. Your loss is my gain. You let fall a five-pound note on the floor of a 'bus and rush on your way. At Charing Cross station you want the money for fare. You put your finger and thumb in your waistcoat pocket. Gone? Sure as you live, it's gone. You have a cold chill. But the person who found (and kept) it feels warm as toast.

By the same token it was most unhappy and unfortunate for Mrs. Gray to have seven successive attacks of rheumatic fever; yet the fact that she did have them proved to be a lucky circumstance for James Greendale. I'll show you the way it came about.

Mrs. Gray's first attack was in March, 1888. She says she had dreadful pains all over her; and we can well believe it. Her joints were stiff and swollen, so she couldn't move her fingers. For seven weeks she was scarcely able to bear the touch of the bed-clothes. Her temperature was 104 degrees, and she was rubbed with embrocations and wrapped in cotton wool. She was confined to her bed for three months.

After this Mrs. Gray had rheumatism in a milder form, with so much pain at the heart that she was often afraid to go to bed. The doctor said her heart was diseased. From March, 1888, to July, 1893, she had six attacks of rheumatic fever, and had got so low she despaired of ever being better. Having described her experience thus far she ends her letter in these words:

"In August, 1893, I went to Cleethorpe, and whilst there I had my seventh and last attack. I was so bad I never expected to reach home again. The doctor at Cleethorpe said I would, at best, be an invalid for life. When finally I arrived home at Nottingham I was so altered that my friends hardly knew me. My bones almost protruded through my skin. I could just hobble about the house and that was all.

"In the following October I read in a pamphlet about how Mother Seigel's Curative Syrup had cured cases of rheumatism as bad as mine, and at once bought a bottle of Mr. Widdowson, the chemist, in Arkwright Street. In three days I felt better, and in less than two weeks I had no more pain. I kept on with the Syrup and soon felt like a new woman, gaining flesh and strength every day. Since then I have had no rheumatism or indigestion. I can eat anything, and do my work with ease. You can publish this and refer inquirers to me. (Signed) (Mrs.) Annie Elizabeth Gray, 77, Bunbury Street, Nottingham, March 14th, 1895."

Now for our friend James Greendale. His mother writes that he is eighteen years old, and last November (1894) began to suffer from rheumatism. His symptoms were practically the same as Mrs. Gray's, although he didn't suffer so long as she did. Still he was so bad that for weeks he wasn't able to get about. He had the same treatment (embrocations, etc.), and they failed with him as they had failed with her. Having told us all this, his mother adds:

"In January (1895) I was telling my neighbour, Mrs. Gray, of Bunbury Street, about my son, when she told me that after seven attacks of rheumatic fever, and being at death's door, she was perfectly cured by Mother Seigel's Syrup. So I got this medicine from Boot's Drug Stores, in Arkwright Street, and gave it to James. When he had taken two bottles he was well as ever, and went back to his work. He has had no rheumatism since. (Signed) Isabella Greendale, 76, Battey Street, Nottingham, March 15th, 1895."

Thus we see that what was a misfortune for Mrs. Gray was good fortune for James Greendale, for through her he found help. But above all it was good luck for both of them that Mother Seigel's Syrup cures rheumatism by curing the cause of it—chronic indigestion or dyspepsia.

And what is luck after all but the mysterious process by which we help or hinder one another? Write us your opinion.

LOVE ROMANCE ADVENTURE WAR HUMOUR & PATHOS

ALONE ON THE SEA.

How José Andres Claimed the Life he had Saved.

AMONG the smiling villages and hamlets which border the Cantabrian coast is one little seaport town, gay and charming, whose sands and shore have made it a summer resort for the richest and most luxurious of those Spanish families who hasten with every recurring season to take refuge at some favourite watering-place from the vernal heats of the great cities.

Among the many tales, now grave now gay, which the fisher-folk love to relate to the gentry who come to sojourn amid them, not the least popular is the history of José Andres Villalba, whose fame yet lives in enthusiastic regret in the hearts of his fellow townsmen. He was a gallant fellow, a model of manly beauty, so says the recollection of those who have embalmed his memory—tall, slender, supple, with the satiny black hair and the clear, olive skin of the ideal type of Spanish beauty.

But what excited most candid wonder, and most trenchant comment among his class, was the insensibility of José Andres towards the charms of women. In vain the fisher-girls came running down to greet the coming of his boat, as they hailed the arrival of the others, chattering like magpies, their black hair streaming in thick plaits across their coral-red bodices, their gay-striped petticoats fluttering about their rounded knees. If José Andres showed his white teeth in a brief smile at their sallies, it was much to boast.

Save during the temporada (the bathing season), work was scarce and wages scant at the village; even the fish industry was declining for want of an adequate market. He felt a daily increasing need of larger earnings, and so, one summer when the season was at hand in which the old blood of Spain took wing for this modest village, as their prototypes of Germany and France for Biarritz and Baden-Baden, it occurred to José Andres to apply for "papers" to serve as bañero (bathing or swimming master).

One morning, when the blue waters seemed actually to leap and dance about the sportive band of doves which were the charge of José Andres, their number was augmented by the arrival of one about whom all the rest, maids and matrons, quickly gathered, with an affectionate warmth of reception which proved how little of jealousy or resentment they felt towards her for her exceeding beauty, which outshone theirs as the full blaze of the sun deadens moonlight.

She was no longer youthful. Thirty years must have brooded over her, but they had only perfected and completed her attractiveness. Tall, slender, dark, and pale, with black flashing eyes, her lovely face showed spirit, fire, and passion, such as might have been the gifts of Venus Aphrodite, when she sprang from the sea-foam.

When José Andres faced that splendid beauty, he felt that the spell of his fate was upon him. He grew pallid and tremulous, and when his hand, tanned and calloused by the oars, touched the silken, aristocratic palm of the lady, to lead her into the sea, he closed his eyes to give himself up the more to the delight of the moment, such as he had never expected to enjoy.

That was the beginning. From one day to another, the bathing master's passion grew more and more intense for this great worldly lady, who was to him the embodiment of all that he had dreamed of and longed for—the sublimation of the charms and graces of all the other women whose mere presence had intoxicated him. But she never dreamt of the youth's infatuation—she was so far above and beyond the little vanities and coquetries of the others. She, at least, could not stoop to accept, even had she known it, to tolerate, the adulation of a hireling, a menial of her service.

But for José Andres there was now no longer work—no father nor mother, no world, no space, no time—only the two divisions of time, when he saw, or saw not, his divinity. And the hours when she bathed in the sea seemed to him less than so many minutes.

There came a day which long should be of dismal memory and melancholy regrets in the history of that seaport village. The sands were covered with bathers. Seldom, indeed, they gathered there in such numbers. Suddenly the waters shivered, whirled, and eddied, circling in foamy whirlpools, and then retreating for a space, and then uplifting themselves as if with intelligent malevolence, they hurled themselves upon the beaches.

There was a hell upon earth. The gay and merry dawdlers, horror-stricken, struck down in the midst of their joyousness, acted each according to the individual's nature; some shrieked and then stood gazing stupidly upon their doom; some fell swooning; some turned and fled for their own salvation; some set their teeth, drew hard the breath, and turned to perish with helpless loved ones.

Bathing masters battled nobly in conjunction with the few who kept their self-possession; but when the tidal wave had spent its force, and the mighty pendulum swings of it in their diminishment had become dangerless, few were they of all the gay throng, so lately gathered there who were left among the living.

When the first shock of impulse reached them, José Andres was with the woman for whom he felt so mad an infatuation, so far out beyond the breakers that the shoreward rush of waters left them short of the land, and the retreating movement swept them again seaward. Instead of struggling towards the beach, the young man struck out with mighty strokes towards the wide waste of water, as if he were aiming for mid-ocean.

The undertow now caught them and now set them free; drift and tangle of weeds and buffeted human corpses were dashed around them in menace, but when at last the commotion subsided, they two were floating, still together, beaten, spent, exhausted, but alive and quite uninjured. Then failed her, womanlike, the noble courage of the woman, who had until now ably seconded with her splendid physical powers and her valiant self-possession every effort of her guide, her servant-protector. But now that the danger was virtually over her forces deserted her ignobly.

She threw up her hands and covered her eyes.

"Oh, heavens!" she cried, "can it be that I must die? No, no! I am too young to die yet!"

"These also were young—and lovely!" responded José Andres, indicating the floating corpses, "and now—only see them!" he strained her convulsively in his arms. "Is your life, then, so dear to you?"

"So dear! so dear! What would not I give for it?"

"Will you chose to live then?" demanded the man, devouring her with his flaming eyes.

"Oh, yes, yes! but save me, José Andres, and my gratitude will be eternal!"

"And do you know what will be the price of your safety? for I can save you; yes, believe me. What to me is this stretch of water? I could swim it yet, and carry you, three times over!"

"The price! I will give you what you will! but save me! save me!" sobbed the poor lady.

"Then I will," cried José Andres, "that you shall love me!" The madman pressed his fiery lips upon that proud, delicate face.

The woman screamed with terror, and struggled to free herself from the burning arms which held her with herculean power, while the bathing master murmured in her ear, wild, incoherent words of passionate vehemence.

"Andres, have mercy!" cried the unhappy woman, fixing upon him her starting eyes; "I will make you richer——"

"Make me rich?" cried José Andres; "you would offer me money? Know, then, that souls like mine care nothing for vile money! It is your love that I would—that I must—have, señora. I love you!—love you madly! Parents, home, life—all are lost to my eyes. You fill the world with your beauty, and you have made me the most wretched of men. Decide! Will you die, or will you love me?"

The lady looked once more across the water. Did she remember that one there loved her well enough to forgive her a sin as the price of her preservation?

"You shall have your will," she murmured, "but—you must take me ashore, I am near to dying!"

José Andres dragged her weak form across his shoulder and turned towards land, cleaving with giant strokes the restless water that seemed to part before him and own him master.

As they came near enough to the shore to hear the wails and lamentations of the few survivors, he paused again, and said sternly: "A pledge! You must give me a pledge of good faith! The chain round your neck! What, you will not? You must! and swear upon it that you will keep your word to me!"

She took from her neck the golden chain, and hung it about the throat of the man who sustained her.

"I swear!" she murmured faintly.

José Andres uttered a cry of joy, and once more sped onward and plunged with her through the breakers. He would give her over to none, but carried her, almost lifeless, to the dwelling of her people.

Andres bore away the golden chain, which he kissed frantically at every other step. If he remembered the gulf between himself and the daughter of one of the first families in the realm, the madness of his daring passion blinded him to its width and its importance.

The next morning the little town found time, in the midst of its grief and excitement, to wonder over the departure, late the night before, of the noble lady who had been miraculously preserved from drowning. So great was the shock, it was said, which she had received, that she could not bear to remain on the scene of her great peril, but had so strenuously urged her family to remove her that they had consented, fearing disastrous consequences to her health from a refusal.

A year passed by, and another, and the village was solitary and abandoned by its old friends; its beaches deserted, and its villas empty; so sinister a remembrance had cast an anathema over the waters. But everything yields to time; so that tragic history was forgotten little by little, and when twelve years had rolled round, the little port had returned to the joyousness and fullness of its best days, and was the theatre of reunion of the flower and cream of three aristocracies.

One evening, smiling as almost always are summer evenings by the sea, there came to the favourite beach of the bathers, a cavalier and a lady. The gentleman looked about for a bathing master to whom to confide the lady, but none was disengaged at the moment. Presently approached them a man whose gait was light and whose limbs were nervous, notwithstanding his white hair and wrinkled countenance, as of one very aged. He humbly begged that he might be allowed to take the lady into the water.

"What! are you a bathing master?" demanded the new arrival, wondering to see one of that calling at that place in such unfortunate plight.

"Ah! yes, my lord! and none will dispute my ability to battle with the waves that have known me for such long years!"

There was such accent of truth and sincerity in the words of the man that the cavalier intrusted the lady to him with the utmost confidence.

She, although beyond the fortieth birthday, was still so beautiful as to need fear no comparison with younger rivals. The bathing master led her into the water, so gently, so slowly, that when she at last cast a look around to take her bearings, she saw that they were far beyond the other bathers.

"Look at me, woman!" suddenly exclaimed her guide, clasping her in his sinewy arms, and fixing upon her his brilliant eyes, which gleamed like coals in their sockets; "look at me! Does nothing in these waves which rock us remind you of other days?"

"Oh, heavens! it is José Andres!" replied the lady, but half convinced, and still endeavouring to trace in those worn and aged features, the bold, audacious lineaments of the young fisherman.

"Yes, it is José Andres! he the poor victim of your black, disloyal treachery; your love has been for me an abyss that has swallowed up everything—home, friends, parents, youth, hope, life itself!—all devoured by your love! I saw Heaven open before my eyes when in a supreme moment you swore to be mine for ever, and the dark pit opened beneath my feet when you left me, committing the blackest perjury. Woman, woman! you did not know, or you would not understand, my love, nor how my heart adored you with all its force—with delirium, with frenzy! I have tried with all the force of my will to forget you, and the struggle has only resulted in destroying the best part of my life, and in leading me to premature old age."

"Andres!" the lady murmured, terrified, "I shall always remember the generosity of him who saved me!"

"But that is a chimera! the years cannot return. The man to whom you have belonged—oh, he has at least been happy, while the hapless José Andres has been consumed by one sole idea. Oh, that man—that man is happy; he was rich, and he could obtain the hand of her whom I worshipped. But I, who have sacrificed everything for her—I, who was swallowed up in the waters with her—I, who saved her, and who, in return, despising reward, and only asking that she should love me—what is left me? Her ingratitude, her treachery, her——" His voice chokéd in his throat and he could not continue; but he pressed her convulsively to his heart and frantically kissed her perfumed tresses.

"But you will forgive me?" intreated the lady, encouraged by the thought of the strength of the love that had survived so many years, so many changes.

"Will I pardon you? Yes! oh! your beauty causes in my heart a fatal vertigo, that awakens in me again the wish to possess you for ever—to unite you to me for that endless eternity whose secret is known to God, and to him only!" And José Andres, trembling, palpitant, re-living in that moment all his life of deprivations, clasped in his arms the neck of his beautiful companion, murmuring in her ear sweet words of love that the breezes bore away on their wings, to whisper to the seaweeds of the shore.

The unhappy woman, struggling in vain to free herself from the arms that clasped her, turned a last look towards the beach, most sorrowful, most despairing, and saw, arising above the blue shadows of the twilight, the gay little town with its white walls, and its chestnut groves, where the winds went, sighing, to blend with the sighs of lovers. Never is life so dear as when one's hold on it is loosened. Never seem so beautiful such scenes as when they are about to be blotted out for ever.

Pale, stunned, the unhappy wife struggled faintly yet a few moments longer, with the instinct of self-preservation; then her head drooped upon the breast of the man who blessed the fate of dying with her in his arms, as he held her beneath the water. He gazed upon her for a few minutes, and then gave himself up to the force of the waves; a few bubbles sprang to the surface, and it seemed as if one prolonged sigh was breathed forth, saluting the pale moon as she rose above the water.

The Crystal Magnet.

"What is this 'odic force' we hear so much about?" I said, looking up from the paper.

"Odic force," said Grimsby—Grimsby is one of those men who know everything—"odic force is one of those serviceable and comprehensive terms for which we are indebted to modern science, as it embraces, under one simple head, all the phenomena which used to be separately classed under such heads as electro-biology, animal magnetism, mesmerism, trance, etc.—in fact, it is one of those nine days' wonders which will soon make room for something else."

"Still," I suggested, "the present day, at least, is not lacking in liberality of idea, or breadth of view. I, for one, hope, within the scope of the coming generation, to witness many of the occult phenomena of Nature laid bare, reduced to law, and made to subserve the exigencies of everyday life."

"By-the-way," interrupted Grimsby, as if struck by a sudden idea, "did I ever tell you—it has just come to my mind now—of that experience with Count Kolnaky? It is a case in point—or rather you can take it as such or not, as you like. At any rate, it was a very curious coincidence, and, if you are all agreeable, I will tell it you.'

As Grimsby usually monopolises the conversation, in any case, when he is of the company, it did not matter very much to us what he talked about, and accordingly taking our silence for consent, he settled himself into an easy attitude, and told the following story:

"I do not know whether you remember, about a year ago, the advent of a certain Hungarian count or noble—at all events, he went by the name of a count—Count Kolnaky, we called him. He had been making the tour of the world, like most gentlemen of leisure of the present day, and, of course, passed through London. That he was immediately seized upon, introduced to the best society, and made a lion of, goes without saying. His full, black beard, and aristocratic bearing, were features of the most refined drawing-rooms of the West-end during his stay. And Count Kolnaky had many claims to social recognition. He possessed attractions which made him welcome wherever he went. He was a philosopher, a gentleman, and a brilliant conversationalist, all in one. I happened to meet him one evening at the Wyatts', and struck up an acquaintance with him, which lasted during his sojourn here.

"I recollect that evening, in the drawing-room, he became the centre of an attentive circle of scientific men and admiring ladies; for the Wyatts, as you know, are people of tact, and had chosen their company to suit their guest. I forget how it occurred, but the conversation somehow drifted, after having run the gamut through astronomy, optics, and electricity, to a discussion of the properties of the 'odic force.'

"My knowledge of the odic force was extremely limited, as was also the case with most of the company present, and we listened with much interest to what the Count had to tell us about it; and it was a subject he was well qualified to speak about, having been a personal friend of the Baron von Reichenbach, the discoverer of this mysterious principle in Nature. What? You are not very clear yourselves as to the properties of the odic force? Very well, I will begin by giving you a general idea about this mysterious and occult element, or principle—for no one yet really knows which or what it is.

"Some thirty or forty years ago, in 1845, I think, an Austrian nobleman, Baron von Reichenbach by name, in the course of some experiments he was making—he was a man of large means, and a scientific investigator by nature—discovered the existence of a new force, or principle, which he called 'od,' or 'odyl,' or 'odylic force.' Having ample means to indulge his tastes, he instituted in his spacious castle, near Vienna, a series of experiments for the purpose of thoroughly investigating the nature of the principle he had stumbled upon by chance.

"This principle involved, in general terms, the relations existing between animated beings and inanimate things. He demonstrated, to his own satisfaction, that such relations did actually exist—relations of sympathy or antipathy, if we may use these terms—between certain persons whom he styled 'sensitives,' and certain substances, such as crystal, and some of the metals. Thus, when one of his 'sensitives' was introduced into a dark room which contained an oblong block of crystal, luminous smoke or vapour appeared to emanate from one end of the block; and if the sensitive approached it, its presence was made manifest by a distinct sensation of cold.

"All beings, urged the Baron, are more or less sensitive to the contact or approach of some susbtance or other. Some cannot bear the sight of certain animals, or are strangely affected by certain sounds or noises. I myself, for instance, cannot bear the touch of velvet, or the sound made by drawing the nail over the surface of crape. In short, each and every one of us, who is in the least degree 'sensitive,' has his affinity, and his pet aversion, in some form or other.

"Reichenbach's theory met with determined opposition and ridicule by many scientific authorities, notably the late Dr. Carpenter, the distinguished physicist; but, on the other hand, it enlisted the support of many savants of almost equal eminence. But I do not mean to deliver a lecture on the subject just now; so, hoping I have given you a glimpse of the inner mysteries of odylism, I will proceed with my story.

"Well, Count Kolnaky, as I said, was the centre of an admiring and intellectual coterie, all standing in the middle of the drawing-room, and the scientific discussion went bravely on for a considerable time. But even the charms of science will not serve to keep an evening party, if it contains a leaven of youth in its composition, in perfect accord, and, one by one, the ladies were observed to detach themselves from the group, sounds of more or less levity were heard from distant corners, and presently none but a few old professors and intellectual fogies surrounded and metaphorically buttonholed the Count.

"Presently Mrs. Wyatt, a charming woman, as you may know—as clever as she is pretty, and always on the look-out to amuse her guests, drew out from a little knot of ladies, who had evidently been concocting some plot or other at one of the doors of the conservatory, and made straight for the gathering in the centre of the room. Approaching Count Kolnaky, she said, at the same time making a pretty little mock obeisance:

The centre of an admiring and intellectual coterie.

"'I am commissioned, a deputation of one, to bear to your countship the ultimatum of the ladies present. It is that you will stop talking, and proceed to action. In fine, we desire you to give us an object lesson in this "odic force," that you have been so learnedly expatiating upon for the last half-hour. Is not that the message I was to deliver, ladies?' concluded our hostess, turning to her fair guests, who had followed to give moral support and backing to their spokeswoman.

"Then followed a medley of voices, from among which one could distinguish such expressions as: 'Yes, do, Count;' 'It will be so nice!' 'Oh, you must, now!' 'Please oblige us!' 'I am sure you will;' with others of like tenor, during which the count, who, by-the-way, like most of his countrymen, speaks capital English, disengaged himself from his scientific entourage, and smilingly professed himself delighted to promote in any way he could the enjoyment of the evening.

"'I shall be most happy,' he said, 'to conduct an experiment with a view of demonstrating the existence and potency of the "odic force," provided I can find a subject sufficiently "sensitive" to practise upon. I see no reason why, in an intellectual assemblage like this,' with a comprehensive bow to the company, which numbered some twenty persons, 'I should not do so. Permit me to make a tour of the salon that I may inspect;' and the Count proceeded to pass leisurely to and fro, beaming good-naturedly through his spectacles, first at one, then at another, and imperturbably running the gauntlet of the masculine smiles and feminine titters which met him on every side. He did not, however, seem to be very favourably impressed with the adaptibility of any of us to become exponents of the mystery of the 'odic force,' for, after completing his round, he paused near the folding-doors, rubbed his chin reflectively, and was silent.

"The sound of the turning of a leaf in the book in the other drawing-room—we were a small party, and until then I thought we had all collected in the larger of the apartments—attracted his attention. He turned, looked in, and then walked in the direction whence the sound proceeded. All of us followed, as there was no one who had not now become interested in the proceedings of the Count. Seated at a table, reading, was a gentleman whom all of you know, at least, by sight, as he is quite a prominent member of the legal profession, and may be seen every day at the courts. As what afterwards transpired in this connection might possibly exert an injurious influence upon this gentleman's reputation and practice, and as I am convinced that he is a thoroughly estimable and honourable man, I shall, if you please, call him Copeland.

"Mr. Copeland looked up as we approached the table, surprise depicted in his frank blue eyes, and then rose as it struck me, to apologise for having withdrawn from the party. Count Kolnaky, however, anticipated him by remarking, in an easy manner:

"'Forgive our intrusion, my dear sir. I had the pleasure of an introduction to you, if I remember right, before dinner—Mr. Copeland, I believe. We have had quite an interesting talk in the other room, since dinner, as to the merits of the "odic force," and our lady friends here have pressed me to make a practical exposition of it, if I can. It has just struck me that your organisation is of just such a kind as to be sensitive to this force. The question is, are you willing to contribute to the instruction and entertainment of this company by permitting me to ascertain whether it is so or not?'

The Count sat down and penned a brief note.

"Mr. Copeland, who is a tall, fair-haired, intellectual-looking man of about five-and-thirty, smiled, said he had heard and read something about the mysterious force Count Kolnaky referred to, was interested and desirous of further information regarding it, and should be delighted if he could be of any service in elucidating its mysteries for the benefit of Mrs. Wyatt's guests.

"The Count bowed and thanked him, then after consulting his watch, turned to Mrs. Wyatt and said:

"'I must trouble you, dear madam, to let me have someone to carry a message to my servant at the Palace Hotel. Had I anticipated that I should be called upon to experiment with the "odic force" to-night, I should have come prepared. As it is, I must send for my crystal.'

"The Count sat down and penned a brief note, which he handed to the messenger, who had meanwhile been summoned. During the half-hour which elapsed between the departure and return of the messenger, and which was spent in desultory conversation, I noticed that Count Kolnaky engrossed the undivided attention of Mr. Copeland, with whom he talked in low and earnest tones. I thought I remarked, too, during this time, a dreamy expression stealing now and again over the lawyer's face, as if he had become oblivious to his surroundings. At length the messenger returned with a small parcel, which he handed to the Count, and which being unwrapped was found to contain an oblong section of clear rock-crystal, some eight inches in length by two in width, the polyhedron being almost as regular in shape as if cut from glass. The Count then asked Mrs. Wyatt for some silk thread, and while it was being procured for him he asked Copeland to take hold of one end of the crystal while he held the other. The two men sat facing each other for about five minutes without speaking. At length Copeland began to manifest signs of uneasiness.

"'Do you experience any strange sensation, Mr. Copeland?' asked the Count, in evidence to the state of his vis-à-vis.

"'The crystal feels like a lump of ice,' replied the latter. 'It has been growing colder and colder ever since we began holding it.'

"'Good!' exclaimed the Count approvingly. Then, turning to us, he said: 'Ladies and gentlemen, it is as I expected. Our friend, Mr. Copeland, is a "sensitive." I think I can with his assistance, make some demonstrations of the actuality and potency of the "odic force." Mr. Copeland, the touch of the crystal pains you; you can now let it go.'

"Copeland did so, apparently nothing loth. The Count transferred the crystal to his left hand, and then proceeded to make some preparations. He first lifted one of the chairs and set it down near the wall of the room opposite the conservatory, and facing the side with the folding doors. He then asked Copeland to take his seat in that chair, and next asked us all to accompany him into the other apartment, leaving Copeland alone in the smaller drawing-room. He then pointed out to us that, from the position Copeland occupied, all the interior of the larger drawing-room was invisible to him, accept a certain angle. In this angle he requested us to station ourselves.

"He next unwound a long silk thread from its reel, tied one end round the centre of the oblong crystal polyhedron, and getting upon a chair, attached the other end to one of the branches of the chandelier which hung in the centre of the room, gauging the length of the thread so that the crystal, when it swung free, would be on about a level with his head. From the point at which the crystal hung it was impossible to see Copeland, accordingly it was equally impossible for Copeland to see the crystal, the wall between the drawing-room blocking the field of vision between these two points; while from the angle occupied by Mrs. Wyatt's guests there was free and uninterrupted vision of both Copeland and the crystal, it being possible to observe both simultaneously, so to speak.

"'I want two gentlemen to stand near me,' now said the Count, 'so that they can minutely observe my actions and hear my whispers, and at the same time have a full view of Mr Copeland.'

"I was first to volunteer, as I happened to be standing close by the Count at the moment, and was also anxious to lose no detail of this interesting experiment. I have always been fascinated by the occult and marvellous. The place next me was almost simultaneously taken by a tall, dark, somewhat sinister-looking figure, that of a gentleman to whom I had been introduced that evening, and whom, for reasons which will afterwards appear, I prefer to call Mr. Daintry. This gentleman had, I noticed, been taking peculiar interest in the proceedings and was evidently well acquainted with Copeland, as I had seen the two conversing very earnestly before dinner, though, as I thought, in rather a disputatious than an amicable mood, and with a somewhat abrupt finish on the part of the lawyer.

"'Now,' said the Count, addressing the party in general, "you see how this crystal hangs. Its longitudinal axis points straight to where Mr. Copeland is sitting, like a needle to the pole. What is the reason of that? Simply, that during the few minutes Mr Copeland and myself were engaged in holding the crystal, a sympathetic relation was established between us, through the intermediary agent of the crystal. One peculiarity of this relation is that the crystal, or rather the "odic force," which passes through it, and emanates from it, acts as a conductor between our respective intelligences. By means of this mysterious force, messages are conveyed from the one intelligence to the other, with as much facility and certainty as if they were transmitted along substantial wires, by the electric fluid, in the ordinary manner.

"The Count then went through a variety of motions, such as taking out his watch and looking at it, yawning, scratching his head, and so forth, all of which were simultaneously imitated by Copeland with such absolute precision of gesture as to excite the greatest enthusiasm and merriment among the ladies, and engage the keenest attention from the savants behind them, all having of course, a clear view of both the actors in this odylic drama.

"'That is the simplest form of mental intercommunication provided by this odic current,' explained the Count, when, after a minute or two, the mimicry seemed to grow monotonous. 'A much higher order will be developed in my experiment.'

"As he spoke, he reached at random for a book from a table near him. He opened the leaves casually, about the middle, and I noticed that it was an edition of Moore's poems. He fixed his eye steadily upon a page—in the 'Fire Worshippers,' I think—and said:

"'Our friend, Mr. Copeland, will now favour us with a little recitation.'

"No sooner said than done. In a full, sonorous voice, with appropriate inflection, Copeland proceeded to declaim line after line of the page at which Count Kolnaky was looking, beginning, oddly enough, in the middle of a clause, as the page did. When he had rolled off some twenty lines, the Count gently closed the volume, and the declamation ceased. The ladies were in raptures; the scientific gentlemen looked sheepish and bewildered.

"'Pardon me,' said a voice at my shoulder, 'one moment, Count Kolnaky, before we stop these interesting experiments. I am sure a minute or two, more or less, will not matter to my friend, Mr. Copeland, and he would be the last to object, did he know it was in the cause of science.'

"I turned, and recognised the sinister-looking gentleman, who had stood with me, next to the Count, during the proceedings, who had taken the greatest interest in all, more especially the last experiment, and whom I have, for the nonce, called Daintry. If I described him fully, you would all know him, and, taking everything into consideration, there is just as much reason for preserving his incognito as that of Copeland, as no good could be effected by exposing him, and a possible injustice might, and in the opinion of the world at large certainly would, be done.

Mr. Daintry.

"'What I wanted to know is simply this,' went on Daintry, in suave accents, 'could anyone else—could I, for instance—carrying on the mental intercourse with my friend Copeland, in the same way you have done through this bit of crystal? I am asking the question purely in the interest of science, you know.'

"I was somewhat amazed, knowing, as I did, Daintry's reputation, to hear him talking about the 'interests of science,' and inwardly wondered what there could be in the experiments we had just witnessed to excite such lively interest in one whose tastes were certainly not noted for elevation of character, and whose science did not soar, so far as I was aware, beyond the billiard table or the pigeon trap.

"The Count, however, answered him with gravity and politeness:

"'You are asking a very hard question, my dear sir,' he replied, 'and one, which, I am free to confess, I cannot answer. Everything depends upon the sympathy or rapport existing between the parties communicating. The odic force is, indeed, constantly emanating from that crystal. The question is, can that force be so controlled by you, or another, as to affect Mr. Copeland in the manner we have just witnessed? In my case a mutual rapport was established, by our together holding the crystal for some time before I began my experiments. It may be that you can establish communication, without resorting to that method of doing it. I know that enough of Mr. Copeland's magnetic, or, rather, odic aura will cling about that crystal for several days to come, to enable me to hold communication with him.'

"'Will you allow me, Count, to try whether I can influence my friend Copeland?' in a curious voice.

"'Certainly,' acquiesced the Count, 'unless the ladies are tired by this time?'

"The ladies, however, disclaimed any such feeling, and Daintry proceeded to apply his hand to the crystal as he had seen Count Kolnaky do.

"Copeland was sitting in the same easy attitude on his chair in the other room, and I kept my eyes on him, as I was as curious as anybody to witness the outcome of the experiment.

"About a minute passed without noticeable effort. In about a minute more, Copeland began to fidget upon his seat, as before. A few seconds afterwards he got up, lifted the chair he had been sitting on, and deliberately set it standing upon the drawing-room table.

"The action was so ludicrous and unexpected, that there was a general laugh, and much merriment among the ladies, during which Daintry explained that this was just what he had willed Copeland to do.

"After this, it was agreed by everyone that the existence and power of the odic force had been amply demonstrated, and that it was time to release Copeland from his mystic thraldom, if, indeed, he was so enthralled, for it was certainly impossible to tell from his mere appearance that he was not in perfect possession of all his senses. And, so far as I am concerned, where Copeland crossed the division line from somnambulism, hypnotism, odylism, or whatever condition it was, will always remain a mystery; for, after he had set the chair upon the table, he turned, stopped for a moment, saw us laughing, realised, evidently abruptly, that there was something to laugh at, turned again, took in the incongruity of the chair perched upon the table, rubbed his eyes, looked again at us in a bewildered sort of way, and coming up to where we were standing, said he fancied he must have been dozing for a minute or two, under the pressure of Count Kolnaky's mysterious force, and asked us whether he was responsible for the misplaced furniture.

"The party soon after broke up, Count Kolnaky accepting a seat in Daintry's conveyance, which was waiting for him at the door, while I took the train, having first made an appointment to call upon the Count the next day for some further information about the odic force.

"Next morning, accordingly, I sent up my card to Count Kolnaky's rooms, at the Palace Hotel, a message being returned by his servant, requesting me to come up and wait, as the Count had left orders to that effect, in case he was out when I called; I did so, and was passing away the time till the Count's return by looking over some interesting books which were lying around, when the door opened, and the servant ushered in our friend, Mr. Daintry.

"We exchanged salutations, but our tastes having little in common, I returned to my reading, while Daintry sauntered here and there about the room, looking at things in general. I was not so deeply engaged in reading but that I was conscious of what was going on around me, and I noticed that, after a time, Daintry stopped before a little table and seemed to be examining some object that lay upon it. I saw that this object was nothing more or less than the crystal which had afforded us so much entertainment the night before. Daintry looked at it a considerable time. Then he took it up in his hand, walked over to one of the windows, and looked out. He seemed to me to be taking bearings. Then he held up the crystal in his hand, about the level of his breast, dipping it a little from the horizontal, till its other end pointed in a north-easterly direction.

"His actions had so much method in them, that I began to get interested, and determined to give them a more thorough inspection. I was sitting in the centre of the room, while Daintry was standing with his back to me, near the window; thus I had a good view of the position. The first thing I remarked was that a straight line produced through the long axis of the crystal would cross the City in about the direction of Chancery Lane. The next was that Daintry remained standing there motionless about five minutes, keeping the crystal pointed steadily in the same direction. Then his hand began to shake a little, but he kept it up for two or three minutes more, till it seemed to me that he could do so no longer; suddenly he hurriedly walked to the little table he had taken the crystal from, and dropped it like a hot potato.

"'Been experimenting a little with the odic force on your own account?' I remarked carelessly.

"Daintry coloured, and looked confused, but said nothing, and presently Count Kolnaky came in. The incident was forgotten, and passed out of my mind, till revived by a somewhat remarkable circumstance the other day.

"And this is what that remarkable circumstance was: About three weeks ago there died a rich old gentleman, whom I shall call Jelfe. Jelfe was Daintry's uncle, but did not take kindly to his nephew's peculiar ways. The old gentleman was reported to be worth about half a million, all of which would go to Daintry as next of kin, provided there was no will. But there was a will, and this will devised all the property to certain charities, with the exception of a small monthly income to the nephew. This will was drawn by Lawyer Copeland, attended by his confidential clerk, who is a personal friend of mine, and deposited along with other valuable papers in the safe of Mr. Copeland's office. When old Jelfe died, no will could be found. The safe was emptied, every drawer in the office was ransacked for the missing will, but it did not turn up, and, accordingly, the money went to Daintry.

"Of course a most minute inquiry was made by Copeland as to any circumstances which could throw any light upon the matter, and in the course of this inquiry one of the junior clerks testified that he had seen through the open door, about a year before, his employer rise from the table at which he was seated in his private office, go to the safe, unlock it, take therefrom a paper, which looked like a will, go to the fireplace, place the paper in the empty grate—it was summer—and deliberately set fire to it, watching it burn till it was consumed.

He seemed to me to be taking bearings.

"He said nothing about it at the time, as he did not dare to question the acts of his employer. When asked if he could remember the day when the strange occurrence took place, he said he could, as he had bought a new suit of clothes the day before, and had made a note of the date, which was the 17th of May, and the time was about half-past twelve, as he recollected he had just returned from lunch.

"Now, the curious coincidence to which I want to call your attention is this: It was on the sixteenth of May that I attended the Wyatt's party, and accordingly it was the 17th of May that I was at Count Kolnaky's rooms at the Palace Hotel. It was also between the hours of twelve and one that I was there, and it must have been about half-past twelve when Daintry behaved so strangely with the crystal, or when at the time that Copeland burnt up that legal paper in the extraordinary manner related by the boy, an act, by-the-way, which he has no recollection of doing.

"Another strange point in the affair is, that a line drawn in the direction the crystal was pointing would just intersect Chancery Lane in the neighbourhood of Copeland's office.

"Now, the question is, whether these points are mere meaningless coincidences, or whether they bear a strange and momentuous relation to each other. Are we to believe that Daintry deliberately directed the odic force, the use of which he had learned the day before, so as to inspire Copeland with the purpose to burn his uncle's will? He had ascertained the day before that he certainly possessed the power to influence the lawyer to obey his will. What so natural that as he should exercise the power for his personal benefit? He had also learned from Count Kolnaky that the crystal would continue to exert its influence over Copeland for a time, possibly a day or two. What so natural, then, as that he should seek to prove its efficacy on the following day?

"I will not pretend to answer these questions, or to venture an opinion on this strange coincidence; but you can now see why I was anxious to conceal the real names of the parties implicated in the affair, as a public disclosure might injure the lawyer, and might also be doing an injustice to the nephew, who, after all, has only obtained what many persons thought should have been his in any case."

Key of Jumble Story, No. 3 (see p. 185).

THE TRUSTED FRIEND.

"THE gloomy house at the end of the street is surrounded by a high wall, and a mystery," the Doctor of the suburb was fond of saying, and the epigram had made the place notorious.

There were few, however, who troubled themselves about the matter; those that did merely shook their heads as they went by and passed on. That there was a mystery, it was nevertheless very evident. So the busy-bodies discussed the matter, with the result that a watch was set on the house, and several facts of interest brought to light.

In the first place it was found that there was one young person in the house at least; and then it was noticed that she was usually alone, and, what is worse, was very pretty. And when she was scanned yet more closely, and her every detail, from her hat to her shoe, had been discussed, it was observed that behind the fresh beauty of her face there was a tired expression of sadness and worry: she must be very lonely, and yet the busy-bodies did not think of comforting her.

In truth there was a mystery behind the high walls of the gloomy house, and yet how deep a mystery, and how tragic, no one even suspected.

For the girl who took the lonely little walks by herself was a young wife, whose husband was something in the City. That meant that he would go away, and return at all times of the day; sometimes he would be absent for days at a time, and even weeks. Then he would come home worn out and fatigued, but invariably with a swollen banking account.

One day, after he had been home all the morning and afternoon, he had taken his hat when it grew dark, and bade her a more tender farewell than usual, he had made sweet promises to her, saying that when he returned they would leave their gloomy house, and perhaps would take a holiday abroad for a year or two. And then he would never leave her again, and they would be rich and happy.

So he went away, and his wife waited anxiously for his return. But the days passed by and he did not come; the days lengthened into weeks, and the weeks into months, and still she was left alone.

Then gradually she used up all the money he had left her; friendless and relationless, she knew of no one to whom she might apply for aid. She sold the furniture, piece by piece, until there was none left; all the fine old furniture worth fifty times the amount she got for it.

The jewels went, one by one, and after those her clothes. The wind was blowing cold now, and she had but one old dress with which to clothe herself. Lastly she parted with her wedding ring, and then she awaited the end.

And the husband of this poor woman, starving, and deserted, alone in the gloomy house—what was it that he was doing?

The mystery is soon explained—he was in prison.

"Fourteen years penal servitude." He had not dared to tell his wife. It would kill her. He knew that she would soon be in want of money. Oh, the bitter irony of it—the cursed, bitter irony. Within ten paces of her door lay hundreds upon hundreds of pounds of his ill-gotten wealth.

And he could not let her know. His hair turned white with the agony of the thought; his health broke down; the doctors knew that he had but a few months to live.

Now it happened that in the exercising yard this man met a companion in misery who was an old friend. Sentence by sentence, sometimes only one a day he told his secret when the warder's back was turned. In the garden, six yards from the pear tree, beneath a dandelion plant, lay buried his hidden treasure, half in notes, and half in gold, amounting to thousands of pounds; he did not know how many. The man was to dig it up, and keep the notes himself, and give the gold to the "little wife." He was to tell her that her husband was dead.

By the last day of his friend's confinement the wretched husband had told him everything, and demanded his solemn oath that he would do his commands faithfully. The man swore by everything sacred and unsacred that he would do so; the two men looked each other earnestly in the eyes, and then one of them was taken back to his cell, and a few hours later found himself free.

He set out immediately in search of the out-of-the-way suburb his friend had mentioned. He had no difficulty in finding the big gloomy house, surrounded by the high wall. It was apparently deserted. Not a soul was to be seen. Only a few sparrows hopped on the overgrown drives. He went to the back of the building, scaled the walls, found the pear tree, and the dandelion plant, and drove his pick savagely into the soil. The dandelion broke asunder, and yielded up its treasures. He came to a heavy iron box, and drawing it out, he prised it open. His heart gave a great bound of excitement as he found within everything that his poor friend had described. He put the notes hastily on one side, and gazed at the gold. "He was to keep the notes for himself, and give the gold to the little wife." His friends' words came back to him, and he remembered the oath that he had sworn. Then a thought from the Devil entered his mind;—there were only two people in the world that knew his secret; and one, though living, was dead.

The moon came out from behind a cloud, and shining on the golden metal transformed it into a thousand stars. The man ran his fingers through the coins, and listened to their music.

Then he looked nervously behind him, and put the notes back in the box, and the whole in the bag. He threw the soil in its place again, and raised the sack to his shoulders. Then he hurriedly left the garden.

THE GRAND LAMA'S TOOTHACHE

LOUD was the wailing. The Grand Lama had the toothache!

All Thibet was in mourning, and a special ten days' prayer was being offered up in every temple throughout the land. But somehow prayer did not seem efficacious, and His Divine Individuality's ailment grew worse each day.

Nourmahal, fairest of the fair, tried in vain to ease the troubles of her lord and master. She hung about his neck, and mingled her tears with his. For—it must be confessed with sorrow—the Grand Lama actually wept. The Venerable Vizier was stricken with horror at this sight. "Go," he screamed to an attendant bronze, "go and bear hither the golden vessel wherein the sacrificial oils are blended. One drop of those precious tears ought not to be lost."

The sacred bowl was brought, and the Vizier with trembling fingers held it under the very nose of his imperial master, so as to catch the scalding tears as they fell. Still Nourmahal, fairest of the fair, continued to mingle her tears with those of the Grand Lama. This disgusted the worthy Vizier, who was a stickler for etiquette.

"Will the brother-in-law of the moon pardon me if I make a suggestion?" he said at last.

"The demons catch thee," growled the suffering Lama. "Don't you see I am in no humour for suggestions? Say thy say, and get it over."

"I merely wished to point out," observed the Vizier, "that it is scarcely meet to see the tears of one, who, though beautiful, is yet but a common mortal, mingled with the tears of a Grand Lama. Hadn't your Divine Individuality better put Nourmahal aside for the present? or shall we procure another weeping bowl for the fairest of the fair?"

At this the beauteous Nourmahal waxed exceeding wroth, and buried her lovely head in the imperial bosom. "Oh, dear Grand Lama!" she wailed, "the old wretch wants to separate me from you."

"I assure you," began the Vizier—but he was rudely interrupted by his sovereign.

"Take that ridiculous bowl away," yelled his majesty, giving the offending vessel a kick with his royal foot which sent it flying over the heads of the courtiers and spilt all the precious tears it contained. Nourmahal was enchanted. "A myriad of thanks!" she exclaimed, kissing the Grand Lama upon the cheek.

But, alas for Nourmahal! She had pressed her ruby lips upon the wrong jaw! Unconsciously she had aggravated the imperial toothache!

The Grand Lama bounded from his throne, and, clutching his former favourite by the long black hair, sent her flying after the sacrificial bowl.

"To the dungeons with her!" he howled. "Let her be decapitated to-morrow!"

At this moment the poor Vizier reappeared. "Your Divine Individuality is quite right," he said. "The minx was far too forward."

It was an unlucky remark for the Vizier. "You are as bad as she!" shouted the enraged monarch. "Take him away, guards, and unless he can find me a cure for this devil-born toothache within twenty-four hours, bring me his head in that same golden basin he has dared to annoy me with."

Then the Vizier was marched off, and His Divine Individuality sank back upon his throne, and resumed his interrupted weeping.

With the earliest streak of dawn, upon the following morning, the Grand Lama arose. He had spent a horrible night. The physicians had burned fire before his mouth, and the priests had prayed for the healing of his throbbing jaws. But it was all to no purpose. He was worse than ever.

The Vizier was brought before the throne loaded with chains. He had made good use of his time, however, and had one of his suggestions to make in regard to the imperial toothache.

"Let your Divine Individuality make a proclamation," he said, "to the effect that if anyone cures your toothache he shall be given a mighty herd of sheep, and made Governor of the Northern Provinces; but that, if he fail in the attempt, a lingering death shall be his portion. I have said——"

The Grand Lama dried his tears, and, with one hand on his jaw, extended the other to the Vizier. "Take off his chains!" he said, "he is temporarily pardoned. We will see how his plan works. Meanwhile, make the proclamation, and leave me in peace!"

Arung, the handsome, was a shepherd of the mountains, and his father, old Zebe, had been a shepherd before him. All the maidens were in love with Arung, for he had a soul above ordinary shepherds. The tails of his sheep were more neatly plaited, and their horns more quaintly carved than were the sheep of any other mountaineer. But the love of the maidens was not returned by Arung. He sighed for beauties with noses less flat, and lips less thick. In point of fact, he was a very unconventional young shepherd.

Now it came to pass that old Zebe, Arung's sire, fell sick; and his sickness was a mysterious malady in his sole remaining tooth. It was painful in the extreme, and Arung felt sad to see his father suffer. So he sat him down to think out a remedy.

"If I have in my flock a tainted wether," he said, "what do I do? I remove him. Why shall I not do the same with the tooth of my sire? It will not kill him to remove his tooth; and, as all his other teeth have come out by themselves, there must surely be a way of getting out this one!"

It was a brilliant thought. Arung was more than unconventional; he was original! He tied his father to the earth with thongs of osier, and, taking two flints used by him for carving his sheep-horns, he extracted the offending molar.

For a long time the old man would not look upon or forgive his son, but presently, as the pain began to die away, he recognised the good which had been done him, and wept tears of joy upon Arung's manly shoulders.

At this moment the door of the shepherd's hut was thrown open, and a herald of the Grand Lama appeared.

"Hearken, shepherds!" cried the new-comer, "to the proclamation of his Divine Individuality!"

And then and there he read aloud the celebrated toothache proclamation, which the mind of the Vizier had conceived.

* * * * *

Nourmahal, the fairest of the fair, was being led before the Grand Lama to say her last farewell before her execution. As she entered the great hall of the palace, a youth in the guise of a shepherd passed close by her shrinking form. He was a handsome youth and stalwart withal. The favourite, used to close-shaven and stoop-shouldered courtiers, gazed with admiration upon the young stranger. And was the shepherd regardless of the beautiful being who thus scrutinised him? Hardly, for the shepherd was none other than Arung, the son of Zebe, and Arung had long sighed to look upon true female loveliness.

In point of fact the two fell in love at first sight.

* * * * *

"You say you can cure me?" said the Grand Lama to Arung, the son of Zebe.

"Divine Individuality!—yes!" replied the venturous youth. "But to do so I must be alone with you, and you must be bound hand and foot. I also request that the fair maiden shall be my portion instead of the promised governorship."

"Your demands are granted," said the Grand Lama. "You can take the girl; I will be very glad to get rid of her. And now, my subjects, leave me entirely alone with this youth. Young peasant, you can proceed with your cure. Recollect, torture and death are the rewards of failure!"

Arung set his teeth hard and thought of Nourmahal. "I remember," he murmured.

Arung as he pulled at the royal tooth. His trembling wrist did not do its work so well as in the case of his father's tooth, for then no hideous death stared Arung in the face. However, all this came to an end, and so did this first royal dentistry. Arung's natural pluck and the memory of Nourmahal, nerved his arm, and at last he pulled the Grand Lama's tooth clear from the detaining jaw. At the same moment he unwisely removed the gag, which he had placed inside the Grand Lama's teeth. The long-deferred yell at last burst Pulled the Grand Lama's tooth clear from the detaining jaw.

The Grand Lama was bound hand and foot, and before the monarch could cry out, Arung had securely gagged his imperial master, placing the gag inside the divine gums. Then began the dangerous experiment. His majesty, the moment he felt the first twinges of tooth pulling, tried madly to burst his bonds. His imperial countenance was a horrible picture of strong rage and pain. If his mouth were but ungagged he would have uttered yells loud enough to bring every guard in the palace to the spot. But Arung's foresight had settled that!

It would be impossible to describe the fear of poor forth, followed by another and another. The Lama had not as yet realised the situation. He still, in imagination, felt the awful grinding pains of tooth-pulling.

Instantly the hall was full of guards and courtiers, the Vizier and Nourmahal among the rest. One look was sufficient. They beheld their ruler bound upon the floor, his imperial lips flowing with his divine blood!

With one accord they rushed upon the young shepherd.

"Divine Individuality," cried the kneeling Vizier, "to what death shall we doom this man?"

Digitized by Google

"Roast him alive!" spluttered the half-suffocated Grand Lama.

* * * * *

The baleful fire burnt in the square of the temple. Pale and haggard, the victim—Arung, son of Zebe—was standing by the lambent flames. The Grand Vizier was making ready to give the signal for the holocaust.

But the signal never came!

A breathless maiden, with streaming robes, leapt into the crowd, waving over her dusky ringlets the sacred parchment which none but the Grand Lama might use. It was a message from the palace!

The Vizier stayed his signal, and stretched forth his hand for the parchment. The girl advanced and delivered it into his hand. And Arung saw that the bearer of the message was none other than Nourmahal, his beloved.

Then the Vizier cleared his throat, and read aloud:

"To my worthy servant and Vizier, greeting—Thou hast been too hasty with the young peasant. For lo! I have recovered from the pain he occasioned unto me, and the racking toothache, sent by the demons, has entirely departed. Wherefore, let this youth go free. Conduct him before me, and I shall give him the reward which is his due."

The chains were thrown from Arung's limbs. He was free! Then, with shouting and beating of drums, he was led before the Grand Lama, who sat, with a white cloth tied about his jaw, on his throne of cedar-wood and gold.

"Arung, son of Zebe," said His Divine Individuality, "thou hast fulfilled all that thou didst promise. Therefore, I proclaim thee governor of my northern provinces, and command my Viziers to bestow upon thee great wealth of flocks and gold. Also I give unto thee my former favourite, Nourmahal, the fairest of the fair. I have been long thinking of getting another favourite, and this will be an amazingly good opportunity. I have spoken."

And so Arung, the son of Zebe, became a very great man, and was the father of all the tooth-pullers from that day even unto this. Ever afterwards he could, metaphorically, wind the Grand Lama round his finger.

JUMBLED STORY NO. 6.]

THE FACT OF AN OLD MEEPOREGO VOW.

"OUR love is perfect, if ever love was," the man of our gurgling stream went splashing down at the foot of the black shoes and stockings which tried so hard to whistled to each other in the trees, while the swallows whispered sweet words to each other, and talked of the magnificent dress which a woman, who was standing behind her, she went hastily down the steps, and hailing their dingy lodgings early in the morning, and walking down from a cloudless sky, as they left the little way-side shabby coat.

The world seemed very happy that day. The sun was restrained himself, and then the girl, in all her finery, drove to an hotel, and it was not until she sank down in champagne, and with this they each pledged the health three days later.

And now their last day together had come. They left an easy chair, after having finished a sumptuous lunch, and unstrapping the small luncheon basket that they never love a man like that. How rugged looking he was!" Here she ordered an extravagant outfit. After that she pulled at the rake, while the regular "click" of the station, and went to the fields. They walked on the newly-cut, sun-browned hay. They turned it over with their feet, "but it is not the same man. My boy was tall and pale, and every now and again the tears sprang into the carriage.

Looking up the streamers, she found that there was the sweet-scented meadows. Then, when they grew five years I have yearned for this time. Sleeping and tired, they turned aside into a wooded, green-grassed flush on her cheeks, and tears in her eyes as she gazed down on the worn-out little hat that he loved so well, on the girl packed up. The man stood above her, looking very happy, these two, but now the Great Wheel of Fate beneath.

"MY DARLING LITTLE GIRL,—All is ready, every-story would say to the girl a hundred times. She would remember when we worked together in that dingy ware-shining so brightly, the birds sang so merrily, and gently stroke and fondle them.

Afterwards they washed the plates in the stream, and nestle closer to him, and he would take her in his arms, and a sweet scent came up from the fresh, green grass had turned its ugly side towards them, and they must look bright and new. The girl knew that his loving, paper, and, going to the door, called loudly for her land-side, she stooped hastily down to collect them. She of the other, for joy, and happiness, and good luck.

They did not say much; only the man's face was very sinking at his heart, and presently saw her enter a machine, as the hay dropped down in bundles from it, and the love would shine from her eyes. They had been very happy. But we shall be a thousand times happier waking I have thought of nothing but you. And now swept past him. He followed slowly, with a strange Black City, down into the green country. It was a figure. It was absurd of him to have supposed that she came floating over the hedge.

P.S.—Notes inclosed.

"Hasty boy," she said, "how eager he his."

So the man went away.

When the packing was finished they sat down over the page, and settled to take a boat which went home for his love. She was to stay behind and wait for one which left for America the next day. She turned to the station, they took a train away from the Great thing is prepared for you, come out to me at once. At lovely day early in July; the sun was shining brightly soft soil, and where rocks were to be found, and where a earnest glance was resting upon her, and there was a back, and called to the driver to proceed.

Thus they wandered about the live-long morning in the shabby coat and the faded skirt, and on the little girl's eyes. Occasionally their hands would seek each clean shaven and straight as an arrow. Bah! I could met his but she did not appear to notice him. The man would have come out in the little worn hat, and the girl's soft fingers in his own great, strong ones and flew about in graceful curves, twittering playfully. In the water, there to earn fame and wealth, and to make a little valley. Here they found a shady resting place, that she thought of her lover's letter. She read it the splashing stream, they made their vows. They fluttered down on the floor. Putting the letter on one glen, where the tall pines grew straight out from the last I shall meet you again. Every moment of the past counted them up, and then she kissed the thin pieces of the time has come. I only want you—I would to heaven that she might keep the few belongings that she left him.

"It is something like him," she was saying to herself, together again, and there, beneath the waving trees, by her this letter. She opened it eagerly, and the notes was starving—I had not a penny in the world. But the next field a carter was calling to his horses as they sprang out at the door of a fashionable costumiers.

At that moment the girl turned round. Her eyes and stood before her.

He motioned the driver to stop, and then with renewed pretence of eating. They uncorked a small bottle of own Boy."

Five years later he wrote this letter:

"I must enjoy myself here, now that I have the part. The man was to go away to the great land across other in sympathy, and then the man would take the future. But these things are not for other ears.

The girl was sitting alone in a little room at the top house. How sad it all was, and yet, even then, we were up at the sad, handsome face above her.

Her lover on the other side of the Atlantic watched me, and then, as they say out here, 'I struck it rich.' So that I could have written before. Three weeks ago I was at his post as usual, his eye was attracted by the lady. She paid her bill, and, telling the good woman had brought, they spread out their feast, and made a forward—how well he knew every line of that face and this is a wonderful land, and my old luck came back to when I see you. I cannot write much now. Do you chance," she said to herself.

The girl looked at him for a moment, and then drew near, was wearing. Suddenly he started eagerly impatiently every liner that came in. One day, when he come out to me, at once, my darling, I will tell you all now, after these five long years of weary waiting.—Your hope, and with a smile on his face, he sprang on the step of a big tenement building when the postman brought a cab, drove rapidly away from the slums, and presently through, and then put it lightly on one side.

HIGH PLAY.

A COMEDY OFF THE STAGE.

By George Manville Fenn.

SUMMARY.

The story opens with an interview between Lady Braetoun and her son Roderick, in which she endeavours to induce him to give up fast living and marry Olive, Isaac Emsworth's heiress. After the interview he goes to see his racehorse in the country with Lucy Lee, a chorus girl, familiarly known as "Baby." Emsworth takes Olive to consult Dr. Murray, who advises a voyage to South Africa in the Greyberg, in which he also is going. Roderick, who is friendly with Murray, comes for advice on the terribly bad condition of his health, and the Doctor recommends a trip in the same boat.

CHAPTER VI.

Lady Braetoun Believes in Fate.

"Oh, Roderick, my darling, what have you been doing?"

"Doing, mother? Nothing. I don't know what you mean."

"I mean, why, of course, about Miss Emsworth. You have ruined everything. You foolish, rakish young fellow, you think that you understand women, and so you do, perhaps, those of a certain set; but when some sweet, genuine, innocent girl is in the question, you are perfect babies."

"Oh, I dare say," said Braetoun sarcastically, "but don't bother me with conundrums, please; I'm too unwell to be trying to guess them."

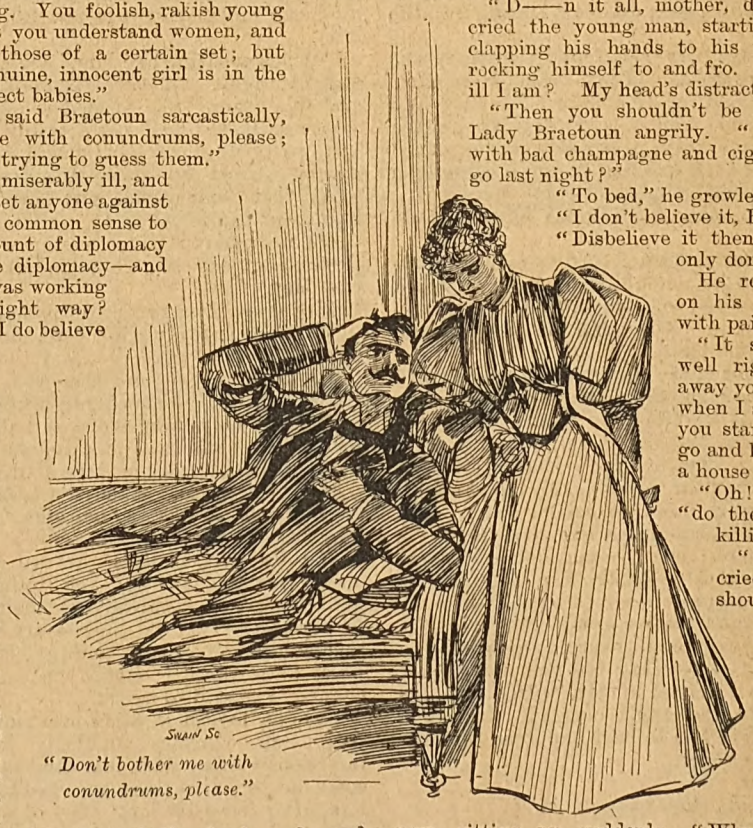
"Yes, you do look miserably ill, and it would be enough to set anyone against you. Hadn't you the common sense to see that a certain amount of diplomacy was needed—feminine diplomacy—and that I, your mother, was working everything in the right way? Oh, you foolish boy! I do believe you have thrown a million away."

"Have I?" he said coolly; "well, I am very sorry. I want it badly enough."

"And might have had it for the asking—at the proper time, when I told you."

"Dear me!" said Braetoun contemptuously, as he turned his head impatiently on the couch, and made a gesture suggestive of weariness.

"Everything was working so well. He was asking my advice, and she was quite looking up to me as a mother full of wisdom who would guide her safely through the shoals, rocks, and quicksands of society."



"Don't bother me with conundrums, please."

"D——n society!" muttered the young man impatiently.

"Your foolish rashness, or some knowledge he must have picked up about you, has spoiled all. What have you been doing?"

"Nothing—nothing new."

"Then it must be something of the old. Or did you go and speak to her?"

"No."

"Or to him?"

"No."

"Then he must have heard about that wretched theatre woman and——"

"D——n it all, mother, don't drive me mad," cried the young man, starting up on the couch, clapping his hands to his throbbing head, and rocking himself to and fro. "Can't you see how ill I am? My head's distracting."

"Then you shouldn't be so dissipated," cried Lady Braetoun angrily. "You poison yourself with bad champagne and cigars. Where did you go last night?"

"To bed," he growled.

"I don't believe it, Rod."

"Disbelieve it then: do what you like, only don't worry me."

He rested his head lower on his hands, and moaned with pain.

"It serves you perfectly well right. You've thrown away your fortune, and now, when I saw a chance to make you start afresh in life, you go and knock it all down like a house of cards."

"Oh!" groaned Braetoun, "do they hang a man for killing his mother?"

"I don't know," she cried bitterly; "try. I should be almost glad if you did kill me, Rod, for you broke my heart years ago."

"Bah!"

"How could you do it! You should have left it to me."

"Here, what the dickens are you talking about?" he cried now, sitting up suddenly. "What million—what him—what her? Are you telling me all this, or am I mad and is it some confused dream? My head's jigging, and my brain reeling: that cursed stuff has half poisoned me."

"Then you shouldn't have taken it, you miserable boy."

"I was obliged to," he groaned. "Go and get the bottle and give me some more. Perhaps I shall be better then. It must be right."

"It isn't right, Rod, and before I'd get the wretched stuff and give you any more, I'd see my poor arm drop off."

"Drop—drop," he said drowsily, and looking at her with a vacant stare. "Yes, another drop."

"I will not, Roderick, not a drop!"

"Must—must take it. Go and fetch the bottle—in my bedroom."

"Brandy, I suppose," said Lady Braetoun angrily. "Never! Oh, how could I ever have given birth to such a monster! Roderick, you are killing yourself."

"Eh? Kill myself?" he said, staring as if making an effort to grasp his mother's words.

"Yes, killing yourself."

"No: my last chance, old lady. Must have another try. Think better now. I suppose it's right. Must have some more, go and get it. On the dressing-table."

"No," cried Lady Braetoun passionately; "not a drop do you have if I can prevent it. You're drifting into a lunatic asylum."

"I wish I was in one, for I'm nearly mad now. Fetch it. Does dull the pain a bit. Must be right."

"Roderick, you have got to the worst stage in which a man can be. You went yesterday and overset all my plans; and now in your foolish despair you are intoxicating yourself with brandy."

"Brandy?"

"Yes, sir, brandy, and in your bedroom, too."

"Brandy—brandy——" he said, passing his hands over his forehead, and staring vacantly about the carpet. "Head's gone—can't think. Ah, there it comes back! It's agony. Quick, fetch it before I go off. Little bottle—on dressing-table—teaspoonful?"

"Roderick! what do you mean?" cried Lady Braetoun, looking at him excitedly. "Where did you go yesterday?"

"Eh?" he said vacantly, as he struggled up once more, and as if striving to follow what was said to him. "Go—yes'day? Dunno."

"You went to Mr. Emsworth's did you not? Look here."

She tapped a letter which she held in her hand. "It's all an excuse. Thanks me for my kindness to his child, and he is going to take her over to Africa."

"Is he?" said Braetoun.

"Yes: all an excuse. He has grown suspicious, and has set us down for fortune hunters. Just like a man of his class. When did you go?"

"Yes'day," said Braetoun vacantly. "Said he'd give me one more chance."

"Oh! Then there is hope yet," cried Lady Braetoun eagerly.

"Yes: s'pose so. Just a little. That stuff pulls me together for a bit, and then it comes on again."

"But what madness to fly to brandy now!"

"No, no; drops."

"Well, drops. Just when he has told you he would give you another chance."

"Yes—said, take them. Going to turn over new leaf."

"Well, well, then do. Oh, my boy, don't, don't, pray, throw away your prospects like this."

"D'y'ear? Get it," he said thickly. "Teaspoon—in glass o' water, be quick!"

"Rod, what does this mean?—drops—what drops?"

"Murray—gave me—yes'day," he groaned. "Sends me—sleep."

"Murray? Doctor Murray?"

"Umps! Give's hold."

"You went to Doctor Murray yesterday?"

He sat up and stared.

His mother caught him by the shoulders excitedly. "Was this before or after you went to Mr. Emsworth's?"

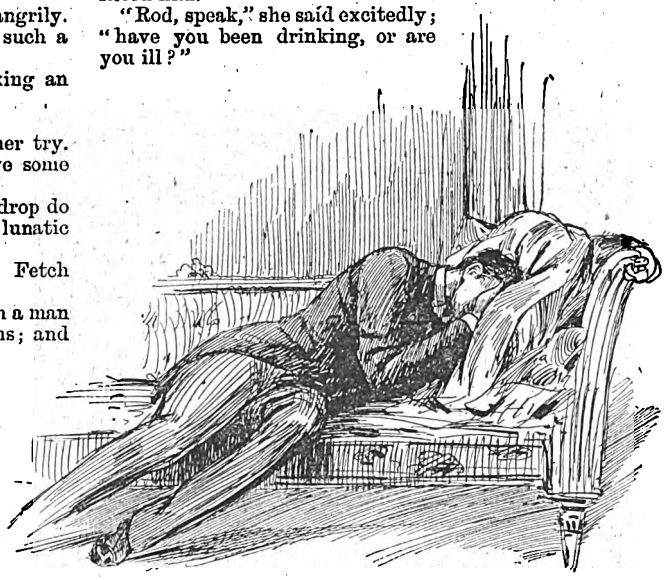
"Emsworth's? Dunno. Yes. Didn't go to Emsworth's. Saw him at Wimpole Street. Be quick 'fore pain comes back."

"Then you did not go to Mr. Emsworth's and propose to Olive?"

"Eh? No."

He held out his hand as if for a glass, and Lady Braetoun shook him.

"Rod, speak," she said excitedly; "have you been drinking, or are you ill?"



He sank sideways until his head touched the cushions.

"D——d bad—ill," he said. "Murray—says—killing myself."

"Yes, yes, quite right. Go on."

"No, no," he said in a dull, stupid way, as he struggled to grasp his mother's meaning; "not quite right—quite wrong. Going to South Africa."

"It's drink, and he's utterly intoxicated," cried Lady Braetoun wildly.

"Off directly—South Africa, with Doctor—old Bourne. Pull me round."

"You are going to South Africa—with the Doctor?"

"Yes. Last chance. Pull me round. Get the bottle?"

Lady Braetoun backed from him, looking bewildered, and stood wringing her hands till the diamonds upon her fingers gritted together and crackled. Then, as if moved by a sudden impulse, she rushed out of the room, leaving her son rocking himself to and fro upon the couch.

In two minutes she was back, with a bottle and glass in her trembling hands. Then, reading the directions, she shook the phial, poured out a portion, and pressed it in her son's hands.

"There," she said; "take it. Quick!"

He mechanically took the glass, swallowed the little dose at a gulp, and uttered a sign of contentment, while his mother stood watching him for a few minutes.

"Tell me, Rod, dear," she said, in a low, agitated voice, "did you go and propose to Miss Emsworth yesterday?"

"Eh?"

She repeated her question, and he grasped it this time.

"No," he said, "too bad. 'Bliged to go to Murray. Sea voyage. Set me up. Head buzzes. Yes, sea voyage with old—Cape."

"Oh!" ejaculated Lady Braetoun softly, as she gazed wonderingly at her son, who was staring vacantly about the floor, and then she hurriedly read the letter once more. "Then it is true. No, he must have heard something to set him against us." Then aloud:

"Rod, dear."

"Eh?" said the young man, starting. "Was I asleep?"

"No, dear. Is your head better?"

"Eh? Just a little. Going off now."

"When are you going?"

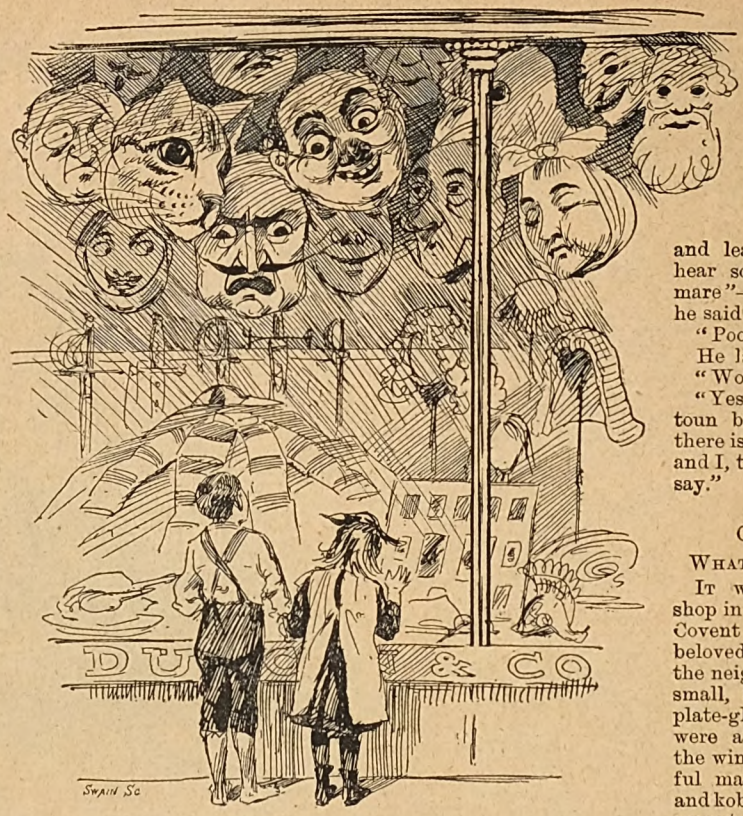
"To-morrow—next day."

"In what vessel, dear?" said Lady Braetoun, after another glance at the letter.

"Same as old Bourne and the Doctor. Greybourne—Grey—Grey—Grey——"

"Berg? Greyberg, dear?"

"Yes, Greyberg. Pull me together. Get better. Come back and ask old Emsworth. Get married, and be a good boy, eh?"



A showy-looking shop in Great Russell Street.

He sank sideways until his head touched the cushions, and, uttering a low sigh, he seemed to drop off directly into a deep sleep, while his mother drew a chair to the side of the couch, sat down and read the letter again, and then uttered a long deep sigh as she tightened her lips and nodded her head softly.

After a time she rang the bell, and a footman appeared.

"Order the carriage to come round at once, Robert."

"Yes, my lady," said the man, with a glance at the couch.

"His lordship is very unwell, Robert."

"Yes, my lady, been quite off his head two or three times, but he went to the doctor yesterday."

"Indeed, how do you know?"

"Sent me to Bell's to get a prescription made up, my lady, and I gave him a dose when I got back. Out of that bottle, my lady. Beg pardon, my lady."

"Yes: what is it?"

"I've been packing his things, my lady, three portmanteaus. But will he be well enough to go on Friday?"

"Oh yes, Robert. It is only a temporary indisposition. That will do."

The man left the room, and Lady Braetoun sat musing for a few minutes.

"I'll go on and bid him good-bye," she thought. "No, I'll write. Perhaps better. I should talk about the voyage, and they might not know. How delightful it is," she said to herself bitterly, "this tender affection between mother and son. Drawn tightly together in such loving bonds. Going to South Africa on Friday, and the mother has to learn it all from one of the servants. I am sorry," she said half aloud, "very sorry, that I did not have three or four more sons."

She carefully folded the letter and placed it in a writing-case, before ringing again and countermanding the carriage.

"A false alarm. My heart throbs even yet. How strange! Is there really such an influence as Fate?"

She started, for Braetoun began muttering, and she went and leant over his couch to hear something about "the mare"—"the odds," and then he said quite distinctly:

"Poor little Luce."

He laughed softly.

"Wonder what she'll say."

"Yes," sighed Lady Braetoun bitterly. "I'm afraid there is such a thing as Fate; and I, too, wonder what she'll say."

CHAPTER VII.

What Came to Lucy Lee.

It was a showy-looking shop in Great Russell Street, Covent Garden, one dearly beloved by the children of the neighbourhood, great and small, for, behind the tall plate-glass windows there were attractions galore. In the winter there were wonderful masks: demons, gnomes, and kobolds, and gauzy fabrics appertaining to fairyland—stage—diaphanous creations, spangled with silver, great dragonfly-like wings, wands tipped with stars, and golden tresses and curls hung so abundantly that they suggested that one of the horned demons with fiery eyes had been on a scalping expedition in fairyland and had great luck.

At other times of the year there would be operatic knightly armour suitable for fair limbs, helmets and plumes; brilliant swords which might fail in cutting the leaves of a book, but, deftly used, certainly good enough of edge to divide a ripe pear. Fleshings of silk or tinted thread, velvet, spangles, and lace bottines with satin or kid heels, and gloves and gauntlets glittering with metal of wondrous sheen.

"Duncan and Co," was to be read in gold letters on plate glass with a chocolate ground, and a merry trade had been carried on there for years, in supplying costumes for opera, ballet, pantomime, and burlesque. In fact, it might have been supposed that in a small way, Duncan would have made a large fortune; and so he would if success had attended all the productions for which costumes had been supplied, but as, at a moderate computation, about nineteen out of every score were blighted by what in theatrical parlance is called "a frost," the fortune was not made.

In fact, it would not have been of much advantage to Duncan if there had only been an average of one frost to the score of new pieces, for that worthy gentleman took matters very easily, and strong drinks with the same facility. So many good-hearted theatrical friends insisted upon his "taking a drink," with them, that his works, which were made by Nature more especially for the consumption of solids, refused at last to go. Then he did an enormous amount of winding up with stronger and stronger draughts: in fact at last it was rumoured that when he called for "Brandy hot" he meant brandy hot, and not an infusion of Sp. 1. Finally the works stopped, and the business went on.

Mrs. Duncan, a rather florid lady, had always looked upon herself as "Co," and while her lord took the orders, had done all the work, personally or by deputy, so that there was no check in the business.

A new burlesque was in preparation at the Thespis, and specimens of the work being done by hand and machine by Mrs. Duncan and the young ladies lay about on the back room tables and chairs, in the shape of amber satin jockey shirts, and amber and black caps, drawers, breeches, and black and cream satin top boots. For there was to be a jockey ballet in the second act, and Lucy had suggested that they should wear Lord Braetoun's racing colours.

"And so," Mrs. Duncan said, "the corpse will be in hamber," without for a moment recalling the position of the geological fly.

Duncan and Co. had been very busy with her scissors, and one of the completed costumes was on view, to the great satisfaction of a knot of dirty children, whose proceedings in their excitement became so demonstrative, displayed as it was in holding up "Little Sally," or "Betsy Hann," to see, that at last Mrs. Duncan could bear it no longer, but sallied out to scatter her enemies—to put the objectionable audience to rout.

"Here, what's the use o' my having that there window cleaned for you to come putting your nasty 'ands-an' noses all over it again? Be off or I'll send for the perlice. They're close by, you know."

The children were aware of the fact, for it is not a long cry from Great Russell Street to that of Bow, so they took flight in the direction of Drury Lane, darted down a court, and the most daring of them shouted "Yah!"

"I dunno what we pay rates for," grumbled Mrs. Duncan. "The place swarms with the brats, an' it oughter be stopped, and—well, now, on'y to think of it, and me not in my best cap! Bless her! She don't forget her old aunt, even if she have got her brome and her dymons."

The lady drew back inside the shop door, and directly after the particularly neat brougham with high stepping horse, driven by a severe-looking servant in livery, drew up at the kerb, the door was opened, and Lucy Lee, otherwise "Baby" stepped out, "looking like a Dooshess," Mrs. Duncan afterwards said, the door was closed, and the little lady turned to the servant.

"Wait," she said shortly.

The man touched his hat, and sat staring straight before him, while Lucy swept with rustling skirts into the shop, whose door was immediately closed by its owner, as if it were a trap, and she had just taken an unwary bird, one which she folded immediately in her arms.

"My own precious!" she cried, after bestowing a couple of sounding kisses upon her visitor's lips. "My! you do look lovely this morning, Baby."

"Lovely?" said the girl bitterly. "After crying my eyes nearly out of my head. Oh, auntie!"

"What is it, my precious? Here, stop a moment, and I'll send the gals upstairs."

Mrs. Duncan passed through a glass door, closing it after her, and voices were heard. A minute later, she reappeared, to stand waving one arm to her visitor in the fashion always adopted by legitimate Hamlet's ghosts, and Baby stepped into the back room, dropped into a chair, and laid her hands upon the work-encumbered table, her head sank upon them, and she began to sob hysterically.

"Oh, my precious lamb! Don't, don't take on like that. What is the matter? Tell its Auntie, then. Why, Lu, my girl, you don't mean it? He arn't come back from the voyage? He ain't dead, is he?"

The girl started up with her face convulsed, and her eyes flashing with indignant rage.

"No," she cried, "he isn't dead. He has come back quite well."

"And that's a comfort, my dear."

"Comfort!" cried the girl contemptuously. "Not it. I wish he was dead."

"Nonsense, my dear; I see you've been having a tiff."

"Tiff!" cried Lucy scornfully.

"Why, he 'aven't dared to 'it you, 'ave he?"

Lucy shook her head, and tried to speak, but for a time no words would come; and at last as her Aunt bent over her, she uttered a bitter cry, flung her arms about the ordinary looking woman's neck, buried her face in her breast, and sobbed passionately.

"My own precious, then! There, there, there, there; let it come, and you'll be better soon. There, try and tell its Auntie what it's all about. Mind, pet; this is such a pretty bonnet; and take care, too, of your lace. Oh, come, come, come, you mustn't spoil those bright eyes. Where's its ankychy then? Let me wipe 'em. Ah, that's better."

"Oh, oh, oh," sobbed Lucy wearily, as she turned her pitiful face slowly upward, and joined her little red petal-like lips to those reaching down to kiss her lovingly. "Oh, Auntie, Auntie, I'm the most unhappy, miserable girl in the world."

"No, no, no; don't say that, precious. You're the most beautiful; and look at you with your carriage and jools and dresses, and all real, my darling. No property dymons and rubbish. Tell me, then, what it's all been about? I know, you've been spending too much money, you naughty puss, and he don't like it, of course."

"No, no, it isn't that," said the girl piteously; "it's far, far worse."

"Nonsense, my dear, don't be absurd. I know; it's only a bit of a quarrel."

"Quarrel! no," moaned Lucy. "I never could quarrel with him. Auntie, it's all over now. I couldn't believe it of him."

"Over? Why, you don't mean to say as he's chucked you?"

The girl gave a quick, short nod.

"Well, of all!" exclaimed Mrs. Duncan. "But there, I'm not surprised. It was sure to come about some time. I always knew it."

"Oh, Auntie," cried the girl indignantly; "how can you talk like that! You always said I was a lucky girl, for he loved me very dearly, and would never leave me."

"Did I, my precious?"

"Yes, you know you did."

"Ah, well, perhaps I did. It was to please you, I suppose. But there, don't take on, it'll all come right in the end."

"Come right! How can it? He's going to be married!"

"Is he, now, my dear? You don't say so? Who's he going to marry?"

"A Miss Emsworth."

"Money?"

"Oh, yes, rich as rich."

"That's it, my dear. I was right then. He'd never have chucked you over if it hadn't been for that. They say he has lost a deal lately over horses. They nearly all do."

"Lost?" said Lucy naïvely; "has he?"

"Heaps they say. Why you ought to know."

"No," said the girl, wiping her eyes; "I don't know anything about it. How should I? I only had what I wanted. I never troubled about money."

"Of course not, my precious; why should you? No theaytre lidy as respected herself would ever trouble about money—but there, there, there, wipe your precious, pretty eyes, and don't fret about it. Men's all alike, and there isn't one on 'em now your uncle's dead worth a second thought."

"But I can't help it, Auntie, I love him ever so, I never knew how much I loved him till now."

"Stuff, little goose! There, you'll think different to-morrow. You're faint with fretting, and low-spirited now. You want a snack, my pretty, that's what you want. There, wipe your eyes, and I'll send one of the gals to order a couple of dozen oysters and a bottle of stout."

Digitized by Google

"No, no, no, Auntie. I don't want anything of the kind."

"Oh yes you do, and so do I."

"Yes, you're always wanting stout and oysters, Auntie," said the girl bitterly.

"Well, my precious, one must have some support to make up for the wear and tear. You don't know what I suffer over the business, and the losses and worries. Always somebody going wrong and can't pay. If your poor dear uncle had only been ruled by me, he'd have put everything in a pub with a good luncheon bar. There's no sending in your bill ten times there, and then only getting something on account. It's all pay down cash over the counter, and no book-keeping to put straight. Now, do let me send for a snack."

"No, no, no, Auntie!"

"All cash, my dear, and the profits are grand. Is she very good-looking?"

"Eh? Oh, she! Yes, Auntie, I suppose so."

Mrs. Duncan gave the table a loud slap with her open hand, and drew herself up very stiffly—that is, as stiffly as such a plump-looking woman could.

"Don't tell me," she cried angrily, "she can't be one half so pretty as you are, my precious, and so I'd tell her, to her face, as soon as look at her."

Lucy's forehead wrinkled all over, and she looked half piteously, half lovingly, at the flushed, coarse woman before her.

"Poor, dear, silly old Aunt," she said; and she reached forward and kissed her.

"That I'm not, my precious," cried the woman returning the kiss with interest. "There isn't a prettier, nor nicer, nor more loveable little pet in London, and I'll be bound to say, if the truth's known, it nips him ever so, to part with you. What did he say?"

"Not much," said the girl sadly. "Said he was ruined and couldn't afford it any longer, and that I must go."

"Did he tell you hisself that he was going to be married?"

"Yes, he told me all very nicely, Auntie. He said his mother wished it, and he was obliged, for the sake of the family name."

"Then you didn't quarrel?"

"Oh, no, Auntie. I said some nasty things, but he was very nice and kind."

"Pore boy. He's very sorry, and no wonder. And is it quite all over? Bailiffs in?"

"Bailiffs, Auntie?"

"Yes, at Brompton. Have they seized, and going to be a sale?"

"Wait," she said shortly.

"Oh, no, Auntie. Rod told me the house and furniture and the brougham and horse were mine; and he has put five hundred pounds in the bank for me, he says."

"Pore dear boy. Well, I always liked him. I call it very nice and handsome of him, my dear, and I don't think you've got anything whatever to fret about, for of course you keep your jools."

"Oh, Auntie, Auntie!" cried the girl desperately, "you don't know—you don't know;" and she let her face fall in her hands, and sobbed convulsively.

"Yes, I do, my darling, and so will you, some day. I've had plenty of experience, and know what's what. I call it very handsome of him. But five 'underd ain't much. You ought to have screwed him up to a thou, somehows."

"Oh, Auntie, Auntie, how can you—how can you?"

"There, there, there, my pet, you leave it all to me. Wipe your pretty eyes. I'll settle it all for you. The sooner you come home the better, and I'll have the furniture and horse and carriage sold at once, and pay off the servants. I can soon get that pretty little house let, and you'd better put the money in the business. It will be safe."

"Not a penny of it, Auntie," cried the girl, snatching off her veil. "Do you think I'd take the house or a penny of his money? I'd sooner starve!"

"Now, Louy, my own precious one," cried her aunt, "don't go on like that. You're not on the stage now, and this is real life, not drammer."

"Yes it is, Aunt, drama of life," cried the girl passionately.

"I thought all men were alike once, just as you said they were—fools with money to waste; but I know differently now. He made me love him, and I'm not ashamed to own it. I do love him, dearly, and I'll show him I do. Take his money or his presents and house? No, not so much as a ring. I'll come home and work with the girls here, and be no expense to you; but take anything of his? No, I'd sooner go off the bridge."

"Lucy!"

"Yes, but not yet," cried the girl, with a fierce look coming into her eyes. "If Rod thinks I'm going to sit down and suffer this, he's mistaken."

"Why, Lucy, my precious, what do you mean?"

"Mean, Auntie? Why to behave as a jealous woman would."

"But this ain't acting, my dear—it ain't a play."

"Isn't it, Aunt? Oh, yes it is, to me. Handsome and rich and to be his idol?" she cried bitterly. "No, it shall never be."

"Why, Lucy. What has come to you?" whispered the old woman.

"The Devil, I think, Auntie," cried the girl passionately. "I told Rod I would if anyone came between us, and I will."

"Now, now, now, Lucy, none of that," cried Mrs. Duncan, catching the girl in her arms; "no temper now. Don't you go talking and thinking of that sort of thing, or you may work yourself up in your passion and be going and doing it. But, there, you're only acting, and I don't want you to take the stage."

"No, Auntie, I hate the idea of the stage now. Let me stop with you."

"Of course, and lucky am I to 'ave you again, pet. But I meant about those things. You see, this isn't one of poor dear Tom Robertson's plays, my precious. You ain't a Hester Heccles, with a tipsy old father—and, oh! how true it all was, and how I have cried over it all!—but it's real life with your old Auntie."

"Yes, Aunt, dear."

"Then I wouldn't chuck all those things and that money out of spite, my darling, because it's a deal."

"You're always wanting stout and oysters, Auntie."

The blood flushed to the girl's pale face, and she sprang to her feet, with her eyes flashing.

"It isn't spite, Auntie," she cried. "I can't, I won't bring away a thing. I feel that I can't stoop to do it. I gave him all. I love him still, but I can't be paid and sent away like this. He mustn't think that of me."

"Very well, then, my precious, you shan't bring back nothing. I don't care. I don't want 'em; I was only thinking of you. Let him keep 'em and give 'em to his wife."

"Yes, let him give them to his wife," cried Lucy passionately; "and—to his wife—to his wife—his wife!"

THE BLEEDING ROSE

"Parbleu! The lady was in Paris three winters ago and broke several hearts, both French and English. I give you my word."

So said the Baron de la Sameraye in answer to a remark which fell from my lips in the smoking-room of the International Club, Boulevard Malesherbes, where the young bloods were discussing, far too freely, the beauties of the English colony in Paris.

I must confess that I was more than deeply interested in a certain Miss Alba Van Amster, whose quiet beauty heightened the cultivated talents and brilliant education that study had given her.

Having hazarded the belief that this was the young lady's first season in Paris, in answer to a question from Count Bodega, who did me the honour, as he fancied, by being jealous of my intimacy with the Van Amsters, the Baron had chimed in with the above assertion — an assertion which chilled not a little the reverence which had accompanied my worship of the beautiful Alba.

"If your intimacy admits of the question," added the loquacious Baron, "ask la belle demoiselle if she remembers New Year's Eve three years ago."

A hundred years ago a man with my pretensions to gallantry would take every opportunity to advertise his admiration for a woman; and it would have been my peremptory duty to put my hand on my sword hilt, and in no measured terms to force my critical friend to drink to the health of the immaculate and faultless beauty to whose affection I aspired.

Now, in this prosaic end of the century, the Baron's light chatter only gave me food for reflection, as I put on my astrachan and sauntered homeward.

Alba, with all her honest, outspoken ways, had a secret which she had not yet thought fit to share with me.

After all, knowing her sterling qualities as I did, and, though not an affianced suitor, still admitted by herself and mother into almost domestic relations, had I any right to question her on the past which could never, I was sure, have implicated her purity or trust?

I had only known Alba Van Amster for sixteen months, and the episode referred to had taken place, if there was no mistaken identity, just three years ago.

Anyhow, to-morrow, New Year's day, the Van Amsters gave a dance in their lovely hotel in the Avenue d'Eylau, and I certainly did not intend to refer to any past New Year's Eve without some very good reasons.

Three years to-night; and I wondered with a curious interest that only my intense devotion licensed, what could have made Alba so reticent about any former visit to Paris.

And, as my reflections grew more absorbing and the night grew colder, I found suddenly that instead of turning to the right and going back to my hotel in the Chaussée d'Antin I had wandered to the left, crossed the Elysian Fields, and was treading the crisp white snow not far from Alba's own house.

With the infatuation that holds a lover, I determined to see the window, if not the lights behind it, of the room where Alba slept. It was scarcely midnight. The stars were frostily brilliant, and a belated fiacre, coming from Passy, gave the only sound, and that but a faint tinkle of buckles and harness.

There was a light in Alba's window as I passed. Suddenly a wailing moan distinctly heard swept with a palpable breeze around my ears, and the white horse of the passing fiacre started like a two-year-old, and for an instant seemed terrified into a runaway.

A gruff objurgation from the coachman accompanied by a thump from the butt end of his broken whip brought the old hack to his senses, and dispelled by its matter-of-fact realism the sensation of uncanniness which the moaning sound had sent with a shiver through me.

As I turned again to look at Alba's window I saw that the light had been extinguished.

At that moment the window, opening like most French windows doorwise on to the balcony, flew ajar for an instant, but an icy breeze coming round the house banged it to, and swept the crisp snow off the sills in a wreath that looked almost like a human form as it flew past the railings.

Then the same wailing sound sent a second shiver through me, and I pulled up the collar of my coat, trying to close my ears with the fur.

At the next carrefour I found a fiacre which soon deposited me at the door of my hotel. On entering my room I sat down and piled up logs on the glowing embers, without a thought of going to bed. Sleep was impossible.

So Alba had some romance, but three years old, which she could not or would not tell me.

After all, her past did not belong to me, any more than mine to her. What? Was I to swear to love and cherish without a right to bare her heart? Could I see into her soul as far as this screen allowed and no farther?

And my thoughts would revert to the Baron's words at the club, and then my astral body travelled over the wrong road again to my Alba's window, and I heard again the mournful wail outside mine.

I don't know when I fell asleep. But I awoke chilly and shivering. The embers, choked with ashes, gave a feeble blush to the grate, and I crept into bed with that moaning sound in my ears, only to wake again when François brought my morning coffee to my bedside.

I knew the Baron always breakfasted about noon at the club, and, determined to worm some facts out of him I took a constitutional in the Champs Elysées before tackling the noble foreigner.

"Baron," said I, as we sat to a pilaff and some scrambled eggs, à l'Espagnole, "was there a duel in the case of Miss Van Amster when she was last seen in Paris?"

At this moment there came into the dining-room a tall, handsome man, of Spanish type, with flashing dark eyes and pale complexion, dressed to perfection, and with all the style of a military chief about him.

"Comment, mon cher Colonel?" cried the little Baron, jumping up and shaking the new-comer's hand affectionately. "What good wind blew you this way? It is three years since you gave Paris the pleasure of your presence."

Then, introducing me, the Baron forced the Colonel to sit down at our breakfast table. Colonel d'Espartello was a Basque, with all the fougue and Southern enthusiasm of his race. He had just returned from Africa, where he had lately received his rank.

"Apropos," said the chattering Baron, "you left Paris shortly after that unfortunate affair of Prévelle's. I suppose you know the lovely Mees Van Amster is again in Paris?"

"Not really!" replied the handsome Colonel, with a tinge of colour passing over his pale cheeks. "But I have overcome that infatuation long ago. Poor Prévelle! It was, indeed, an unfortunate affair. He was far more deeply in love than I was; that is quite certain."

I pulled up the collar of my coat.

The subject seemed unpleasant, and soon the young Colonel was entertaining us with his accounts of a new French acquisition in Africa, and how his gallant men behaved in the sanguinary skirmishes they had with the natives. And then he suddenly remembered an appointment. When he had left us, my friend, the Baron, rolling a cigarette in his fingers, said to me as he lighted his smoke:

"That is almost the answer to your question. Le beau colonel, just gone, was also one of the fair Alba's admirers. He was the Prince's second in his duel with Armand Prévelle. But you know nothing about the duel? Is it possible? Come for a stroll outside and I will tell you all about it.

"When the Van Amsters, mother and daughter, were last in Paris—there is a father living, I am creditably informed, wrapt up in stocks and buried in your Capel Court, for the better gilding of Miss Alba's dowry—Miss Van Amster was no less lovely than now, but without to-day's experience.

"Not only is Alba far the prettiest in the English colony, but speaking our language perfectly, and having the best Holland blood in her veins, she has been much sought after by Parisians of the highest standing.

"There was no doubt that she was as fond of Prévelle, the handsomest man in Paris, as he was devoted to her, until the arrival of Prince Kracovieff from Nice, where the girl had met the Russian the winter previous. The Muscovite needed funds and had a real title for sale, so that Prévelle soon found himself second favourite.

"Two or three nights before the new year Prévelle had given a superb bouquet to Miss Alba, who took the finest orchid in the bunch to adorn the Prince, and though the coquette tried to pacify the Parisian, he felt it badly.

"It was scarcely to be supposed that a Frenchman would take the affront coolly; and it was not long before an opportunity occurred at the club for a quarrel.

"Bref—Prévelle slapped the Prince's face, and a duel took place the day before le jour de l'an, just three years ago.

"You wonder, perhaps, how I know all these details. I was the other's témoin, and Prévelle died in my arms.

"They fought in the Bois de Boulogne with pistols.

"The first fire passed without injury to one or the other; but the second from the Russian would have gone through poor Prévelle's heart had it not been checked by an obstacle. Curiously enough when we looked to the wound we found a large rosebud had choked up the hole in his chest carried inward by the bullet.

"Prévelle never breathed again. All the hemorrhage was within: but the petals of the flower were stained with his life blood.

"Poor boy! He was buried with the flower in his heart.

"There was a great row about the affair. Kracovieff returned to Moscow, and the Van Amsters went back to England.

"Now you know why I told you to ask Miss Alba if she recalled the réveillon of three years ago. I confess I always feel bitter when I think of my poor friend's death. But after all, why should I try to give the girl he loved pain? I have no right to be the young lady's judge."

The story was true, no doubt, and yet I had found nothing coquettish about Alba Van Amster. She had been true and sincere in everything but the fact that she never spoke of a former stay in Paris.

That evening there was a dance at the Van Amsters', and naturally I was one of the first to arrive.

Alba was not by any means looking radiant. She was terribly pale, and her eyes were red at the edges of the lids, as if she had suffered from tears of illness.

I brought with me the choicest bouquet I could find at Delaunoy's and she was on the point of removing a yellow rose and giving it to me when the memory of that duel seemed to traverse both our brains. My gesture must have been treacherous, for her face grew hard and she said, as a tear came in each lovely eye:

"Then you have heard the story too?"

I could not reply for the moment, and with a deep sigh Alba took the rose, whose pale lemon-coloured petals were like wax, and placed it in the échancrure of her dress.

At the same instant a waltz struck up, and almost automatically we glided into the ballroom among the dozen couples already assembled.

Only once in the dance did my partner speak. She whispered:

"You won't think unkindly of me, will you? Oh! why—why did they let you know!"

After the waltz we went into a small conservatory near the mother's boudoir, and sat down on a Persian settee surrounded by ferns and smilax. She turned her face pleadingly to me and was about to speak, when she noticed my eyes riveted on the rose in her corsage.

The yellow petals had turned red.

She saw it, too; and, clutching spasmodically at the chiffon round her bosom, she suddenly gave a cry of mingled pain and fear, and fell in a faint upon the couch.

Fell in a faint upon the couch.

At the same time her grasp on the gauzy material, tearing it away, added to her sudden fall backwards, revealed just over her heart a mark like a splash of blood.

This was the reason then for her high dress.

But it must have been an eruption of late date, for a natal wine mark would have been visible with the décolletage she used to allow herself. Her cry brought her mother to my aid, and she was carried by her maids to her room still unconscious.

I stood still, staring at the rose which I held in my hand; but the blood stain seemed to fade from the petals, and when I reached home, without knowing how I left the ballroom, the flower was again yellow, though drooping. Strange, very strange!

On calling to inquire after Miss Van Amster's condition the next day, the butler, in the low pathetic voice which well trained servants use when there is dangerous illness or a death in the family, told me Miss Alba was not allowed to see anyone, but that the young lady had sent down a letter to be delivered to me personally if I called.

The letter was from Alba, and is reproduced:

"Dearest,—If I have never told you of the sad affair which three years ago changed me from a flighty coquette to a reasoning woman, it was for fear you, whose affections I cherish, should think me still the heartlessly selfish creature I was at that time.

"Now, when I know that my life is fast ebbing away—for my fainting spell of last night was only the precursor to an attack which is killing me faster than even my doctors imagine—I can tell you what no other must know while I live.

"And God knows, dear, I wanted to live for you and you only.

"Mother, who had put me in a convent for my education, always brought me up with the intention of selling my beauty for a title. I was allowed my own way in everything, and utter selfishness was the result, so that when I made my début in Paris, less than four years since, I expected as a right that every man should be at my feet who had any pretensions to taste or position.

"My girlish inclinations picked from out my circle of beaux a bright and cultured Frenchman, known on the Boulevard as the best-looking man in Paris. I don't think I knew what love meant; but Armand Prévelle danced well, played beautifully, and was generally attractive.

"At the same time Prince Kracovieff was encouraged by my mother, who little knew what a Russian prince was worth, but had strange hankerings after what she fancied a royal connection.

'How thoughtless I was, and how little accustomed to thinking of others, was well shown in the little incident which gave rise to a fatal duel. I had just given Armand the prettiest rose I could find in our conservatory when I took from his bouquet the blossom offered to the Prince, careless of the pain the act might give. I have never forgotten the broken-hearted look Armand gave me when he turned away and left the ballroom.

"I never saw him again alive.

"I say 'alive' for I saw him only two nights ago; and that is what you must know now.

"I have never had any belief in spirits revisiting the earth.

"I had in my fondness for you almost forgotten the past, except inasmuch as that sad experience had made me serious and introspective. You know, dear, I am no flirt.

"It was on New Year's Eve, and fatigued with our preparations for the dance of to-night—I am writing in bed, against orders, and it is not yet midnight—I had gone to my room rather earlier than I am accustomed.

"I was half undressed, and, having sent Fanchette to bed, I was examining my new ball dress, when I heard a sigh behind me.

"I turned, in doubt as to my senses, and there in the middle of the room stood Armand Prévelle, dressed in black, as he must no doubt have been the day of the duel.

"Though an icy shudder passed through me, I still had presence of mind sufficient to assure myself my senses were playing me false when, with the same look that I remembered, the phantom of Armand put his hand into his breast and drawing forth the yellow rose all dabbled with blood, he threw the blossom at my bosom. Then the lights went out, the window opened and shut with violence, and I remember no more. Finding myself, with daylight, lying on my bed, I imagined I had fallen asleep and dreamt the terrible dream.

"But, on looking at myself in the glass, what was my horror when I saw just over my heart the splash of crimson which nothing has removed.

"I shall go down to my grave with it still there. Of that there shall be no doubt.

"If that dream should come again, dearest, I shall surely die.

"And yet I had hoped for a beautiful, bright existence in your love. Oh! what have I done? Why did my mother make me lie to myself and all around me?

"It is close on midnight. Ah! If you were only near me to defend me. Icy, icy! As cold as death——"

When I called a second time the shutters were up. Alba Van Amster had dreamed again.

RESULT OF JUMBLE STORY COMPETITION.—NO. 3.

UNFORTUNATELY, the story in this instance appears to have been too simple for the majority of competitors, over four hundred of whom were absolutely correct. If the prizes were divided up among them, each would receive about sixpence. To select the neatest is impossible, for, as no mention was made of neat attempts in the conditions, no effort was made by competitors, and all the attempts sent in were equally moderately well put together, and there is nothing to choose between the best fifty. It has been decided, therefore, to send a silver-plated pencil-case to each of the successful competitors.

RESULT OF POST-CARD COMPETITION.—NO. 4.

THE guinea goes this week, for London, to Mrs. R. W. Bland, 29, Bridge Road, Hammersmith; and for the provinces to Mr. R. Lythgot, Broad Street, Bilston, S. Staffs. The letter turned upside down was "s," in the word this, line 50, col. 1.

POST-CARD COMPETITION.—No. 6.

IMPORTANT TO PROVINCIAL READERS.

A FEW words in this number have been purposely mis-spelt. A guinea is offered to the reader living within 100 miles of London who first points them out on the back of a post-card in the following order: Number of words (in large figures); the words themselves, with line, column, and page where each is found; name and address of sender. Do not include cover or serial stories in making your search. A guinea is also offered to readers living further than 100 miles from London.

SUMMARY.

Georgina Pluff is a governess in the employ of the Ravenscrofts. Her charge is Eva, daughter of Sir Reginald and Lady Ravenscroft. Sefton, the only son, is engaged to Lady Norah Cannington, whose father, hearing on good authority of Sir Reginald's impending ruin, compels his daughter to write a letter to Sefton, saying that the engagement must be broken off. Before the financial crash arrives, Sir Reginald commits suicide in his own grounds, and Sefton's cup of bitterness is filled by the arrival of Lady Norah's letter. Georgina Pluff is aware of the late Sir Reginald's past, and threatens to expose his misdeeds unless she is married to Sefton. After the wedding Georgina visits her wealthy cousin, John Pluff, a retired grocer, and impresses him with her social position. Lady Norah receives a visit from a friend of Sefton, Douglas Shirling, who gives expression to his opinion concerning her treatment of Sefton. Georgina goes to stop with Pluff at Queen's Gate House. Lady Norah becomes engaged to the Duke of Malvern, but at the cost of her own happiness. Sefton's mother and sister go to stop at Ermyn Way, and he joins them, where he discovers, through Sarah Shirling, that his wife has advertised for a paying guest. He returns home to demand an explanation.

CHAPTER XII.

The Fascinating Widow.

"I suppose it's something disagreeable?" said Lady Ravenscroft.

"Yes, extremely disagreeable for me. What on earth induced you to put that infernal advertisement in the Times? How dared you, Georgina?"

"Dared, indeed! A pretty word to use to your wife. What was the harm, pray? And how did you discover it related to Ravenscroft Park?"

She spoke in short, sharp, hissing accents.

"Never mind. I know that you had the audacity to contemplate such a step without consulting me."

"Certainly, and I contemplate it still. What objection have you to raise? If you consider the addition of a guest, on stated terms, infra dig, give me sufficient money to live in the style that I require, and have grown accustomed to at my cousin's house. You can't do this—so the best plan is to hold your tongue, and let me earn a few paltry hundreds as best I can."

There was a long silence.

"I suppose it is utterly futile to instil into your brain how lowering and impossible this suggestion is. But of one thing be sure, if you harbour any such person under my roof, I will sell Ravenscroft Park, and the whole estate over our heads, and have you and your boarders out of it the very same day. This is no idle threat, for once I am in earnest. You have tried me too far."

He stood looking at her with those terrible eyes of cold disdain, his face white and his lips set.

"You are behaving like a tyrant and a brute," replied Georgina. "You want to cow and frighten me."

"Oh, no," and a gentle look came into his drawn face; "I only intend to stop you from further destroying my home. You would have brought disgrace on it once; I married you to save that. We Ravenscrofts would die, and have died in generations past at the stake, for our family honour! I sometimes think their fate was happier than the one you allotted me. I often envy those martyred ancestors."

"Oh, hang the ancestors!" muttered Georgina; "I'm talking about 'paying guests.' Your remonstrance is a little late; I have already interviewed one lady who is dying to come, and have yet to hear from the President of the Sportswoman's Club."

"You will wait a long time for her answer," cried Sefton, with a low, sarcastic laugh.

"What do you know of it?"

Georgina advanced a step and listened while he told her curtly the story of Sarah Shirling.

"It was beastly of her," muttered Lady Ravenscroft, using a word she knew that Sefton particularly disliked.

"That was the reason I returned at once," continued Sefton, "to put a check on your folly."

"Which is not the sort of check I am accustomed to," she retorted, drawing John Pluff's from her pocket, and holding it out for her husband's inspection.

"Your pay," he said sneeringly, "for consorting with snobs."

"Why have you returned in such a vile temper? One would think I had committed an atrocious crime. I suppose it's that impoverished blue blood again that is rebelling against practical money making. I'm sick of it, Sefton; it has stood in my light too long."

"Yet you cared enough for it to marry me. You demanded my paupered name as your price, though you knew that by so doing you would mar my life. It is long since we have had some plain speaking. You may feign contempt, and try to trample on my pride, but in reality you know that for all the money which has fallen to John Pluff's share, you would not have me barter my birthright."

"Don't make too sure! I have tasted the luxury of wealth at Queen's Gate House, and though I should be sorry to have married anyone but a gentleman, what is your vaunted blue blood, after all?"

Sir Sefton answered without a moment's hesitation.

"One of those precious possessions which no man, no power on earth can rob me of."

There was a long silence, in which Georgina sank on the sofa and bit her nails.

Sefton crossed to the window, and stood moodily looking out at the gradually clouding sky.

"I suppose I must write to Mrs. Rathbone by to-night's post. I did not mean her to come, at any rate."

"Have you quite decided to drop the idea?" asked Sefton coldly. "Or is Ravenscroft Park to be sold?"

He certainly looked as if he meant it. Georgina thought she had never seen a face so like a demon's.

Her own grew sinister and dark.

"The place only brings bad luck, and yet I don't want to let it go. If—if—we were ever rich, it would be hard to find its equal again."

"We are not likely to be, unless you are expecting a legacy from John Pluff, who will more than probably outlive us both. I should not imagine you or I will 'enjoy' long lives! Perpetual friction is not conducive to very boisterous health."

He moved wearily towards the door. Georgina spoke:

"It is not worth fighting about, and I would rather starve here than be shut away in some pokey little place where the Ravenscrofts might as well be Smiths or Jones. At least, we can keep up a certain appearance."

As Sefton vanished from her sight an agonised spasm passed over Georgina's face.

"Leave Ravenscroft," she muttered, "God! it would be like tearing Reginald from my heart. The red flowers I planted over the spot where he fell, are they blooming now, waving their heads, the colour of his blood?"

She stretched out her hands wildly and beat the air.

"Reginald, dear Reginald, I will stay by you always!"

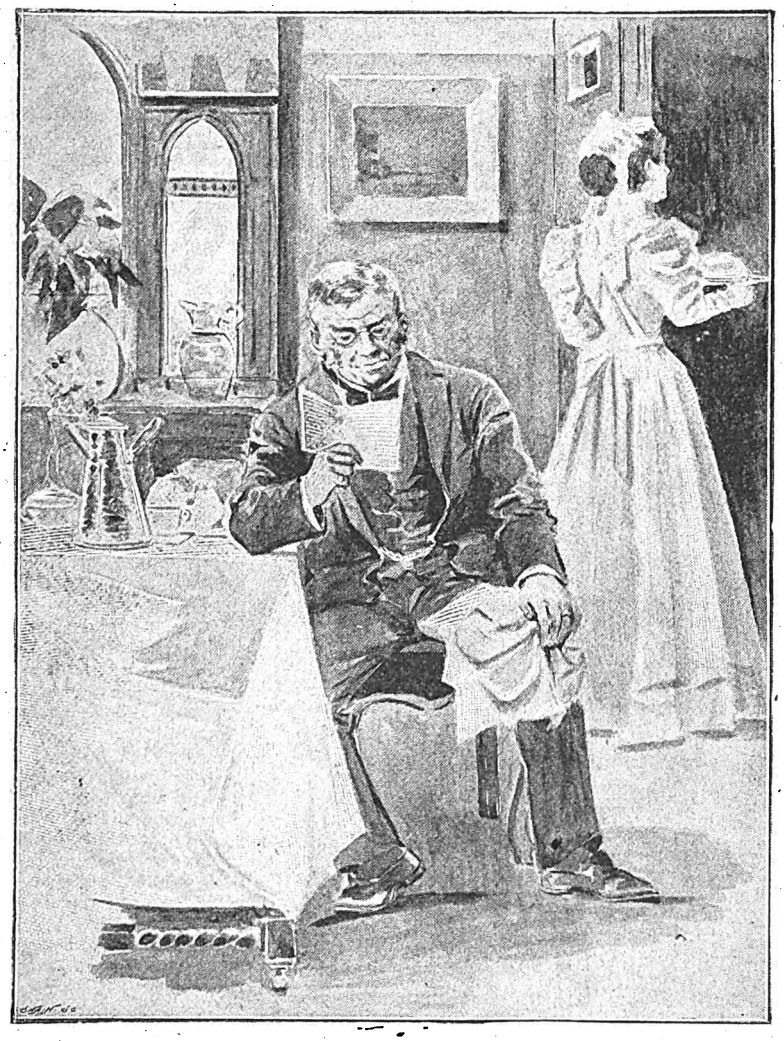
A strange contradiction, an erring mixture of love and hate, she paced her room battling with intense and varying passions.

It was nearly an hour later when she grew calm enough to write.

* * * * *

John Pluff was somewhat surprised a few mornings later to find a delicate note on his breakfast table, addressed in an unknown feminine hand. His heart beat high as he glanced at the signature: "Stella Rathbone."

It was a plaintive little letter, informing him that faithless Lady Ravenscroft had played her false, and would not let her go to Ravenscroft Park. It was a great blow, as she had considered the matter settled. It appeared so difficult to find an aristocratic family willing to accommodate her. Being a lonely widow she should be deeply grateful for Mr. Pluff's advice. Could he suggest anything, and would it be wise for her to advertise, if so, in what paper? She had lived so long abroad that she seemed quite to have lost touch with the old country since the decease of the Bottlemeads. Perhaps, if Mr. Pluff should happen to be driving in her direction that afternoon, he would look in for a chat at afternoon tea.



His heart beat high as he glanced at the signature.

"Nice woman, Mrs. Rathbone," he said, folding the scented paper and placing it in his waistcoat pocket. "Guess I'll find it convenient to drift in the direction of South Kensington this afternoon. She might like a turn in the Park. It is something to drive behind the best pair of chestnuts in London, and Mrs. Rathbone's stunning figure will draw attention to my turn-out, to say nothing of her hair. Poor Georgina! Those beautiful coils fairly upset her. But I need not tell her I've kept up with Mrs. R——. Ladies are so jealous of one another!"

He found the widow adorned for the occasion in a most fascinating costume of palest mauve. She clapped her hands playfully when he suggested a drive, and flew for a handful of violets she called a bonnet.

"This is so far nicer than my little hired Victoria," she vouchsafed as they rolled away.

"I'm happy to hear you say so," murmured Mr. Pluff, "and it's a treat to be seen alongside of you, Mrs. Rathbone," with a would-be attractive leer.

He kept his eyes well on the alert for friends or acquaintances. He wished to show the widow that he was a well-known figure in the Park, at the same time noticing that she bowed to no one.

Mrs. Humphery passed and smiled effusively, then to his joy he espied the Pynes seated en famille under the trees. The "dear boys" were staring vacantly before them, Nesta was talking to the young man from Gibraltar, while "Mr. and Mrs. P." rose and hastened to the rails to get a word with Mr. Pluff.

"Have you heard the news?" exclaimed Nesta's doting mother, waving her sunshade in the direction of the young couple. "Our dear daughter is to be married this autumn from our country house, 'Livonia.' I hope you will come and stay with us for the festivities."

Mr. Pluff replied brusquely he should be abroad, and pretended not to see Miss Pyne bowing somewhat shyly.

He felt relieved when the carriage moved on, and he could once more seek consolation in his close proximity to the violet bonnet and heliotrope drapery of Mrs. Rathbone's chiffons.

"I think, after all," sighed the widow contentedly, "I shall not bother about leaving town just yet. It seems a pity at the height of the season, though one can be as lonely in a crowd as anywhere. An afternoon such as this, in congenial society, tempts me to linger among the butterflies of fashion. You know, Mr. Pluff, I am a very simple little woman, and easily satisfied. I do not pant for wild excitement. Just a turn with you in the fresh air, a sight of pretty faces and gay attire, is enough to make my heart light, to set my pulses beating."

Her sweet, innocent words amazed Mr. Pluff.

"Well, then, you are very different to the run of people Mrs. R."

He invariably substituted the initial for the name. It was a sign of friendship and familiarity. Already John Pluff felt on excellent terms with his red-haired divinity.

She unfolded for his benefit some thrilling stories of her past, tales of adventure that occurred while she was travelling with the "dear General" through countless foreign lands.

What with shipwrecks, scenes of fire, burglaries, and battles, Mr. Pluff's hair stood on end.

"And yet," she murmured in conclusion, "I am the most domesticated, home-loving creature imaginable. That is my present sorrow—I have no home!"

Her eyes grew moistly pathetic, she really was thinking of the General.

"Poor dear!—poor soul!" muttered Mr. Pluff, gulping back his emotion. "It's hard to be left, and 'im such a gallant man, such a noble warrior!"

"But not so hard now that I have found a sympathetic friend," said Mrs. Rathbone, smiling through her tears—becoming dew-drops, since she had shown her wisdom by retaining them in the meshes of her eyelashes, not allowing them to fall and make rivulets through her poudre d'amour.

"She brings out all that is chivalrous in a man," thought John Pluff, marvelling at the tiny dimensions of Mrs. Rathbone's waist. "Nothin' advanced about her, by George! Just tender, womanly instincts, blended with almost unnatural courage."

As this mental verdict passed through his mind, Mrs. Rathbone gave a sharp scream and clutched his arm. A horse beside them had shied and struck against the carriage.

Reassured that no harm was done to herself or the animal, she laughed softly, and relaxed her grip of Mr. Pluff's coat sleeve.

"I was not very frightened, but a great number of vehicles always unnerve me."

When they parted, Mr. Pluff arranged when to call on the following day, and asked her if she were fond of French chocolates.

Mrs. Rathbone replied that "she could live on them."

John Pluff ordered a floral basket of exquisite bon-bons on his way home, to be sent immediately to her hotel, and stopped at a photographer's to arrange an hour for a sitting on the following day.

"And remember," he said to the man, "it's for a lady so don't you leave any pimples or nothink on the surface!"

That same evening Mrs. Humphery wrote a long effusion to Lady Ravenscroft, the point of which she reserved for her postscript: "By-the-way I forgot to tell you I saw Mr. Pluff to-day, driving in the Park with a most eccentric looking person. Can you imagine who she is? Wears a bright red wig to be seen a mile off, has rather fine eyes, and a figure that makes you positively ache to think of. They were talking animatedly, and your cousin appeared radiant."

The penning of these lines gave Mrs. Humphery infinite satisfaction.

She hoped she had scented a scandal, and was burning with curiosity to learn the name of "that Jezebel in mauve!"

CHAPTER XIII.

AN EXPLANATION.

MRS. HUMPHERY'S letter, with its alarming intelligence concerning John Pluff, so thoroughly upset Georgina that she was obliged to take to her bed.

The news had utterly prostrated her. She lay planning schemes for his rescue from the widow's clutches, occasionally dropping into a feverish sleep only to indulge terrible dreams of her cousin's courtship and marriage with Mrs. Rathbone.

But the chief sting lay in the thought that she, Georgina, had introduced them.

When her failing strength returned sufficiently to write, she penned two lengthy epistles, one to John Pluff and another to her new friend, Mrs. Humphery.

She thanked the latter sincerely for her "hint" about the lady with the red wig, and begged Mrs. Humphery to further acquaint her should she see that obtrusive person again in her cousin's society. "Dear John," she said, "is so easily led and has no one to watch over him but me. I fear he is getting entangled with a woman of doubtful character, and he is too precious a jewel to be wasted on one so utterly unworthy. She would only make his declining days a burden to him, and probably hasten his end by her neglect and frivolity."

The subject of the awful fate awaiting John Pluff, should he marry Mrs. Rathbone, opened a wide field for Georgina's imagination. She continued to describe her overwhelming feelings in forcible language, then congratulating herself on having written a wonderfully dramatic and touching letter; she addressed it to Mrs. Humphery, who she guessed would be no means loth to act as moral policeman in regard to this trying affair.

Like many of her sisters she loved a finger in other people's pies.

Then Georgina carefully worded a diplomatic appeal, begging cousin John to come and make a long stay at Ravenscroft Park.

"I feel I need your companionship," she wrote. "I am in the lowest spirits and the worst of health. A sight of your ever bright face, a spell of your effervescing and delightful society, will do me all the good in the world. The country is looking more beautiful than ever, and there are some especially attractive drives I have planned we shall take together, or should I be unable through failing strength to get about, Sefton will do his very best to entertain you. When we parted I thought you looked pale and in need of a change. London is stuffy, hot, and depressing. Come to Ravenscroft Park where flowers are blooming and breezes blowing. Here you will grow young again.—Yours (longing to be re-united), GEORGY."

It was the first time she had ever signed herself in a more familiar manner than Georgina Ravenscroft.

"The short name will please him," she murmured, folding the sheet.

Her stratagem however was destined to fail.

John answered by return that he was far too well employed in town to bother about breezes and blossoms just yet. He was sorry to hear she was ill, and would be glad to pay the expenses of a first-rate London doctor, if she cared to have one down.

Georgina gnashed her teeth, but replied she should be thankful to accept his offer, and would wire at once to Dr. Playford, whose fee was a hundred guineas.

Needless to say the money never reached the doctor, but as John Pluff didn't know, Georgina argued, her deception mattered not.

Sefton's spirits still flagged, perhaps because the news of Lady Norah's approaching wedding greeted him at every turn.

The papers were full of it, and the preparations commented on everywhere. Her picture, beside the Duke of Malvern, appeared in all the ladies' journals, which (either from spite or carelessness) Georgina left about for her husband to see. He read descriptions of Norah's beauty, comments on her daily life, anecdotes of her childhood, and articles upon her attire. He seemed saturated with the details, and as the fateful day grew nearer, her image haunted him unceasingly. He was torn with jealousy, distracted by the recollection of the love she had once bestowed on him, craving for past hours, while cursing those false kisses.

He grudged the brilliant future in store for her. She would sail gaily through life, with those laughing eyes and scornful lips, while he lay writhing on the shores of despair, too maimed and wounded to reach the glistening sea where her craft had drifted. He could only watch it from the distance, she happily resting on calm waters, while the quicksands of poverty sucked him down.

Congratulating herself.

Would she think to glance back as she basked in the sunny rays?

Perhaps, to pass an idle hour the Duchess of Malvern might pick her way carefully over the stony beach of time, and feel the last clutch of a convulsive hand, as his lost soul sank lower—lower—into the realms of death and darkness.

Wildly he yearned for one final sight of Norah Cannington before she changed her name. To hold her hand again, though it had dealt him so hard a blow, led him to a precipice, and then pushed his weak, frail spirit over the edge. His sensibilities were numbed. He had no anxiety for Georgina, though now that she was ill he would inquire after her from the nurse (who had come from London), and occasionally take flowers to her room.

He gathered a handful of red blossoms mechanically from the shrubbery, and carried them to her bedside.

She looked at the offering with horrified eyes as he laid it beside her.

"No, no; take those flowers away," she pleaded. "I can't bear to see them, and their sickly smell is like death."

She shuddered, hiding her face on the pillow.

Sefton picked up the nosegay and turned to the door, when a low cry recalled him. Georgina had raised herself on one elbow, and was holding out a thin hand eagerly.

"Bring them back," she murmured, pointing to the flowers.

He gave them to her in some surprise, watching her weak fingers close tenderly round their green stalks, while she pressed the petals to her lips.

"Bring them back," she murmured.

Then closing her eyes, she lay passively, holding the drooping bouquet to her heart, a smile upon her lips.

Sefton roamed about the garden restlessly. He felt as if a long walk would calm his thoughts and do him good.

He crossed the park, and went out into the country roads. On, on he strode, his feet unconsciously taking him in the direction of Rosemont.

He skirted Lord Cannington's woods, looking neither to the right nor to the left, till he woke, as it seemed, from a somnambulistic ramble, with a rude shock, to find himself facing the tall familiar iron gates.

He stared at them blankly a moment, before hurrying on. He had never passed through the Rosemont portals since Lady Norah wrote that fatal letter.

A step behind, a little hand pressed on his arm—a voice that thrilled the very fibres of his being—and oh! heavens—did his eyes deceive him?—Norah gazing into his face with parted lips, and tears upon her cheek!

He stood dazed and breathless, staring in mute wonder at the bewitching beauty of the woman he loved.

"Sefton," she whispered reproachfully, "you passed me without a word—a look!"

He glanced round, and saw that she was alone. Then, just as in old days, he clasped the little hand in both his, and pressed it to his lips. But even as he did so, he remembered the gulf between them, the bridge of her own making, and let the hand fall with a smothered groan.

The action had sent the blood into Norah's pale cheeks, her heart beat fearfully, she swayed as if she would fall.

The intervening space of time seemed to roll away. Surely they must be the same Norah, the same Sefton, that stood by the lake, watching their reflections in the water.

What of the governess in dull yellow, who dragged her skirt like a serpent's trail across the grass? What of Lady Ravenscroft? The remembrance of her brought Norah sharply to her senses. The pangs of jealousy revived.

"What is the matter?" she asked. "Why do you look so sad?"

"A needless question from your lips," he replied, still hungrily devouring her with his eyes.

"I don't see that," with a wistful puckering of her brow. "I am nothing to you now, you have your wife——"

The sudden change that rushed over Sefton's features withered Lady Norah's sentence.

"My wife!"

The words were muttered between his teeth, with a short laugh that was not pleasant to hear.

"Yes, you were not faithful long to the memory of our love!"

The rebuke was wrung from the girl against her will; she spoke almost involuntarily.

"You say our love. You played at caring for me till you tired of the game, and now you call your jest by that sacred name. Ah! Norah. Be true at least to yourself if you could not be loyal to me. You have made my life what it is—slain the good and left the wormwood—but, at least, spare me your mock reproaches."

Lady Norah breathed hard. The crimson died from her cheeks, the tears started afresh to her eyes.

"I ask one question only," she gasped. "If you had known that I still loved you, if you had known I loved you all along, would you have married Georgina Pluff?"

Swiftly the governess's terms and the threats they were to silence, passed through Sefton's mind. The family honour! What was it compared to Norah's love? His answer vibrated on the still air: "God knows I would sooner have died!"

A look of infinite relief stole over the girl's youthful face, the beauty of which even mental care could not mar.

"You have said enough. Now listen to my justification, for I must speak. You thought me false, fickle to the core, and small wonder. How could you tell that my heart was breaking, yearning for the love my father forced me to resign? I had not the strength to stand against him. I was weak and yielded under protest, not realising that when I wrote my final letter to you I was signing my own death warrant—the end of all my hope, my joy my life. Can't you pity me, Sefton, such a poor unstable creature, without nerve enough to fight either for myself or you? And then while I waited with faint fluttering hope, believing vaguely that in time it would 'come all right,' resolving to marry no one, and firmly convinced that while I was single, you would remain so too. A rumour of the new Lady Ravenscroft came like a thunderbolt. I had heard nothing of the wedding. Some people say you were married in a registry office. All I cared for and knew was that I must thrust you out of my heart for ever. But to separate you and your resting place was impossible. In my endeavour so to do I lost both. You went together and left me heartless—loveless—desolate!"

The words rose like a wail. She clasped her hands frantically.

"How can I believe this when you are to be married next week?"

"Oh, yes," shaking her head sadly. "I lay that at your door as well. Do you think it was nothing to me, the sight of your wife's triumphant eyes, when I passed her in the road with Victor, before our engagement. The look she gave me spurred me on, the thought that you had forgotten the past goaded me to accept him. Then there were my father's comments: 'Sefton did not care—he has not mourned you long!' They all told—each was a fresh grain, that grew and developed, planted on the waste ground that had once been my heart.

"Take care what you're saying, Norah. Is that true?"

He was close beside her, bending over the drooping head.

"Yes, on my word of honour, I swear it."

"Yet still you are going to marry the Duke?"

"How can I believe this when you are to be married next week."

"No," she replied. "I am not!"

So little had he expected this answer that words failed him. He only waited in silent surprise for her to continue.

"I have been weak and yielding long enough, at last I will be strong. You cannot comprehend what this resolve will cost me—I do not wish you to; but when you hear that the marriage between Lady Norah Cannington and the Duke of Malvern has been suddenly broken off within a week of the ceremony, then you can say: 'It was for the sake of our old love. Norah did that to clear herself in my eyes.'"

"No, no. I would not have you sacrifice yourself for me. You cannot live on the ashes of a dead passion. You will faint and starve existing on remembrance."

"My passion will not be dead," said Norah softly; "only hidden in my soul. After to-day, Sefton, we must never meet; but the recollection of this hour will salve the pain. To marry Victor now would be grossest sin. I did not know how strong and lasting love could be. Your presence has saved me just in time. Once, years ago, with childish curiosity, I asked an old French governess to inquire of 'Planchette' whom I should marry. The answer came, written in large letters across the page: 'Elle est virginale!'"

"Life is stranger than fiction," murmured Sefton. "To think that this chance meeting has altered the whole of your future."

"And yet to-day I am happier than I have been for a single hour since that terrible night."

"Then you never loved the Duke of Malvern?"

"No."

"God bless you, Norah, and thank Heaven for your deliverance! No torments of the accursed can be worse than the fate that befalls a man or woman walking with open eyes into loveless matrimony."

THE CYPHER.

During my sojourn in Dijon, I was on intimate terms with an eccentric individual named Eustache Loriot, a man of some forty years of age, fresh, ruddy, fair complexioned, rather stout, of medium height, a large head, with forehead unduly prominent, Socratic nose, and china-blue eyes.

He was deputy judge of the tribunal, but his duties leaving him considerable leisure, and being possessed of an independent fortune, he had early abandoned himself to a passion for bric-à-brac. His collection comprised a little of everything—rare books, medals, old china.

Although married, Eustache Loriot was childless. His wife was a pretty brunette of twenty-eight years, well made, lively, with a pair of dangerous dark eyes, and a light down on the upper lip.

Elegant, pleasure-loving, she found life extremely dull in the silent house in the Quartier des Grangettes, where her husband accumulated his treasure, and where no visitors were received excepting a few old antiquarians and a young lawyer, a friend of Loriot's, and, like him, an amateur in rare books. This celebrated advocate, Frederick Simonnet by name, was no more than thirty years of age, and passed for the head of the Dijon Bar.

He often came to borrow from Loriot's library, and the evening on which I had the pleasure of making his acquaintance, he had just brought back a fine copy of "Daphnis and Chloe," bound in red morocco.

"See," said Loriot proudly, handing the book to me, "here is a rare book that came from the library of M. des Armoises, a gentleman of Lorraine, who was imprisoned during the Terror, condemned to death, and whose mistress aided him to escape on the morning of the day fixed for his execution. I secured this book for almost nothing at the sale of the effects of the daughter of the very woman who saved Des Armoises."

I took the book and while turning the leaves, remarked a singular circumstance. Here and there, from page to page, whole lines were underscored with minute dots or hyphens, some in red ink, others in yellow ink, and having the appearance of age.

"Ah, this is curious," I murmured; "have you noticed this peculiarity in your copy?" I asked of Loriot, showing him the marked pages. At the same time, I raised my head and was struck by the uneasy, troubled expression of the lawyer's countenance. I turned towards Mme. Loriot and was astonished to see her pretty face reflect, as in a mirror, the confusion in Frederic Simonnet's.

"I attached no importance to it," responded the lawyer, reddening slightly.

"No importance?" cried Loriot, firing up; "for my part, I think there is an historical enigma there, a mysterious language to which I shall discover the key—you shall see, you shall see!"

Some eight days after I met Loriot, and, with characteristic impetuosity he seized me by the arm.

"My friend," he said. "I am on the track, and before long I shall discover the key! Here is what I have found so far" (at the same time drawing the copy of "Daphnis and Chloe" from his pocket). "In the first place," he continued, in opening the volume, "notice that the dots are always in yellow ink and the hyphens always in red ink. They seem to answer each other. Now, it is evident to me that Des Armoises kept this book in his prison, and his mistress visiting him there, sometimes took away, and sometimes returned the volume, so that with the aid of a cypher the two lovers used it as a means of correspondence. Ha! is not that an ingenious explanation? Only I have not yet discovered the key to the cypher, but with patience, I shall find it!"

"Will you lend me the book for a couple of days," I responded; "I have studied cypher language a little, and might be able to help you."

He consented, and I took the book home with me. It did not require any long study to discover the key, for the cypher used by the two correspondents was of the simplest. They had made use of the characters in the text, retaining their ordinary value, and it sufficed to place the marked letters side by side to reconstruct the sentences.

The first I deciphered was this:

"He goes to the tribunal to-morrow at two o'clock. Come, we shall not be disturbed"

To which the hyphens in red ink responded:

"It is understood, darling. At two o'clock. A thousand kisses."

I was highly edified, and if my hypothesis did not exactly coincide with Loriot's it was none the less most interesting.

The next day I called at the judge's at an hour when I felt certain of meeting his wife. I found her alone, before a blazing fire, and Eustache Loriot was at work in his library.

"I have discovered," I said in a low voice to Madame Loriot, "the key to the famous cypher correspondence."

"Ah," she murmured, glancing sharply at me, "let me see this book!"

I handed it to her, and immediately with a rapid movement she threw it into the fire.

And while I, stupefied, watched "Daphnis and Chloe" smoulder, she stirred the fire with the tongs.

When the hapless book was reduced to an incandescent mass, she gave a cry:

"Ah, mon Dieu, what a misfortune! What will Eustache say?"

At this exclamation Loriot came running out.

"What has happened?"

"Such a misfortune, my dear. Monsieur inadvertently placed the 'Daphnis and Chloe' on the arm of my chair and I must have made a false movement, and the volume fell into the grate. As we were conversing with our backs to the fire, we did not perceive it until too late."

Eustache seized the tongs in consternation, pulled out the burning book, and rushed to plunge it into a basin of water. But it was of no use. When taken out of its bath, nothing remained of "Daphnis and Chloe" but a heap of charred cinders.

"What a disaster!" lamented Loriot; "it is not so much a rare book that I regret, but there are the documentary materials that the fire has devoured—I repeat it, there was an enigma there of the highest interest—and just as I was about to discover the key!"

SUMMER HEAT AND OBESITY.

"Summer heat, with the out-door enjoyments which come in its train, is a source of unmixed delight to all whose physical condition is sound. The full feast of pleasure to which hospitable Nature at this season invites mankind is not, however, for those whose infirmities forbid them to undergo, without serious discomfort, a considerable amount of bodily fatigue. To those in particular who are the victims of excessive corpulence, the arrival of the genial summer warmth serves chiefly as a painful reminder that, for them, the delights of long woodland rambles, the climbing of mountain tops, and all the adventurous ways of flood and field are prohibited joys. The palpitating heart, the reeling brain, and the possible deadly sunstroke, which are the concomitants of obesity, banish all the pleasant anticipations which once came with the advent of the glad summer tide. How much of this deprivation of enjoyment and positive misery is absolutely and easily avoidable may be learned by consulting Mr. F. Cecil Russell's 'Corpulency, and the Cure' (256 pages), a little work whose popularity is proved by the fact that its eighteenth edition has just been issued. This fact, too, indicates, in some degree, the wide area now covered by Mr. Russell's wonderful success as an expert in the reduction of excessive fat. His process, which is absolutely safe and pleasant, is so rapid in its operation, that any over-corpulent lady or gentlemen can easily get rid of all unnecessary weight in a very few weeks, so as to be able, before the autumn is with us, to enjoy the delightful feeling (and the appearance too) of renewed youth and energy. Mr. Russell makes no mystery of the nature of his curative preparation—apparently miraculous as are its effects in simultaneously reducing weight and increasing appetite—the consequently larger amount of food being consumed with impunity. He prints, therefore, his recipe in his singularly suggestive book, which may be obtained post free, by sending two penny stamps to his offices, Woburn House, 27, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C."—Gloucester Standard.

EXTRAORDINARY SUCCESS

IN THE

TREATMENT OF OBESITY.

"Our corpulent readers will be glad to learn how to positively lose two stone in about a month with the greatest possible benefit in health, strength and muscle by a comparatively new system. It is a singular paradox that the patient, returning quickly to a healthy state, with increased activity of brain, digestive and other organs, naturally requires more food than hitherto, yet, notwithstanding this, he absolutely loses in weight 1lb. or 2lb. daily, as the weighing-machine will prove. Thus there is no suggestion of starvation. It is an absolute success, and the author, who has devoted years of study to the subject, absolutely guarantees a noticeable reduction within twenty-four hours of commencing the treatment. This is different with other diseases, for the patient in some cases may go for weeks without being able to test whether the Physician has rightly treated him, and may have derived no real or apparent improvement in health. Here, we repeat, the author guarantees it in twenty-four hours, the scale to be the unerring judge. The treatment aims at the actual root of the disease, so that the superfluous fat does not return when discontinuing the treatment. It is perfectly harmless. We advise our readers to call the attention of stout friends to this, because, sincerely, we think they ought to know. For this information, we may say that on sending two penny stamps a book 'Corpulency, and the Cure' (256 pages), containing a reprint of press notices from some hundreds of Medical and other journals (British and Foreign), and other interesting particulars, including the 'recipe,' can be had from a Mr. F. C. Russell, Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C."—Extract from The Belfast News Letter.

No. 398.] For the Week ending August 15th, 1896. [ONE PENNY.

AN INTERMINABLE FIVE MINUTES.

IT was agreed amongst us that to become famous it was necessary to get oneself prominently before the public.

"An occasional interview with the presiding magistrate of a metropolitan police court, for instance," remarked Charlie Dempster.

His remark was treated with the silent contempt it deserved.

"It seems to me," quietly said young Owen, a medical student of frivolous proclivities, "it is only fellows who do something outrageous that really become well known to the great B.P. What lasting fame or distinction is to be derived from having one's portrait exhibited at the Academy, for instance. A few thousand people go there, it is true, but it is only to a very small section of them that one's individuality appeals. Now what I should like," he went on in a meditative tone of voice, "would be to have my exact face and figure, my alter ego, in fact, exhibited at Madame Tussaud's; there one does get a chance of being really known."

"You are quite right, my boy," put in an elder man of our little group, Major Ryder; "there is nothing like wax, so long as it doesn't melt, to stamp one's identity on the public mind. Were any of you fellows ever in Russia, I wonder?"

We one and all admitted we had not been so far, whereupon the speaker continued:

"Well, I was once, a good many years ago now, and what is more my identity, or at any rate a remarkably good likeness of me in wax, still remains there for all I know."

"How on earth did it come about, old man?"

"Well, it's a curious story, and I have never told it before, but it can't do any harm repeating it now; but mind you, I shall not mention time, place, or proper names."

"Let X be an unknown quantity, and as A is to B, so is C+D to E," was the laughing rejoinder, "by all means preserve the lady's incognito—I suppose there was a lady in it? or were you a political suspect, or something worse?"

"No it wasn't quite so bad as that; nothing more than a little harmless flirtation, on my honour, but she was a very charming woman, I admit, and the worst of it was she was married, and to a wretch who did not properly appreciate her. Posssibly that was what made me pity her so. Without making a boast of it, I may mention that she was a lady of rank, and her husband, who also owned a title, was fabulously rich and unreasonably jealous of her—absolutely, I assure you, without a shadow of an excuse so far as I was concerned—was in a position to employ a small army of detectives to keep a watch on her movements: not that I should have minded these, but there was one who was far more difficult to contend with—the lady's aunt, a duenna of the severest description, whose astuteness was almost incomprehensible.

"You can easily imagine therefore that under these circumstances, although my intentions to the lady were strictly honourable, and our friendship purely platonic, it was not by any means an easy matter for me to see much of her and do my best to make her life a little pleasanter than it otherwise would have been.

"In a country like Russia, where the liberty of the subject, even although he be an Englishman, is lightly regarded by persons in high authority, it can be easily understood that I ran no small risk of passing the remainder of my existence immured in a foreign fortress. Such things have happened before now, as you are all doubtless aware, but I was ever noted for my gallantry to the fair sex, and for the sake of her I braved the risk.

"I would wish you to understand, please, that our intimacy was not entirely clandestine. At regular periods I was wont to call at the lady's house in an orthodox way, and on these occasions the manner in which the female dragon used to glare at me is a thing I shall never forget. Our conversation at such times used to be of the most ordinary kind, not a word being said at which the most jealous of husbands could possibly take exception; but need I say it, there were other occasions on which we managed to meet. The lady was a great admirer of art, and I, too, was not adverse to spending an hour or two occasionally in one or other of the big picture galleries in the town, and by a strange concidence our tastes were so much in common that we often found ourselves in the same place. Ah, the bliss of those stolen interviews! The memory of them will never forsake me.

"Perhaps, however, the place of all others where we felt ourselves to be more than ordinarily safe from observation or interruption, was a certain waxwork exhibition, almost as important in its way as the world renowned establishment in Baker Street. At the picture galleries there was always the danger of meeting someone moving in the same high social circle as my companion, but at the waxworks no such danger existed, it not being considered the fashion to go there. Not that it was absolutely without a drawback inasmuch as it was the favourite resort of the upper class of servants, and as my companion moved in the very highest society in the town, and visited a great deal, her face was everywhere more or less well known. Still there was a means of getting out of the difficulty, and we were not long in discovering it. One part of the exhibition was set apart for fac-simile representations of notabilities, individuals who had never done anything notorious, and were consequently not likely to attract the ordinary class of visitors to whom the local chamber of horrors presented a far greater attraction; and this particular part of the building we often had entirely to ourselves.

"One day we were sitting there in one of the comfortable nooks thoughtfully provided by the management, and I was narrating one of my many experiences with a view to enlivening my companion, who seemed to be unusually distraite, when suddenly, and just as I was at a most exciting part of the story, she gave a startled little cry of affright.

"'What is it, dearest?'

"For answer she convulsively clutched my arm and uttered the one word, 'look,' which I did, and saw to my dismay the She Dragon approaching us from the other end of the room. She wore glasses, being near-sighted, and I felt instinctively she would to a certainty recognise us. And then what was to become of her!

"I confess I felt a cold shiver go down my back; not, mind you, that I had done anything to be ashamed of, but in Russia you know things are different to what they are in England, and the vista of incarceration for an undefined period loomed uncomfortably before me. Worse than all I had not the slighest idea of what to do to get out of the very awkward predicament I found myself in. It was only my companion's quick wit that saved me, I may say us.

"'Quick,' she whispered, 'step up on that platform and stand sideways by the side of that old man. There is just room. Fold your arms; look fierce; that's right; and above all don't move. Didn't you tell me once you belonged to some learned society—F.R.—— What was it?'

"'F.R.G.S.,' I hastily replied.

"'Yes, yes; and what is G.S.?'

"'Fellow of the Royal Geological Society.'

"'Of course, how stupid of me, and that accounts for your wonderful hairbreadth escapes, of course,' with a smile. 'Now don't move or we are ruined,' and with a last look to make sure her instructions were understood, she attentively regarded one of the figures close by, and then suddenly catching sight of that terrible female—her aunt—she advanced to meet her.

"'So you have come to see it, too, then? My child, what are you doing here? Are you by yourself?'

"'Quite, Aunt. I came came out of curiosity to see the model. Hadn't you heard about it?'

"'Heard what?'

"'Why, about our friend, Mr. Ryder!'

"'And what of him, pray?'

"'Why, he is a most noted savant, a member of the—what is it now?' making a pretence of looking for the usual label attached to each of the figures. 'How stupid of them; they haven't given him his title. Oh, I know the Royal Geological Society.' And then, going on without giving the old lady time to answer, she continued, looking at me critically: 'I don't call it a very good likeness, do you know? He looks so severe, not at all like what he really is, is it now?'

"The old lady's answer was a contemptuous 'humph! Well I declare,' at the same moment advancing her parasol as if to prod me.

"Quick as thought my Guardian Angel divined her intention, and in an awed tone said:

"'You mustn't touch the figures. Look at the notice.'

"The parasol remained poised midway, and I breathed again—at least, I tried to—inwardly hoping that in so doing I had not what you would say given myself away, but just at that moment an individual in a grey uniform, one of the police officers employed to keep order in the building, effectually arrested the further progress of the upraised parasol by pushing it gently downwards, at the same time saying deferentially but decisively: 'Visitors are on no account to touch the figures, Madame.'

"I could have hugged him on the spot.

"The old lady said never a word, but if a look could have melted a wax figure, I should assuredly have been dissolved instanter. Turning angrily away she strode off, the attendant following in her wake and after him my deliverer.

"I remained immovable, anticipating that she would shortly return, which she did, and clapping her hands with delight, said: 'Capital! You could not have done it better—but—' pursing up her lips, 'we are not by any means out of the wood yet. I got rid of her, but she suspects, I know she does, and the only thing to be done is there must be a real model of you here by the time this place opens to-morrow morning.'

"'But——' I expostulated.

"'It must, and it shall. See here,' opening her purse—a well filled one—'money will do anything in this country, take it, and do as I bid you.'

"I demurred, as who would not? but she was accustomed to have her own way, and after a time I consented to do as I was told. Having escorted her to a cab I lost no time in making my way to the proprietor, or rather proprietress, of the exhibition, and made known my desire to have a portrait model of my humble self prepared that very evening, and, what was more, promised that if it were placed in position by the side of the learned Professor, whose name I mentioned, before the hour of opening on the following morning, I was prepared to pay down a certain sum, the amount of which made the good lady open her eyes in amazement.

"'But, monsieur was unknown,' she urged.

"Then in my grandest manner I gave her to understand that if for personal and private reasons of my own it had been my desire up to the present to remain incog, she would speedily find that once my model occupied a position in her exhibition my name was a household word in learned circles all over the world.

"This seemed to impress her and, added to the influence of the promised payment which I was I stated prepared to make even before the operator commenced to make the necessary cast of my features, any scruples she might have had were effectually dispelled.

"Later on found me seated in an armchair in the modelling room, my face covered with plaster of Paris, in which the necessary holes had been left for sight and breathing. Presently I saw to my consternation the police officer enter the room who had been the means of saving me from detection but a few hours previously.

"In his hand he held an official looking document, and he delivered himself as follows: 'An order has been issued by the municipal authorities that all exhibitions are to remain closed to-morrow, the day having been set apart for special intercession for the safety of the Tsar.'

"Here was an unexpected respite.

"'Who have you got in the chair—a new subject, I suppose?'

"'Yes, perhaps you noticed a new model in the professor division to-day?—well, that was Mr. Ryder, the noted geologist, who has been in this town for months, and his identity only becoame discovered yesterday, when, naturally anxious to be first in the field, I waited on him and obtained permission to take a cast.'

"'That's the one the old lady wanted to prod,' and he laughed as he remembered it.

"I felt inclined to do the same, but I realised that to do so would ruin the reproduction of my features which was fast approaching completion.

"'But if you took one cast, what on earth do you want with another?' he asked suspiciously.

"'Well, you see the Professor wasn't altogether satisfied with himself; it is wonderful how particular some of 'em are, even when they have nothing much to be proud of in the way of looks.'

"'Well, this new Professor, as you call him, wasn't what you might call handsome, and he had a scowl on him enough to terrify any ordinary being—by-the-bye, have you got him in the catalogue?'

"'No. You see it was only exhibited yesterday for the first time.'

"'Ah, quite so. Well, don't forget; no opening to-morrow,' and, with a stare at me, and a good-night to the operator, he was gone.

"At last the horrible ordeal of being plastered up, like the luckless individuals one reads of, who were entombed in walls, and left to die a lingering death, was over, and I was once more free of speech and sight.

"My first question was: 'When will this model be ready?'

"'By to-morrow night,' was the reply.

"'Now about your catalogue of the exhibits, how often do you publish one?'

"'Once a year as a rule.'

"'But if you have any additions in the meanwhile?'

"'Oh, I just insert a leaflet.'

"'When is your next catalogue due?' I asked, ignoring his last remark.

"'As a matter of fact it is in the printer's hands now, and was to be delivered to-day!'

"'Good! Now can you guarantee that by to-morrow night—I am prepared to pay handsomely for my whim,' I remarked; 'my name, with the number of the exhibit and a short sketch of my career, can appear in the new catalogue and that copies will be in the exhibition on the opening morning, the day after to-morrow.'

"'It might be done, but the expense would be enormous.'

"'Never mind the expense,' I replied loftily, 'let it be done, that's all; and now I will hasten home, remove these clothes, and let you have them again in less than an hour.'

"For the first time since my adventure I felt somewhat at ease. The clothes, the appearance of my name in the new catalogue, would together form a chain of evidence it would be impossible to disbelieve. My next move was to get a notice inserted in one or two of the leading daily papers announcing my identity, and that the celebrated Professor Ryder, F.R.G.S., and the humble individual who had hitherto been content to pose as plain Mr. Ryder were one and the same.

"Further than this I determined to put a bold front on the matter. I paid a formal call the next day at my divinity's house, made myself as agreeable as possible to her brute of a husband, and the She Dragon accepted the congratulations of the former, and effectually parried the searching remarks of the latter, finally winding up by laughingly remarking that it would be a good joke to go and see myself the next day.

"The proposition was at once cordially agreed to by Dr. Hunt, and I fancied I could detect a malicious gleam in her eyes.

"We went; and, needless to say, made direct for the group of learned men. Myself amongst others.

* * * * *

"Shortly afterwards, the setting out of an important expedition, bent on geographical research, afforded a reasonable excuse for my sudden return to England; and I felt that it was wise to avail myself of it. But you see it is quite possible to get oneself exhibited in a public place without committing any great atrocity."

"Yes, and by indulging in a very pleasant occupation, too."

"Gentlemen, I give you my word of honour, our friendship was purely platonic, and the Major sighed heavily as he thought of the days that had been."

RESULT OF JUMBLED STORY COMPETITION.

NO. 4.

WE regret to announce that the result of this compe- must take the form of that published last week. Eight hundred odd competitors entered for this competition, and three hundred and eighty of them succeeded in putting the story together absolutely correctly, and were the prizes divided among them each would receive about sixpence. Instead, however, of forwarding this amount, we are sending to each winner a penknife.

RESULT OF POST-CARD COMPETITION.

THE London guinea goes this week to Mr. W. Nicholson, 29, Kingsgate Street, High Holborn, W.C.; and the provincial guinea to Mr. J. C. Parsons, 22, Devon Street, Glasgow.

I COMPLAINED one afternoon to Doctor Marcy, who besides being my physician was also my very intimate friend, that I found twelve hours of daylight, during which I was not allowed, owing to the condition of my eyes, to read or write, longer than the same number of weeks of the congenially occupied.

"Sweet are the uses of industry," I said; "heretofore, I have been wont to give myself credit for the labours I have accomplished. Now that I am compelled to pass my time in idleness, suddenly am I made aware of the fact that I have been all along merely following a natural human instinct of avoiding ennui."

"Providence," said the Doctor, "wisely supplies us with an abundance of playthings that we may not keep asking, like children at the matinée, 'when is it going to begin,' as well as various other questions the answers whereof are not easily found."

"But my toys have all been taken away," I remarked, "and I can find nothing to do except to keep asking myself these very questions of which you speak."

"You should get new toys," answered my friend, stroking his beard; "go out and study nature."

"In a city park with custom-made flower-beds and a lake run in a mould?"

"I intend that you shall go out into the country as soon as I have finished with this treatment. In the meantime you can interest yourself a little more in human nature. Mingle with the crowd whenever you can and study its characteristics."

"Odi profanum vulgus!" I exclaimed, and I rose from my chair and walked to the window. I looked out through the dusky goggles, which the Doctor compelled me to wear, across the yard into the street and to the city beyond. All the world seemed to be in a miserable limbo of twilight.

"You grow peevish," said my friend presently; "you must make occupation for yourself of some kind, else I shall be called on ere long to minister to a mind diseased. If you are forbidden great things, then do the best you can with trivial. Become an apostle of the commonplace. For mental employment, recite the poetry you learnt when you were young; for diversion, play games with the children; if you want conversation, go and get your hair cut; if there is need of exercise, take a long walk."

I laughed, but did not turn away from the window or make any reply.

The Doctor continued: "A long stroll, say two hours or more, ought to form a part of each day's programme. Don't wander about aimlessly, but visit some particular place, or walk by some established rule. It is not a bad plan to imagine yourself a shadow-detective and follow up different pedestrians. You might, perhaps, get a more varied route by pursuing some stray dog."

"These be rare pastimes," said I.

"Then there is a penny walk," my friend began to say.

"A penny walk?" I exclaimed.

"Yes; that is a perfectly simple device to produce an exciting variety in a stroll. Stockton describes it in one of his stories. You stand at a corner and flip a penny; if it comes heads, go to the right; tails, to the left. When you come to the next corner, repeat the process."

"It has the advantage of being a very economical form of amusement," I remarked.

"Precisely. If you prefer it in a more extravagant form you might flip a sovereign."

"Apropos of stray dogs, which you mentioned a moment ago," said I, still at the window, "here is one coming up the path in your front garden."

The Doctor approached the window and looked out. The dog, which was a big, shaggy Russian terrier had stopped with his forefeet on the bottom step, and was looking eagerly up at the window. When he saw Marcy, he ran up the steps and stood in front of the door, wagging his blunt tail vigorously.

"Hallo," said the Doctor; "it is you, is it? Want to come in? There is a mystery of some kind about that dog," he continued to me, as he stepped out into the entry to open the door, "which I should like to have you explain, if you can. Come in, Towser, or whatever your name may be."

The moment the door opened the dog bolted through the hall into the consultation room, where we had been sitting. There he stood still for a few seconds in the attitude of a setter, head erect, ears pricked, legs spread apart, with the right forefoot raised in the air. With one quick glance he took in the entire room, letting his eyes rest for a moment on me. Then crouching down upon the floor, he put his head between his paws and lay perfectly quiet.

"He always goes through that same performance," said the Doctor; "half-a-dozen times I have found him at the door, waiting to be admitted. As soon as it is opened, he rushes into the room, and lies down in the position he has now. Presently he will ask to be let out."

"Belong to some neighbour?" I asked, taking off my coloured glasses that I might get a better look at this mysterious animal. He was exceptionally large for a terrier, but his alert, saucy physiognomy showed that he was of pure breed. His hair was of a wolfish grey and as curly as moss. It had the effect of making his whole figure, including the stubby neck and the snort, thick legs looked gnarled and tough.

"He is not a beauty by any means," said I; "but I think he would be a good dog to bet on."

"That is a comprehensive way of putting it," said the Doctor; "his appearance suggests, to my mind, infinite faithfulness; and I conceive that his presence here illustrates it. Some time ago—about six months, I should think—this dog's master came here to consult me as to how long he could hope to live. He was a man of only about thirty-five years of age, but he was an absolute wreck. At the first glance, I saw that he had been through the white heat of dissipation, and without much soliciting on my part, he told me something of his story. I remember the dog lay there exactly as he is lying now, and he kept his eyes fixed on his master. In an unconcerned way, very much as though he were speaking of some third person, the man explained how he had been killing himself by degrees with whisky, absinthe, opium, and cocaine. He did not thing that he could last much longer, and would like to know what my professional verdict would be on that point. I studied his eyes while he talked, and made up my mind that he was on the verge of madness. It was useless to try to do anything for him, unless he should himself make a powerful effort towards reform, and I started to tell him so; but he interrupted me. 'I am not going to ask you about remedies,' said he; 'what I desire to know is how much longer am I likely to live.' I did not discuss the matter further, but proceeded at once to a searching examination, with some very interesting results."

Here the Doctor's eyes brightened, and he began to describe, in technical language slightly modified for my understanding, the demoralised condition of heart and lungs revealed by the stethoscope. There was, it appeared, an astonishing disarrangement of every function of the body, betokening a climax of dissolution not far removed.

The Doctor presently emerged from the professional mist in which he had enveloped himself and continued the story. "When he pushed the question again of how long he might expect to live, I assured him that, if he made no change in his present habits, a horrible death of some kind was only a few months away. Some of the symptoms he described were those of approaching deliria. My advice to him was that he apply without delay for admission to the House for Inebriates, and I offered to give him a letter to the examining physician. He had cross-examined me narrowly with regard to the diagnosis, but as soon as I began to suggest a course of action for him to follow, he made a gesture of impatience and rose from his chair. He asked my fee, and when I told him the amount, he paid it into my hand. Then he took up his hat and, thanking me in a stern, almost savage fashion, went towards the door. The dog followed at his heels; but as the pair crossed the threshold, the animal turned and gave me such an intensely human look of sorrowful appeal that I give you my word, Firmin, it has haunted me ever since."

"He probably understood in a vague way," I remarked, "that something was wrong with his master."

"About a week later," said the Doctor, "the dog returned alone, and I admitted him. He acted just as he does now. I brought him food and drink, but he would not accept either. Since then he has called a great many times, and whenever he is let into this room he always goes through with this same performance."

The dog now rose to his feet, and, after again looking all about the room, started towards the door. I took up my hat and stick, and followed him.

"And you never saw the master again?" I inquired.

"No, nor heard of him."

I opened the front door, and the dog ran out into the street. He seemed to understand that I was planning to accompany him, for he stopped on the pavement and looked back at me, while I explained to the Doctor that I was about to carry out his suggestion and follow a stray dog. He assured me that I had selected a good subject—one which was decidedly out of the commonplace.

"Now, see here, my friend," I said to the dog, as soon as I caught up with him, "you seem a very intelligent fellow, and I believe you will understand most of what I say. I am going to follow you, do you see? I shall go wherever you go. Now don't run along too fast, for I cannot keep up. Slowly, slowly, understand!"

The terrier wagged his short tail vigorously, and started off at a moderate trot a few feet in advance of me. Every now and again he stopped and looked back to see if I were still following him. There was an air of sturdy earnestness about all his actions which reminded me of a child made prematurely old by care and responsibility.

"Evidently," said I, to my guide, "you have led your master, as you are now leading me, perhaps when the night was dark and stormy, and he was very drunk. If he fell in the gutter, I suppose you shook his arm until you woke him up. When the police took him in charge, you went in search of bail among his dissolute friends, if he had any."

We emerged from the quiet, respectable street in which my friend resided into a main thoroughfare of the city. Presently the dog dodged into a doorway, and stood looking expectantly at me when I came up. In the window, at one side, was a large display of bottles artistically arranged. The doors were hung with light curtains, impenetrable to the vision. Above there was painted, in large gilt letters, "Harry and Jack."

"So this is one of the places," said I to the dog; "and you are waiting for me to go in and follow the example of your former master." I pushed open the door, and my companion ran in. A large man, with a florid countenance and expansive shirt front, was vigorously polishing the counter of the bar with a towel. The other proprietor sat in an armchair at the opposite side of the room, reading a newspaper and smoking.

"Hey, Jack," the latter called out, as soon as we entered; "here is that fellow's dog again."

"Give him some meat, poor devil," said "Jack." Then he stopped his work of polishing and asked me what I would have.

I explained that I was merely looking for a friend, and then said: "That is a bright-looking dog. Is he yours?"

"No, he isn't," said the mixer of drinks, resting his elbows on the bar; "he used to belong to a fellow that came here to get a drink, now and then. Don't know where he has gone to."

"What was his name?"

"Well, those who were with him generally called him Tom, but I never heard no other name. Used to get full pretty often. Never seemed to know when he had had enough. When a man gets to drinking like that——"

Here a customer entered and called for whisky, checking the barman's incipient temperance homily. "Harry," in the meantime, had come forward, his hand full of small pieces of cold meat, which he tossed to the dog. They were caught in the air and eagerly devoured.

"Here, Ban!" he said as he threw him a piece.

"Is his name Ban?" I asked.

"That is what they used to call him," answered "Harry," looking up at me; "mighty intelligent dog, he is, too. He would take his master home when he was too far gone. Now he comes here sometimes to get something to eat, and, you bet, I always give it to him. Don't I, Ban?"

The dog, with his mouth full of meat, wagged his short tail enthusiastically. Then we went out into the street again and threaded our way through the crowd for a few squares. Whenever we passed a drinking place, my guide would slacken his pace a little and look about; but as I showed no disposition to enter, he would hurry along. Presently we turned into a quiet street leading off the main thoroughfare, and I began to talk out loud to my companion.

"So your name is Ban, is it?" said I; "it is an odd title. Are you so ugly that Tom, whoever he may be, regarded you as a sort of a Japanese curio?"

I repeated the name several times, and as I did so, the words of a catch in The Tempest suddenly occurred to me, and I spoke them aloud:

"No more dams I'll make for fish;
Nor fetch in firing
At requiring;
Nor scrape trenchering, nor wash dish,
'Ban, 'Ban, Ca—Caliban
Has a new master—get a new man."

When I came to the name Caliban, I spoke it with special emphasis. The effect upon the dog, who stood attentively listening, was quite unexpected. With a sudden yelp he sprang up in the air towards my face, and ran round me, leaping and barking. Then he seemed to regain control of himself and to remember, for he came and crouched down at my feet, whining softly.

"Caliban, Caliban," I repeated, and each time I spoke the name the dog whined again and crouched closer to my feet. "That is evidently what Tom called you when you were alone together, and I am, perhaps, the first to have uttered that name since your master disappeared. Now that we are thoroughly introduced, you will trust me, won't you?" Caliban wagged his tail affirmatively. "Very well, then, you may lead on."

I motioned with my stick and Caliban bounded along in front, turning back every few yards to make sure that I had not disappeared. A short distance down the street, I marked the imposing façade of the building from which the Great Daily was issued. Caliban made directly towards it, passing the business offices and entering at a side doorway which led to the editorial rooms. As we ascended the stairs, I said to myself that I had probably discovered the means whereby the dog's master had been wont to earn a living.

Caliban brought me through the outer offices, which at this time in the day, were unoccupied, to the desk of the assistant-editor, a gentleman with whom I was very well acquainted.

"How did you happen to get possession of that dog, Firmin?" he asked, looking up from his work.

I answered that I had followed the animal up the stairs, and then inquired as to who was his owner.

"I do not think he has any owner," replied the assistant-editor; "I believe he's a genuine 'vagrom' animal, and I marvel that some pound-keeping Dogberry does not order that he be 'comprehended.'"

"He must some time have had a master," I suggested.

"He used to follow in the rather irregular wake of a man by the name of Gower—Tom Gower, if I remember rightly. You never knew him, did you?" I shook my head. "He did specials for a while, and occasionally I gave him a chance in the editoral columns. Good writer, but villainously dissipated; unreliable on that account."

"Where is he now?" I asked.

"I have no idea; indeed, I wish I knew, for I could give him plenty of work just at present, and the poor fellow always looked as though he needed it. I imagine that he must be dead or have left the city, otherwise the dog would not be wandering about in this fashion."

Caliban had, by this time, begun to show signs of impatience, and, after I had answered some inquiries from the assistant-editor about the condition of my eyes, we took our departure. I felt that I was now in possession of a much clearer idea as to the personality of the man in whose footsteps I was following. A sense of fraternity with him had sprung up with the knowledge that he had earned his living by my own craft. A dissipated and reckless Bohemian, with no friend in the world save his ugly-looking dog—a character well worth running down and investigating. For this there could be no better guide than the very one which I had happened upon by chance.

Started off at a trot a few feet in advance of me.

"After all, Caliban," I said, to my companion, "it is quite as well that you cannot talk. As we progressed in this itinerary, you would have explained everything, and not allowed me the flattering unction of drawing a successful inference. Long before this I should have been bored with your well-meaning chatter, and the career of Tom Gower would have been bereft of all possible interest for me. Hereafter, whenever I want a guide, I shall try to secure one that has no power of speech."

Caliban was trotting along a few paces in front of me, and I noticed in his carriage a jaunty swagger which had not appeared before. Every now and again he would look back at me and then execute a caper and bark.

"Aha!" said I, "we have been to the office and we have money in our pocket. Now we are going to spend it. Is that the idea, Caliban?" Every time that I spoke the dog's full name he started and turned round, evidently mindful of his lost master.

We turned several corners, and were presently in a locality with which I was not very familiar. Caliban, on the contrary, seemed perfectly at home. The streets were narrow and very dirty; they swarmed with people instead of vehicles. Here and there they shaded off into alleys, which were so like the streets that they could not be distinguished from them. Everything looked dingy and spattered. The sun, which had elsewhere shone almost offensively bright, seemed to be radiating through a haze. I slipped off the dark glasses which I had been wearing and called to my guide not to run so far in advance. At the word, he stopped in front of a small chemist's and looked inquiringly at me. I nodded my head, and he walked over to the doorway.

He looked first at me.

It was a shabby, disreputable-looking place, several steps below the level of the pavement. When I pushed open the door, a bell, which was hung over it, jangled fiercely, and a hoarse voice from behind a partition at the end of the room, cried: "Be out in a minute!" I stared around at the fly-speckled "Patent medicine" advertisements and the long rows of bottles on the dusty, paintless shelves, and said to Caliban: "What do we want here?"

This inquiry was repeated a moment later by an individual with a pale face and red eyes, who came forward behind the counter. He looked first at me and then at the dog. I fancied that I noticed in his eye, as he caught sight of Caliban, a flash of uneasiness.

"Has Mr. Gower been here recently?" I asked, in a bland tone.

"I don't know anybody by that name," answered the apothecary, glancing again at my companion.

"But you will recognise his dog, I think," said I.

"The man you mean has not been in here for six months or longer. The dog comes sometimes."

"He told me once," said I, mendaciously, "that this was the place where he used to get his opium and cocaine."

The man folded his arms and stared coldly at me.

"And so," I added, "I thought you might possibly know something about him."

The apothecary turned and began to move back towards the roost from which I had disturbed him. "I know nothing whatever about the man," said he; "he often tried to buy opium of me, but I let him have only a small amount at a time."

"Caliban," said I, when we were again out on the pavement, "our friend within is a liar, is he not?" It was quite evident, from the anxiety the dog had displayed to get out of the shop, that his opinion of the pale-faced man was as unfavourable as my own, although perhaps based on a different process of reasoning.

Farther on, the street widened somewhat, and the houses appeared to make some effort to assume the virtue of respectability, even though they had it not. I began to meet well-dressed men here and there, and an occasional cab rattled over the stony road.

We went too fast and made too many turnings for me to retain any knowledge of the streets through which we passed. I was presently conscious that we were again back in the disreputable portion of the town. It was still too early for the night workers to swarm out, but the evening twilight gave to the houses a sinister appearance, like that on the faces of ruffians who sleep. At intervals, Caliban would stop before some villainous-looking grog-shop and wait until I came up.

"See here, Caliban, now why do we go up this alley? It is a ghostly place for either men or dogs—especially just now when there is only enough light to see our way, and not enough to make these very harmless objects around us—boxes, barrels, and cans—show for what they are. Am I to climb over that pile of timber and into this low, dirty-looking shed? Do you want to get me arrested for a maurauding vagrant? Now, what are you searching for? There is nothing on that pile of dirty straw. Heavens! Do people live in such quarters as these? There are lights through the cracks in the partition. Hark! A woman's voice!"

"Somebody is movin' in the next room, Jim!"

"It's that dog. I'll get in there and stick a knife through his pelt, some time. Comes here every night since that feller crawled in there that time and——"

"Yes, yes; the police took him away. Don't talk about it. It scares me now to remember how horrible his face looked."

"Hold on, Caliban! Wait till I ask—you will go, eh? And the police took him away, did they? Then the next thing is the station."

But the next place was not the station. It was a small stone building over whose arched doorway appeared the words "City Hospital." It stood in a small side-street, abutting a number of large buildings which fronted upon the main street. A burly policeman was pacing up and down the pavement outside. He touched his hat to me as I came up, and I recognised him as an old member of the force.

"Good-evening to you, Mr. Firmin. How does it happen that you have my dog with you?"

"Your dog? Why do you call him yours?"

The man stopped to pat Caliban, who was rubbing against his legs. "Because," said he, "he comes every night just about this time to see me. He makes up to me, like he is doing now, until he is sure I am good-natured, then he runs up to the door and begs to be let into the hospital."

"Why does he do that?"

"I think, sir," replied the man in a half-whisper, evidently fearful lest the dog should overhear what he said, "he is looking for his master. I'll show you. When I open the door, see, he runs along the hall to that room there. Well, that's where we put his master when we got him to the hospital. He had shot himself in the head over near Riley's Alley. The dog followed into the room, and beating wouldn't get him out. So they let him stay. There is no one in the room now. He just goes in and looks about a little and then comes out—just like he has done now."

"What was the man's name; did you find out?" I asked as Caliban returned to us.

"He had a note in his hand addressed to the person who should find him. He said that his name was Edward Thompson, and that he had come from some town up North. He said he was a civil engineer, but could not get any work, so he was going to shoot himself. I read the note myself, so I remembered it. 'I have no friends,' that is what it said in ending."

"And what finally became of him?" I asked; but just as I spoke, I caught a glimpse of Caliban disappearing round the corner. I could not wait for the answer to my question without losing my guide, and I hastily broke away, almost upon a run. I called to the dog, but he refused to look round. He was not going very fast, and I succeeded in overtaking him as he turned into the main road, which ran parallel to the street upon which the hospital was situated.

"Now then, my friend Caliban, surely we have not much further to go. It grows late, the streets are deserted, and the sunlight, under which we started upon this little journey, has given way to the blackest of night. Here you stop in front of this magnificent pile of stone and marble, and look up at its classic columns. Do you want me to push open this iron gate? Very well, now you are in the yard, where do you propose to go? To the back of the building, through this narrow passage, where the echo of my heels upon the stone pavement sounds like the rattle of bones? And now you crouch in front of that window, which opens into the basement below. There appears to be some kind of a shoot down which boxes are slid. I will tell you what it is, Caliban, I can see through the dusty pane. What! The dissecting-room of a medical college! And now I know, by this long, sad howl, that your itinerary is ended."

THE BOOK OF ALISTAIR KENNEDY.

It was on a Sunday evening early last winter that I saw the book of Alistair Kennedy. Months before, in talking of the work and ambitions common to us, he had mentioned that he had grown bold and was writing at length. Then, and several times since, I had asked him to tell me more than the mere fact, to describe his motive and characters; but always he had laughingly refused. Friendship was constant in everything save in the affairs of authorship; he could only say that he had found a vein of life as yet unworked by the novelist. When the book was finished I should see it and praise; until then my curiosity must be unsatisfied.

A day or two before the evening he had written to me that his work was done, and that the book would be brought out at Christmas. The publishers had returned the manuscript with some suggested alterations, and if I liked I might see it before it finally left him. My answer to the letter was a visit to his rooms on the evening, and of this visit and of what followed I write. As faithfully as I can I will tell the incidents of the two or three hours from the time Kennedy replied to my congratulations.

"Yes," he said, "Brown and Bowyer have accepted it, and expect a big sale. I don't think the book is badly done; but then I am prejudiced. You shall judge for yourself. Here it is; do you read, and I will smoke and watch if you approve. But of course you will approve."

I took the bundle he passed across the table, and turned over the typewritten sheets, and learnt what was his book. The unworked vein of life was the Salvation Army. On a grey background of barrack-room and shelter he had shown grey pictures of men and women. With the circumstance that gives air of truth he had told the loves and hates of captain and lieutenant, bandsman and tambourinist. It was an unkind book; blame was sounded often and clearly, praise seldom and in falsetto of cynicism; the writing was the writing of a scoffer. Unfair though the book was, it was cleverly made, and would find a public willing to buy. Chapter after chapter I quickly read; all were written with skill, and all had a certain power. The book would have the success that was hoped for; but it was bad, bad as it was clever. At the end of a bitter impeachment entitled 'Blood Royal,' I tired of the reading; pushing back my chair I looked to Kennedy in remonstrance.

"Well," he said, "what do you think of it? Will it go?"

"The book is not good," I said. "It is very easy to abuse people and parties of people, to bring forward the bad and hold back the good. It is——"

"That is not what I mean," he interrupted, "Is the book well written? Will it sell?"

"Yes," I said, "the writing has strength, and will be read. But the whole thing is unfair. I cannot understand how you, Kennedy, an emotional man, could have written it. Where is the morality?"

"If the book takes," he said, somewhat angrily, "I shall be content. The morality is clear to me. You think I am showing up the Army; well perhaps I am and perhaps I am right to do so. Let me ask you a question. Have you ever been to a Salvationist meeting, or slept in a shelter, or talked to a soldier?"

"No," I said, "but——"

"You confess," he interrupted, "you know nothing of the people or their methods, and yet say I am unfair. Why, my dear fellow, I have lived the life for months, and have written from facts; it is you who are unfair. But it is not too late to begin to study. I am not quite satisfied with the colouring of the third, the conversion chapter, and should like to watch another meeting. There is a hall but a few yards away, and presently we will go to it. You shall listen to the bandsmen as with music they charm the world; you shall see the sisters as with flourish of tambourines they charm the bandsmen. You will come?"

"You talk as you write, Kennedy," I said. "Yes, I will come. When do we start?"

"Now," he said, gathering together the typewritten sheets, "I will put these away—no, I will bring them with me; you may want to refer to them—and we will go. The show begins at seven, and we will lose as little as possible."

His anger had gone at the thought of guiding me to the life he had found, and he laughed as he gave me my hat and led the way to the street. Arm in arm we walked to the corner, and across to the low-roofed building which was the hall.

"It is late and we have commenced; but I think there is standing room. Come in; God bless you," said the soldier at the entrance; as we passed in to the meeting.

"Yes, the seats are all taken; we will wait here," said Kennedy, placing his book on the floor; and near the beginning of the middle aisle we stood and looked about the room.

Across the far end was raised a platform, on one side of which sat men who played on this and that instrument, and were the band, and on the other women who shook tambourines, and sang in high shrill voices, and were now the followers, and now the leaders of the men. Below the platform, and with face sometimes towards and sometimes away from it, stood the captain, waving rude time with the hymn book in his hand. Between the captain and our place of watching were three or four hundred people who sang, or tapped feet on the floor, or were silent as was their mood. Around platform, captain and people, were thin wooden walls, with a hundred decorations of texts and mottoes, and advertisements of Army merchandise and Army meetings.

Verse after verse of the hymn was sung, and again and again there followed the refrain. The faces of the brothers grew hot and flushed, and the bodies of the sisters rocked to and fro with the emotion and the exercise; yet still the praise was loud, and still the gas flames flickered in its wind. The captain raised his hand for quiet; and the noise of the playing and singing became less, and then was gone. In strong heart phrase he prayed, and in loud accompaniment the soldierscried "Glory," and "Hallelujah;" with his eyes Kennedy smiled at the boy and girl lovers who sat in the corner near to us, whispering to each other; in study of facts I listened and saw. The prayer came to an end, and there was a hurry of "Amens" and then a silence. Once more the captain spoke; turning to the platform and back to the people below, he asked whether any soul was moved to tell its tale. To the invitation a bandsman answered, and leant from his place and spoke of the misery that was his when, as a sinner, he walked with the world, and of the joy he now had in singing and praying with those above the world. "Glory! Glory! Praise the Lord!" said the people; and again there was a silence.

"Brothers and sisters," said the captain, "as some of you know we have a visitor to-night. Lieutenant Gray has come from Edinburgh to speak to us, and has much to say. May the Lord bless her words. Will you stand here, Lieutenant, please and be among us?"

"Willingly," said a girl in the front row of the platform, as she took his hand and stepped to his side. "Willingly, Captain. I wish to speak so that you may all hear, and like well to be among you. Truly I have much to say: and may the Lord indeed bless the words."

"The Lieutenant is pretty," whispered Kennedy as, raising her bonnet and throwing back her head, she began the address. "She is very pretty. I wonder we did not notice her before. What do you think of her?"

For a time I gazed down the aisle to the girl and listened to her words. She was more than pretty; she was beautiful. The black oval bonnet was setting for a finely formed face, made bright by earnest eyes looking from the shadow of dark waving hair; the rudely cut serge gown could not triumph over the grace of the slender figure, but fell closely and was servant to it; the hands that moved to and fro in gesture and persuasion were small and very white. Like an ideal of gentle puritanism she stood and spoke; and her voice was sweet to hear, and her words were clear and forceful.

"She is indeed good to see," I answered Kennedy. "I, too, wonder why we did not notice her before. There is nothing like her in your book. Is she an exception?"

He made no reply; and I saw that her words had moved him to interest, and that he was smiling, and leaning forward. The thought came to me that he was studying his third chapter, and added to my dislike of all that he had written.

The minutes passed, and her speaking grew very eloquent. The people ceased their "Glories" and hearkened in silence. The smile left the face of Kennedy and his breathing became more quick and his eyes more earnest. Though less moved than some, I felt upon my cheek the flush of excitement.

Still she spoke on, and her words were fast and high as of one who wrestled with souls unto prevailing. And now I saw that the girl in the corner had forgotten her boy lover and was crying silently; and now I saw that Kennedy's lips were closing and unclosing, and that his hands were gripped together and were trembling in the grip.

There was a sob in the woman's throat and a stay in her words; and then the sob was gone, and again she spoke. Now she made passionate intreaty that the sinner in the hall would repent that very night, and give up his soul at the penitent form; and now it seemed to me that with eyes that were wet and wistful she gazed along the room to the eyes of Kennedy.

"This night, sinner, this night and here, cast off your load. Kneel at this form, and pray for help and pardon; then stand and give thanks for the mercy. We will pray with you, sinner; we will praise with you, saved one. Oh, let not the time go; repent this night, this night and here," were the words of her intreaty; and at their end she still gazed along the room, and waited for an answer. There came the answer. For a moment Kennedy stood at my side, bowed and trembling; then in quick steps he went towards the platform, his hands outstretched and his face broken like the face of a woman in hysteria of shock. With look of joy and triumph she came to meet him, and took his hands in hers, and led him to the form to which she had pointed. Together they knelt; and she prayed aloud for mercy upon him and for the lifting of his sins; and with her prayers went up his sobbings and the Amens of the men and women.

They stood again, and faced the room; and I saw that he, the scoffer of an hour before, now shook and wept. And she, the girl, too, saw, and laid her hand upon his arm, and looked to him in beautiful compassion.

"Will you speak, brother," she said softly; "will you testify to the change you feel?"

He covered his face with his hands, and for a time was silent; then suddenly he lifted his head and began to speak. Uppermost in his mind was the memory of his book; and in a voice that sometimes broke and sometimes was clear he told the story. How that for months he had laboured to win fame for himself by bringing shame upon the Army, he told; how that his eyes had ever been blind to the good, his understanding ever sleeping; how that on this night he had come to scoff, but had mercifully been led to repentance.

"What shall I do, what shall I do to show this repentance?" he said, and looked appealingly to the girl.

"Brother," she said with a smile of rejoicing, "let the destruction of the book be your act of faith. Together we will burn it at the penitent form. Will it not be well, brother?"

"Yes, yes, oh yes," he said in wild earnestness, "I will get it, and we will burn it. Yes, yes, oh yes."

Hurriedly he left her and walked to where the book lay at my feet. Giving me neither word nor glance, he lifted it in his two hands; then turned, and carried it up the room. With quick touch he unloosed the tape and spread the bundle about the form; then paused as if he needed something.

"Here, brother, here," said a bandsman, and leant from the platform, and gave him a lighted match. Once more he bent to the form; with the flame he touched an overhanging sheet, and another, and another; his book began to die. A mood came to me, and I covered my eyes that I might not see.

Again I looked along the passage way. Many of the sheets were black and broken; the rest were burning to the blackness. A fragment, still white, floated across the people and fell by my side; unreasoningly I lifted it and placed it in my pocket-book. The mood returned; and I looked from the group by the platform to one and another about the room, and then to the boy and girl lovers in the corner. For moments I watched them as they leant together in talk of what had happened; then turned, and went through the doorway, and along the street. From the open windows there followed an uproar of praise; the book of Alistair Kennedy was dead.

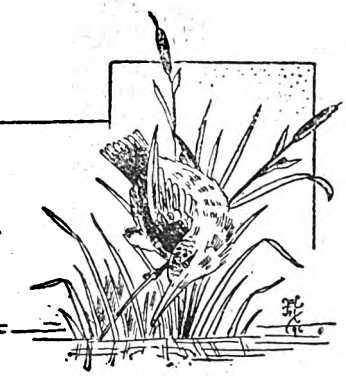
THE KNIFE THROWER.



I.

He had jet black hair and piercing dark eyes. He played the flute divinely. His sister, Babette, was beautiful. Her figure was of queenly proportions. No less regal was her face, duskily sweet and crowned with its diadem of wild tresses. It is hard to describe these Italian girls. They are women at sixteen and old crones at thirty. Their beauty is early, magnificent and—fleeting.

Babette had an angelic voice; she sang with Pietro's flute and twirled a little be-ribboned tambourine.

In a green sack Pietro carried ten long, slender knives. They were heavy and keen—these knives—and Pietro, standing twenty paces away, could throw them, one above another, into a chalk line on a board. Babette, standing before this board, still as beautiful as a statue, would suffer Pietro to throw his knives about her. The keen blades, flying like so many arrows from a bow, would quiver into the wood beside her, grazing her clothing, her limbs, her neck—so close that half an inch, in some instances, meant her life.

It was a daring feat, but Babette laughed at the white faces of the spectators. When it was done she would cry "Bravo!" and clap her hands.

They made money, Pietro and Babette. In their travels they came to Blythe. Woeful was their experience in that place.

II.

"He loves me, Pietro. Indeed, he told me so!"

"Love—caramba! Babetta, you are a silly fool. He—love! For every pretty face he feels the same—they have told me of it. You cannot count his love affairs on your fingers. There is no good in his woman's face—and let him take care!" Pietro's eyes flashed ominously and he clutched his bag of knives. "Think no more of him, Babette. I insist—I command you."

The dark, appealing eyes turned upward to her brother's assumed a hopeless expression. Babette dropped her head. Touched to the heart, Pietro came to her side and began toying with her wilful tresses.

"You know, little sister," he said slowly, "we are nothing but miserable musicians—poor, juggling strollers going from place to place in this wild country, earning whatever we can. What have we in common with such as he? Have we wealth, or rank, or anything that should attract him to us? Beauty you have, Babette, but beauty that might prove your ruin at his hands. No, no; think no more of him. He is fair-faced but false-hearted. He has followed us for no good end. This afternoon, Babette, we will play and sing at the hotel. Let us go in. We will stop here until to-morrow."

III.

He spoke Italian like all Englishmen, that is to say, miserably.

"Babette, I thought you had forgotten me, but I am happy to know I was mistaken. Why do you tremble, little one?"

"My brother," she murmured, looking about her apprehensively, "he is stopping in this hotel and—if he knew——"

"I do not fear a thousand brothers," he answered, laughing scornfully. "Love, my sweet girl, true love, is fearless. And you love me, do you not?"

He approached and looked into her eyes, hiding his tenderness under a careless air.

The two were conversing at one side of the hotel. It was the noontide hour, and the street was almost deserted. The few people who did pass and the merchant in the opposite shop saw nothing to excite their curiosity—merely a girl with a be-ribboned tambourine—a strolling Italian singer, such as they had often seen, talking with a half-jesting gallant. A flirtation between a passably fair musician and a well-dressed man with a feminine face. The passer-by and the merchant merely shrugged their shoulders and went about their business.

"Yes," she answered, curtaining her eyes with their lids and long, black lashes, while a rich colour came to her cheeks. Then she looked up quickly; "but, Pietro—he is very angry—he swears he will keep us apart even if he must commit—murder."

The last word had a quivering accent. "I am afraid—for you," she added, looking at him wistfully.

He smiled in his self-confidence.

"Do not fear for me, Babette. But come—you say you love me. Do you love me better than you do your brother?"

His look was half-doubting.

"Oh, yes, yes; but——"

"Is not my love stronger than that of a thousand brothers?"

"I believe it—I believe it—but I cannot leave Pietro.

Who would sing to his flute and play the tambourine for him? Who would be brave enough to stand while he threw the knives? It would break Pietro's heart!"

"Very well; then stay with Pietro!"

He would have turned away, but her half-appealing gesture stopped him. He looked into her eyes. There was a battle in her breast and the deep agony of it surged in her face.

"I will go with you," she said simply.

A flush of triumph darted through his cheeks.

"My own Babette! You say you and your brother are to sing and play here this afternoon. Very good; I will come mounted and have another horse near at hand for you. We will watch our chances and flee. I trust your woman's wit to take care of Pietro. I will be a spectator at your performance, dressed as a cattleman. Do not let my disguise deceive you!"

"No disguise could hide you from me," she murmured.

He smiled again.

"Good-bye, until later, Babette."

"A rivederci, signor."

They parted.

Above them, at an open window, was Pietro. He had heard all.

IV.

"TAKE your tambourine, Babette,"

Pietro smiled as he spoke, and Babette got up from the steps where she had been sitting. A crowd was gathering about them, and at the first sound from Pietro's flute, some ladies came out on the balcony of the hotel. Prominent among the crowd was a roughly dressed man in a broad-brimmed hat. He rode a horse, and had drawn rein at the edge of the crowd.

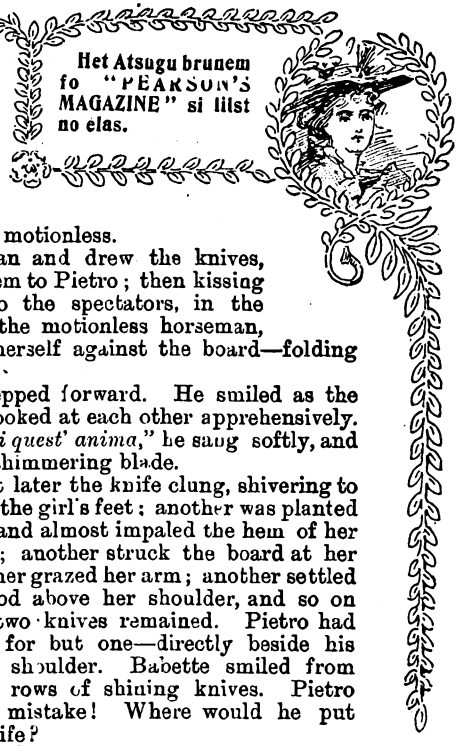
"O luce di quest' anima,
Delizia amor e vita,
La nos tra orto unita
In terra in ciel sara!"

As Babette voiced her song her eyes sought the stranger in the rough dress. Pietro's quick glance passed from his sister to the man—but the notes of Pietro's flute did not waver. They came sweet and strong. Not so with Babette; her voice trembled as she sang:

"O, light of Hope, still animate
The heart whose faith is plighted;
In holy bonds united,
How blest our lot will be,
Reposing in our happy home
We'll calmly wait the morrow;
Or if thou hast a sorrow,
I'll share it, love, with thee."

The song finished, Pietro set up his board in a place where he had driven a post to support it. Then he untied his green bag and took out, one by one, his long, shining knives.

Babette ran to the board and drew a chalk-line; then Pietro threw himself forward, poising a knife by the blade, in his right hand. The knife flashed for a moment in the sun and then buried itself in the wood in the centre of the white line. After this, Pietro threw knife after knife, above the other, not a hair's breadth from the mark.



There was a murmur of applause. Pietro looked at the horseman—he sat motionless.

Babette ran and drew the knives, returning them to Pietro; then kissing her hand to the spectators, in the direction of the motionless horseman, she placed herself against the board—folding her arms.

Pietro stepped forward. He smiled as the spectators looked at each other apprehensively.

"O luce di quest' anima," he sang softly, and hurled one shimmering blade.

A moment later the knife clung, shivering to the wood, at the girl's feet; another was planted at her knee and almost impaled the hem of her short skirts; another struck the board at her thigh; another grazed her arm; another settled into the wood above her shoulder, and so on until only two knives remained. Pietro had left a place for but one—directly beside his sister's left shoulder. Babette smiled from between the rows of shining knives. Pietro had made a mistake! Where would he put the tenth knife?

Pietro glanced at the horseman. He was still motionless, his face inexpressive. The crowd waited. Some of the onlookers had blanched faces and some affected carelessness. One lady retired from the balcony.

"O luce di quest' anima," sang Pietro, springing forward.

The knife left his hand—his sister fell forward, leaving her outline traced in the mocking iron.

Women fainted on the balcony. In the crowd the awful catastrophe seemed to sap the springs of action. Men recoiled nervelessly.

Pietro threw up his arms and gave voice to wild Italian words. Then turning, he launched the tenth knife—and the horseman fell. Into the saddle sprang Pietro and before the onlookers regained their wits, he was gone!

V.

"WHEN the cause is lost, there is enough of words," say the Italians.

Whether Pietro by some dire accident, took the life of Babette, and, in his desperation, turned upon him who was to lure her away; or whether the double tragedy was brought about through design, calmly matured and carried out by superhuman will, may never be known, and it avails not to argue the matter.

A horse, easily identified, came back to Blythe the following day, bearing an empty saddle, and Pietro has never more been seen.

CHAPTER XIV.

THE LITTLE STRANGER.

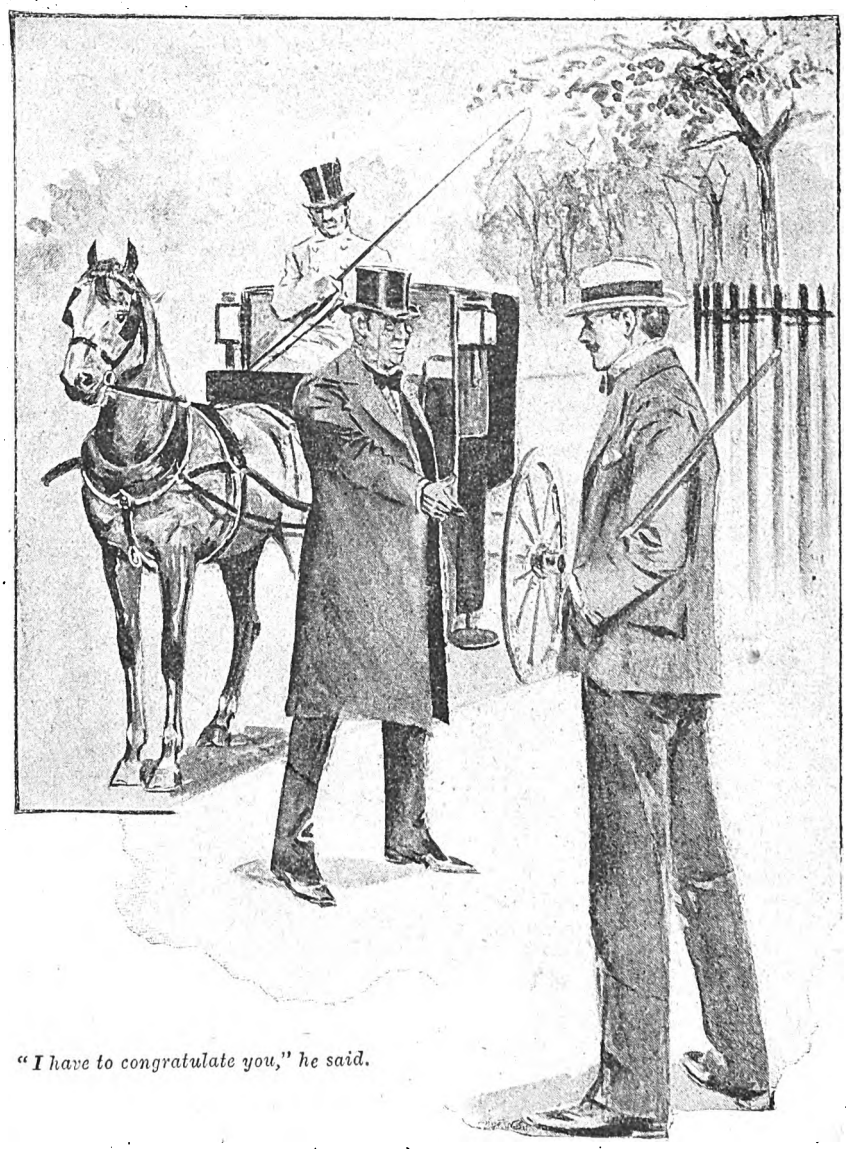
As Sefton walked slowly back to Ravenscroft Park, his feelings were a strange mixture of gladness and sorrow—joy, that Norah loved him still, and had stamina enough to boldly defy conventionality; pain, because he knew not sooner the great prize that might still have been his, but for Georgina.

He thought of the stir it would make when she flung up this great match for apparently no reason. How would her family take it? What would the world say?

Sefton had no thought to spare for the unhappy Duke of Malvern. He had always regarded him with utter disdain and contempt, as a miserable cur beneath his notice.

That Norah had been prevented in time from binding herself to such a husband gave Sefton infinite relief and satisfaction.

He was thankful his influence was strong enough to arrest this foolhardy marriage, to save his love from that worthless peer whom she could never even esteem.



"I have to congratulate you," he said.

The glamour of her presence was still upon Sefton—he could see again her sad, sweet smile, smell the odour of the lilies in her belt, trace the pattern of her hat's wide brim on the white forehead, from which the breeze blew back those tender locks of soft, curling hair.

He was intoxicated by his late proximity to the beautiful, pure being he had so ruthlessly condemned. To think he ever dared to call her faithless—"a creature without a heart"—when all the while her love lived on, though cowed and trembling, hidden in fear from a father's withering frown!

The knowledge of her fidelity, the unmistakable look he read in her adoring eyes—half shy of revealing the misery in their depths—gave Sir Sefton a certain pleasurable pain.

His step was more elastic than of late. He reacted every sentence that had passed between them, recalling Norah's gestures, her inflections of voice, as if she were beside him still.

The walk home seemed no distance while his mind was thus busily occupied. As he turned in at the gates of Ravenscroft Park the sound of carriage wheels arrested his attention.

It was the doctor's brougham coming away from the house.

The coachman drew up at seeing Sir Sefton, and the doctor sprang out.

"I have to congratulate you," he said, "on the unexpectedly quick arrival of a splendid son and heir!"

For a moment the "happy father" did not speak; then he nodded, as if in reply to some comment on the weather, and conventionally inquired after his wife's health.

"You need not have the slightest anxiety, Sir Sefton, her ladyship is as well as can possibly be expected."

"Thank you."

No great sign of relief thrilled through the simple word.

The doctor supposed him to be taken aback, dazed with joy, and with a cheerful "good-afternoon!" drove away.

Then Sir Sefton walked on to the house to interview the future baronet.

After their parting Norah Cannington retraced her footsteps very slowly to Rosemont.

She wore a look of proud exultant triumph, for she felt at last that she was strong—no longer a wavering girl to be swayed by the will of others, but a woman who did not fear to strike for liberty and love. Though she had no right to cherish Sefton in her heart, she gloried in letting him see and know she was not the false thing his fancy painted. Victor and her parents were forgotten in the all-absorbing thought that she should be whitewashed in Sefton's eyes.

For a while she lingered in the Rosemont woods, dreaming of dead days, panting under her swelling burden of freshly awakened emotion.

At last a look at her watch and the nearness of the tea hour brought her back to the practical side of this very difficult resolve.

Of course, Victor must be told at once. He was coming down from town by the evening train to stay over Sunday, and her people also would require to know this important change of plans immediately.

It was positively alarming to think of their horror, and the hundreds of guests to postpone and scores of things to counter-order.

The idea was really too bewildering to contemplate! She pressed her hands to her forehead with a groan. What could she do with the perpetual stream of presents which had flooded Rosemont for the last month? They must be packed and returned, but the thought of it appalled her.

Still, all the trouble in the world did not matter now. If the walls of the old home fell about her head, and her parent's wrath burnt like fierce destroying fire, it were better than the inferno of a loveless marriage!

The vain glory and glitter of the Duke's gold faded before her awakened vision. She would remember Sefton's counsel—"be true to yourself."

Norah felt like a heroine as she approached the house, her excitement increased momentarily. She was going into battle, civil war! Staunch to her colours, she would die sooner than surrender. Her own courage fairly amazed Lady Norah. Could she be the same flesh and blood, the actual being, who allowed herself to be led to the stake, who signed her doom on the night of Sir Reginald's death? Time and experience had moulded her character, and surely changed her so completely that only a shadow of the old substance remained.

Braced for the encounter, she joined her family circle unblushingly round the tea-table, handed her father his cup without trembling, and sipped her own with unnatural calmness.

"There are some parcels for you in the hall, dear," said Lady Cannington.

"More presents!" thought Norah. "What irony, and at such a moment too!"

"I will open them later," she replied.

How quietly happy her parents looked, smiling benignly on their pretty daughter. It seemed almost a sin to ruffle their calm in this peaceful, twilight hour.

"Where have you been all the afternoon?" asked Lord Cannington.

"Wandering about, going the round of my old haunts——"

"To bid them farewell?"

"Oh, no," retorted Norah quickly.

"Of course not," added her mother. "There is nearly a week yet, and Norah has many more opportunities for rambles with Victor. He will be here to-night."

The mention of her lover sent a pang through the girl. She just remembered that she must cause him pain. Perhaps he would suffer as acutely as she had in the past.

It was a pity, but it must be done. She should hate wounding Victor, for he had been always considerate to her.

She decided that her wisest plan would be to break it to him first, and then let it filter out till it reached her parents. He would be very upset, and leave early the following day.

She pictured the scene. It must of necessity be extremely harassing and distressing for them both.

Lady Cannington placed her arm affectionately round Norah.

"I expect you are looking forward to Victor's arrival," glancing at the clock. "I really believe that I enjoy his visits as much as you do. He will make a delightful son-in-law—always so thoughtful for my every little want, very different to the modern type of selfish manhood. He deserves to be happy. Ah! Norah," catching the girl's wistful smile, "you do not know how you have pleased me in your choice of a husband."

"Really; but, remember, he is not my husband yet."

Lady Cannington tapped Norah's shoulder playfully.

"Well, you won't be able to say that much longer. I really think I should break my heart if anything came between you now. But it is not likely to. You and dear Victor are so thoroughly at unison."

Her words fell like lashes cutting Norah to the quick.

The girl flung her arms passionately round her mother's neck and kissed her many times. She could not speak, for she feared to betray her agitation. But it was too late to draw back. She had pledged her word to Sefton, break her engagement she must and would, before the dawn of another day.

While dressing for dinner, she saw the carriage drive up that had gone to fetch the Duke.

She finished her toilette hastily. Her white dress looked so terribly bridal, she told herself, as she swept down the broad staircase. In trepidation she awaited Victor, sitting by the open window, gazing in the direction of Ravenscroft Park.

So wrapt was she in contemplation that she never heard the young Duke enter the room and steal softly to her side.

"Norah!"

The sound of his voice startled her; she rose to her feet with a shiver, letting him kiss her through sheer force of habit without a protest.

The kiss did not repulse her, though it could never thrill.

Victor had a strangely gentle manner with women.

Norah regarded him critically.

He appeared in excellent mien. His face had filled out, there was a healthier colour in it. He looked broader across the shoulders than when she had first known him. People said he was immensely improved. To-night Norah agreed with them. There was a subtle change in her lover; He had developed from a boy into a man.

She rose to her feet with a shiver.

The bright light in Victor's eyes troubled her. Little he guessed how soon his ardour must be deadened! She tried to speak, but while he murmured lover's raptures the words were forced back in her throat.

At last she saw an opportunity—the moment had come to strike. She laid her hand tenderly, but firmly, on his shoulder, looking straight into his eyes with unswerving determination.

But the fates were against her, for as she opened her lips to speak Lady Cannington sailed into the room with a warm welcome for her future son-in-law.

"Perhaps it is better," thought Norah, "I will tell him in the garden afterwards, he will be stronger to bear it fed than fasting."

She avoided her father's eyes as they went in to dinner, for a wave of the old fear crept over her.

Lady Norah fully calculated the consequences of this enormous offence she had promised Sefton to commit.

No one remarked on her pallor, or the distrait air. People in love are forgiven much.

Victor was full of conversation, and his fiancée listened with her eyes fixed pathetically upon him. She was wondering how he could talk and laugh, with his doom so near. Surely he must feel some warning pang; a presentiment of danger ahead.

"By-the-way," said Lord Cannington, "I hear there is a son and heir at Ravenscroft, born this afternoon. How delighted Sefton will be!"

A sudden rush of hot colour flooded Norah's cheeks, and crept over her neck. The news gave her a strangely painful shock. Sefton, a proud and happy father. Bah! the thought sickened and revolted her.

It was all very well for him to talk, and pretend that he did not love his wife. For what other reason could he have married her? Now he was not contented with Georgina and his child, but must needs step in to ruin his old love's brilliant prospects; to make her a byeword amongst her friends, a black sheep in her own family; the talk and laughing stock of everyone! Norah knew Society so well—the unkind sayings, the misinterpretations it loves to place upon things it cannot understand. As likely as not rumour would declare that the Duke of Malvern had discovered a discreditable episode in Lady Norah's past, and thrown her over at the last moment. No one would really credit her with having jilted him, or if they did, she would be branded as a flirt and a fool. Surely she must have been mad that afternoon in the scented lanes, the victim of a morbid and unlawful passion, a tool in the hands of Georgina's husband, who was rejoicing to-night over the birth of his first-born!

What an infinity of worry and annoyance would be saved if, after all, she, Norah, failed to alter this existing arrangement. A sigh of intense relief broke from her, as she mentally reprieved herself.

"I must write and congratulate Sefton," declared Lady Cannington, little guessing how heartily she should have blessed that infant for bringing Norah to her senses.

In Lady Cannington's eyes it would have been nothing short of lunacy to relinquish the worldly benefits obtainable by marriage with the Duke.

So the evening passed peacefully away, and Norah sang love sonnets in a faint and weary voice, feeling herself a hopeless fraud, a deserter from the ranks of that civil war, which was to have broken upon Rosemont like a mighty storm.

She could not explain to Sefton the change this news had wrought in her, it must be left to his imagination.

Pleading fatigue Norah retired early, but her good-night smile was very sweet, softened by a new tenderness as Victor took her hand.

"He is too young to suffer," she thought. "I am glad I spared him."

"You are knocked up," he murmured concernedly; "you have been doing too much! How many letters have you written to-day?"

"Only twenty! But that was nothing; they were not very long, you may be sure. My walk this afternoon tired me. The sun was fierce and the air oppressive; I thought I should have fainted!" half closing her eyes with a little shudder.

"Did you go far, dearest?"

"No, but quite far enough."

Her words had a double meaning. The Duke was blissfully unconscious. "Sleep well," he said.

CHAPTER XV.

An Unwelcome Visitor.

As Sir Sefton looked at the tiny atom of humanity lying in its swing cot no flood of fatherly affection rushed into his heart. He wished now that the child had never been born, since its existence could only be another link in the chain that bound him to Georgina. Her blood flowed in the veins of the heir to Ravenscroft, and would descend to taint the strain from generation to generation—there lay the sting! The silken curtains of the cot he noticed were the Ravenscroft colours. It was only a small matter, but it annoyed him beyond measure. He longed to tear them down. His fingers instinctively tightened on the soft frills, but he pulled himself together, alarmed at the folly of his intended action.

"He's a beautiful boy," said the nurse.

"Beautiful!" incredulously ejaculated Sir Sefton, regarding his offspring with something of a sneer. "Oh, yes, of course!"

He turned away, ashamed to look his son's admiring attendant in the eyes. What if she read from the father's face the feverish workings of his excited brain?

The interview with Norah haunted him not unpleasurably, but with such force that at moments he forgot Georgina and the child stood between them, remembering only Norah was about to abandon the Duke, that her heart was all his—Sefton's—just as in the old days!

He waited in restless expectation for the announcements that the great wedding was not to be, spending his time in drawing mental pictures of the Cannington home circle now that the bomb had burst.

Even his horses were neglected, and a telegram, offering for one of the best, was never answered.

But as the days slipped by and no change in Rosemont arrangements were announced, a horrible doubt crept over Sefton. Could it be possible Norah was only playing with him again to pass an idle hour, acting a dramatic scene to stir the monotony of a quiet afternoon? Or, worse still, was it from a keen sense of cruel humour, or to make him ridiculous in his own eyes, that she had led him to believe in her once again? Fool that he was to fall into the trap—a dupe, a subject for sport, an object of derision!

Norah most likely walked away laughing, with just the faintest touch of pity for his blatant stupidity. "He thinks I am going to give up my whole future," she had probably said, with a shrug of her shoulders—"a brilliant career sacrificed to him!" Yes, the idea was strangely absurd; but he had credited it, hugged it to his empty heart!

The week slipped by. Oh, false Norah, you did not dream how subtly your rash promise was destroying Sefton's brain!

The wedding-day broke bright and sunny over the country side. He heard the booming of jubilant guns, the clanging of marriage bells. They woke a dark feeling of despair in his soul, and, worse than sorrow, the overpowering passion of hate, coursing like fire through his veins.

He rode for the first time that week to try and distract his mind, but as he guided his horse in the direction of the station, passing under triumphal arches, and greeted on all sides by waving flags, it was hardly conducive to forgetfulness. Crowds of villagers with eager expectant faces were waiting to get a glimpse of the bride and bridegroom on their way to the train. A sense of deadly repulsion numbed Sefton as he heard a cry of: "Here they come!" and a moment later met the Duchess of Malvern's eyes as she was whirled past with her newly-made husband. He stared at her stonily without lifting his hat, though she lent forward and bowed sweetly, raising her eyebrows in surprise at receiving no response.

That was Sefton's only scrap of consolation as he returned to his wife's sick bed. But in the evening as he sat alone he thought long and seriously of the bride's astonished expression when he cut her that afternoon. A fear which only half expressed itself then, grew and developed momentarily till his brow was moist and his hands trembled. Had he in his over-wrought and aggravated condition of mind imagined the whole scene with Norah in the lanes? He was thinking of her so intensely as he walked past the Rosemont woods, and lately his brain had played him false on more than one occasion, that he stood now in perplexed wonder, pondering this terrible suggestion with parted lips and eyes widened with horror. Surely he had seen her, heard her, touched her, and yet her form began to take a shadowy appearance as he recalled it. Was it likely she would have spoken so strongly, and gone away to-day on her honeymoon without a word, a sign? At least, after such a conversation she must have written some explanation.

Occasionally this last month hallucinations troubled him. He fancied he saw his father standing behind Georgina's chair as she sat on the terrace in the twilight. The vision always faded when he approached, as if frightened of her living husband, or ashamed to meet the eyes of that son whom his folly had injured for life.

It depressed Sefton, sitting alone at night in the study that had once been his father's. He turned up the lamp to its brightest and wished that Douglas Shirling were with him.

He vacated the late Sir Reginald's chair, for a ghostly sensation oppressed him as of a second body forcing itself on to the seat.

"My nerves are cranky," he told himself; "it's a thousand to one I never met Norah at all that day. She was far too occupied last week to be wandering about alone and wasting her time with me, a poor, discarded lover—married into the bargain! It isn't at all likely."

So the housekeeper was seated beside him . . . chatting over old times.

The improbability of her vows assured Sefton of this fact. He sighed heavily.

His face was white with fear.

"Madness!" he muttered. "My God! — it can't be! There is no insanity in our family. My father killed himself deliberately and intentionally when his life became intolerable. He knew what he was doing, and I believe his head was never more clear than on that last night."

As Sefton spoke he traced a shadowy outline against the empty chair. The sight filled him with trepidation—he made a dash for the door and rushed wildly upstairs.

The following day he read the accounts of the wedding, and flung aside the papers in disgust.

"Elle est virginale!" he muttered with a hard laugh. "What a dream—what a myth!"

"Sir Sefton does not trouble himself about the baby," said the nurse in an injured voice. "He never comes to see it, or even notices it when I pass him in the garden unless I poke the poor dear infant under his nose."

"A most unnatural father," declared Lady Ravenscroft's maid. "But there! he's not what I call a family man. Don't seem to bother about his wife nor nothing, and wasn't even at home when the poor dear lady was at her worst. A fine fuss he would have been in, too, had he come back and found her gone. Them careless gentlemen always expect everything to go right, but her ladyship don't pamper him. He ought to be proud of this beautiful boy," bending down and making a horrible gurgling sound over the infant's face, which awoke a mirthless smile. "But his grandma hasn't been to see him either. Sir Sefton says it's because she isn't well enough—but it strikes me she takes the opportunity of being ill if there is ever any talk of her coming here."

With a wise shake of the head the maid hurried downstairs, only to return a moment later, with a message for Lady Ravenscroft.

"If you please, my lady," she said, "there's an elderly person at the front door, asking to see the heir. She says her name is Mrs. Leslie, and that she was housekeeper here before you was married."

Georgina turned fiercely—the housekeeper's insults on the day of Sir Reginald's death had rankled unceasingly.

"Don't let her in. She shan't see the child. Tell her to go away, she has no right here now, the impertinent creature! My doors are closed to Mrs. Leslie, at any time. Remember, she is not to be admitted!"

Georgina spoke excitedly, and fell back on the pillows exhausted by the effort.

"Very good, my lady."

The door closed and the maid delivered her mistress's answer in a modified tone to the indignant housekeeper.

"I'm not to come in! I as lived in this house for nigh thirty years, and now visits the Dowager Lady Ravenscroft regular once a month? Stuff and nonsense, young woman, there must be some mistake. I know the present Lady Ravenscroft is not very partial to me, but she can't prevent me taking a look at dear Sir Sefton's first-born."

"Why, Jenny, is that you?" cried a familiar voice, at the sound of which Mrs. Leslie's lips expanded into a broad smile. But as Sir Sefton advanced with outstretched hand she staggered back against the door, a cry of horrified surprise escaping her.

"Lor, now, Master Sefton, and what ails you?" she exclaimed, recovering herself with an effort, and advancing to scan his face more closely.

Could those be the same laughing, boyish eyes she had known in her old days, grown careworn and haggard? Was that white face, that weary langour, those lines about his mouth and eyes, the outcome of one year of matrimony?

"I—I am quite well," said Sir Sefton, a touch of annoyance in his tone.

"But you don't look it. Bless me if I ever saw such a change in anyone. But, there! you want me or your mother to see you takes care of yourself—you never was extra hardy." She spoke as if he were still a child.

"Don't trouble your head about me," retorted Sir Sefton lightly. "I suppose you have come to see the baby—eh?"

"Not sleeping well of a nights," murmured Mrs. Leslie, still regarding him furtively. "I know, and eating your scrap of bacon for breakfast and nothing more till nighttime. Just what your ma feared, poor dear lady!"

"To re-assure yourself come in and lunch with me. The gong's just sounded, and Lady Ravenscroft's soup has been taken up. Mary, lay an extra place for Mrs. Leslie. Come along, Jenny," taking her arm and dragging her somewhat unwillingly to the dining-room.

"I really don't like to, sir," she protested, "but, lor! you're just the same Master Sefton, and there's no gainsaying you."

So the housekeeper was seated beside him, and a very good meal he made, chatting over old times, with quite the former sparkle in his eyes.

"We will go up to the nursery afterwards," he said, "and you shall show me all the good points in my son that I have failed to discover."

Mrs. Leslie fidgeted uneasily, toying with her cheese.

"Lady Ravenscroft sent down word, sir, as how she did not wish me to see him."

"Oh! nonsense! Georgina's light-headed, you must not notice her."

In Mrs. Leslie's presence Sefton felt almost a boy again, and while these two were enjoying their friendly gossip, Mary, the maid, was repeating the incident to Lady Ravenscroft upstairs.

"It can't be!" Georgina cried, with flaming cheeks. "Sir Sefton is actually lunching in company with that abominable creature? Do my ears deceive me?"

"No, my lady, he's got her in as sure as sure."

Georgina clenched her teeth. She remembered the severe shaking she had received in the hour of her anguish from Mrs. Leslie's stalwart arms.

"Take this soup away, Mary, and bring me nothing more." As the door closed, the invalid gave vent to a hiss of rage. Her husband's action not only violated her snobbish notions of propriety, but cut and wounded her beyond measure. She could hear their voices as they ascended the stairs to the nursery. How pleasant Sefton could be when he chose!

"This way, Mrs. Leslie. What, caught your dress? Never mind, nurse will mend it!"

Georgina smiled bitterly.

"I should like to see nurse!" she thought. "They won't catch her dancing attendance on a housekeeper!"

Mrs. Leslie went into raptures over the size of the baby's limbs.

"And he's got a look of you about him, sir," she declared, "except for his eyes." She hesitated, as if deliberating whether to own an unpleasant truth. Then candour overcame her tact, while she murmured apologetically, pointing to the upper part of the face: "From the top of the nose he's a Pluff."

The words sent a pang of revulsion through Sefton.

"Yes," he retorted gloomily. "They are his mother's eyes."

JUMBLED STORY No. 7.]

"THE DREAM OF AUTHORS."

It was a sultry day in July when I noticed that for the honour depended on my silence. And so I could obtain.

I have always taken a particular interest in the friendly policeman, whom I cultivated, informed me he wrote an ode to an actress.

She, poor girl, being in sore need of money, took it to his rooms in a back slum off the Strand.

I once knew one of these miserables who had an Eton shoulders, a white face, with high, intellectual-looking "Dreams," that is to say he was the writer of one of the vague rumours were spread everywhere, The public was thinking all day and all night; thinking and published nothing since his one great work. One day passed. Then I ran up to my friend's room.

For twenty years I had known him to be selling the manuscript.

As I was going up the rickety staircase, a strange called 'Dreams.'

I made a few purchases, and went round to his room. These were afterwards published in a book. It was 'Dreams.'

And what is more this man was the author of the Devil. There is only one way by which you may be exhausted.

"I went to a drawer in my table, and handed him whisky, and we would light a fire and chat together.

He took it, and without a word left the room.

"You saw the man who went out just now. He was my brother."

He had a mass of dark wavy hair hanging on his finger towards me.

I pulled my hat over my eyes, and waited until he had entered. "That man who went down? He was my brother.

The old man fell back on the pillows, and seemed something worthy of his reputation.

I would bring him a bottle of port, or some of my old twaddle.

This is the match-seller's story, and it seemed to have demanded that the author of "Dreams" should produce an agony of fear. 'You may have anything that you accused; I felt that all eyes were upon me as I went a day.

"He wanted to know whether I had ever written matches at his position in Fleet Street without missing it, and then spent half his fortune in advertising it.

The intensest excitement prevailed in literary circles; 'You—a thief. You, a Montgomery, a low down thief!'

I watch them as they stand on the pavement and stood there in the open door, and pointed an accusing inquiry, and preserve a woman's honour—you know her brother. The public are still waiting.

It was then found out that the poem was the merest everything. I have collected proofs. Answer me my silence. You know her, perhaps. The heroine of the manuscript for the publishers, when the door opened, finest works that ever mortal penned.

During that time I had become so acquainted and Christ Church education, and who had won by his together in a firm in the City. That was long ago.

A tall, well-dressed man was coming down, wearing a forehead.

"Did you see him," he cried, almost before I had begun, would be cut off. I fell at his feet.

My friend noticed the incredulous expression on my face. By speaking he could ruin me. My career, not yet long black coat.

"I was working in my room one evening, preparing its circulation for the next week was as much as that of selling matches. She looked at me with pity, and then previous day.

"'Geoff,' I cried, 'believe me——"

"'Pish!' he interrupted brutally. 'I would not rob their ill-clad bodies. Some of them have their stories.

"'Thief,' he hissed between his clenched teeth. Oh, the agony of it! But a woman's honour hung on about my duties. I did not mind, for I was thinking this: What were you doing at the hour when the cheque exhausted him. There is yet the sequel to be told.

It will be remembered that Geoffery Montgomery had suspected me of stealing the cheque. My brother had all the rest of its kind put together.

"I looked up eagerly. Anything that would prevent thing happened.

"He interrupted me with a gesture.

Presently he told me his story.

"'There is only one way by which you may be saved,' and my brother stood before me. I see him now, as he was stolen?'

"'Well,' the old man continued, 'that woman's saved.'

"'I will give you everything that I possess,' I cried in with him that occasionally I persuaded him to take me to at my work, I was not brilliant. With my brother it had been found out, and I was shielding a woman's

"The old man pressed his hand to his forehead.

It was the reputed author of "Dreams!"

The magazine was an obscure little publication, but would let me have all the profits. He was very kind was different, and he was soon to be made a partner. I answer nothing. I was entirely in my brother's powers dreaming; occasionally I wrote down my thoughts.

It was for this reason that he had applied to his another book. He said that if I sold it to him he I received my dismissal from my employers. They remind me of her.

"A few weeks later she passed me in the street. I was the editor of a certain magazine. He paid her £100 for she threw me a copper. I have kept it, you see, in that is the old story. I was suspected, although I was not ask for. I will sell you my soul——'

"It was impossible for me to say. I was tongue-tied. I think you said, she was the heroine of 'Dreams'—there about the last chapters of my book.

"One day a cheque was missing from our office. It will take from you. That is—your book.'

"When Geoffrey and I were young men we worked my brother repeated. 'There is only one thing that I forgotten to speak for me. But I did not care. Nothing and generous. I wonder why?"

"'It is no good,' he said, 'for you to deny it. I know that the old match-seller had been taken ill on the shiver in their rags; as the fierce rain pours down on brain almost every honour it had been possible to name.

"I was ever a dreamer, and, although I plodded away could be no price too high to pay for that.

"My surprise may be imagined when the next morning first time the old man was absent from his post; a little velvet case on the wall. It is all that I have to toilers of the street.

KEY TO JUMBLED STORY. No. 4.]

HER LOVE LETTERS.

"I WILL not give you back your letters," said he.

"But you have no right to keep them," said I, "now that you are not engaged to me any longer, Mr. Howard."

"Oh, my dear," he answered, "you cannot have all the advantage! You have jilted me, and you can say what you please, and I can prove the truth by our correspondence. I always kept the rough draft of mine, and there's no law in the land to make me give up my own letters."

"Gentlemen don't talk of law; they think of honour," said I.

"Ah, whatever you please, Miss Travis. I suppose the fact that my grandfather did not leave me his property has a good deal to do with things being as they are. Good-bye, Miss Travis."

But I must have my letters back, and that night as I sat up in bed I thought of the way to do it.

Ben—I mean Mr. Howard; he was Ben to me no longer—lived with Sally Grey's mother.

Sally was a girl you could trust. She was a plain little thing, with something the matter with her spine, but just as good as gold. I had told her everything, and now I intended to tell her the facts of the case and get her to let me go into Ben's room while he was away and look for my letters.

I knew that Ben—I mean Mr. Howard—was out by eight o'clock, and at nine I tapped on the basement window, and Sally, who was making a cherry pie, looked up and saw me and opened the door herself.

And then and there I sat down and told her all about it and about the letters.

"And I want you to help me to get them, Sally," I said. "To let me get into Mr. Howard's room and take what belongs to me. And you will, won't you?"

"It is a splendid idea," said Sally. "You'll have to wait until lunch is over, and Miss Peck and Mrs. Jones go out. Then mother will lie down for a nap, and Biddy will be getting things ready for dinner, and Sarah rubbing the forks and glasses. I'll get the pass key—of course we have one for every room. Now, do stay for lunch, darling."

And cold shivers ran up my back when Sally unlocked the door and we were really in the room—his room.

"I suppose he keeps the letters in his desk," said she. "I know he doesn't put them in his trunk, but this key unlocks all the drawers and desks in the house. We keep it to lend the lodgers when they lose their key-rings. Now, I shall lock you in and sit on the stairs to keep watch, though nothing can happen. I'll come for you exactly at four."

I drew a chair to the desk, sat down, and turned the key in the lock.

There was nothing inside but some notepaper, and a little package of "legal cap," and pens, and inkstand and a blotting-pad.

I shut the desk and looked in the drawer. There was a cigar box.

"Oh, dear," I thought, "where can I look now?" And I was about to try my key on the drawers when I heard the street door open and bang shut and feet ascend the stairs.

Then a key rattled in the lock, and I did the only possible thing to avoid discovery—at least for a moment.

There was a wardrobe cupboard with curtains before it. I ran towards it and stood bolt upright in the corner as Ben—I mean Mr. Howard—entered, followed by another man.

They shut the door and sat down. They lit their pipes.

"Ben," said the strange person, "you are not looking well."

"I'm feeling wretchedly," said Mr. Howard. "I wouldn't tell another fellow, but I believe my heart is broken—there, don't laugh. You see that photograph on the mantelpiece?

"We were engaged to each other," said Ben, "and I loved her better than my life, and I thought she was very fond of me. But you know how grandfather cut me out of his will, and then a rich old fellow began to call upon her, and she picked a quarrel with me—that's all. She's a mercenary little wretch, but I—I am a fool, Henry.

"I love her still. I shall keep her photograph all my life—and her letters to read and kiss—I would not give them up."

"Stuff and nonsense!" said this Mr. Henry—heartless brute!—"you'll find a better girl in no time."

"There is but one woman in the world for me," said Ben. "There now, I've done. You know my trouble. I'll hide it from the world, and you will never speak of it to anyone, I know."

"You'll not have any trouble in six months," said the horrible Mr. Henry. "Now, you'll come up and spend your holiday with me, won't you? I'll just step out and buy those things for my wife, and you pack up what you need and meet me at the station."

Then Henry walked away, and Ben—yes, Ben, my poor Ben—took a bundle of letters from his bosom and kissed them, and took down my photograph and kissed that, and then, having pulled a bag from the corner, he walked straight to the wardrobe and drew the curtain back.

The next moment he was staring at me and I at him.

"Is it her ghost?" I heard him say to himself, and I—well there I was—it was not a situation to impart dignity.

"It is only me in the flesh, Ben," I said. "I wish I was a ghost so that I could vanish. And now you can boast all your life, if you like—and I will say something. Firstly, I did not care about your grandfather's horrid money. Secondly, I—I—only meant to tiff a little—not to break off, only to frighten you. Thirdly, I—I—oh, I've found out that you really truly love me, Ben—and though it is broken off—I—I want to know—I used to love you very much—and I couldn't be going to marry old Mr. Javerell, because he is engaged to my Aunt Ophelia, and he never wanted me. I came to get my letters, but you may keep them. I—I've misunderstood you, and though we part for ever, forgive me, Ben."

And Sally was my bridesmaid when I married, and is to-day my dearest friend, and the only one who knows how Ben and I came to make up our quarrel.

THE SACRIFICE OF NATHAN BAXTER.

A Lancashire Story.

I.

It was eleven o'clock in the morning, and the July sun poured down in a fierce, blinding glare. The river murmured along under the old grey stone bridge, kissed by the bright green alders which bent lovingly over its sparkling bosom; and between the heat and lack of custom, old Jerry in the whitewashed toll-house had fallen fast asleep.

The village of Wenley seemed also to be asleep, for no sounds of life were heard save the rattle of a mowing machine and the clang of the blacksmith's hammer. The high road stretched away in a long white streak, and the rich green of the hedgerows was hidden by the fine white dust which settled upon the leaves, and marred the brilliancy of the poppies along the roadside. The few sweets in the window of the post-office looked sticky and unpalatable, and the dogs lay panting in the shade; the roses drooped in the little gardens, and nothing seemed to flourish save the glaring sunflowers.

It really was very hot, as old Nathan Baxter shuffled along the village street, leaning heavily upon his crooked stick, nodding, smiling, and stopping now and then to exchange a few words with the folks, or playfully prod a sunburnt urchin with his stick. A queer figure he cut with his wrinkled face, and short, grey hair, his slim form and rusty black coat, and thin, bent legs cased tightly in corduroys and leggings—for he had spent the best half of his life on horseback, and in his old age he wore the garments he had been used to.

Slowly he shuffled down the road to widow Hinchcliffe's cottage. Phœbe was feeding a swarm of hens and chickens as he came up.

"Mornin', Phœbe," said he.

"Mornin', Nathan," returned she.

Then there was a silence for a minute or two as Nathan leant upon the gate and surveyed the brood.

"Nice hens them," said he at last. "Dun they lay well?"

"Ay, pretty fair," said Phœbe; "but are yo' not comin' in aat o't sun?" and she led the way into the cool kitchen followed by the old man.

"Phew! grand weather for the crops," said he, as he sat down by the door; "where's thi mother?"

"Hoo's i't shippon, somewheer," responded the girl.

"Ay, to be sure;" and he relapsed into silence again, watching the girl's deft fingers as she folded up some newly-washed clothes. Phœbe Hinchcliffe was a pleasant, fair-haired girl of twenty-one, a very fair sample of the average English country girl. Nathan would have called her beautiful, but then he did not look at her with the eyes of an ordinary observer. He had watched her grow up since she was a playful little brat of five who used to steal his pipe, and hide his stick as he sat and talked with her father; and so when Fred Hinchcliffe went to the churchyard, he, Nathan, looked upon himself as somewhat responsible for little Phœbe, and as she grew up and blossomed into womanhood, the old man grew prouder and prouder of her, and in his eyes there wasn't a girl in the village "could hold a candle to her," as he expressed it.

By-and-bye, however, he broke the silence:

"I say, Phœbe, when're yo' and Tom Crossley goin' to be wed?"

"Eh? I dunno."

"Yo' dunno! that's quare; ain't he axed yer?"

"Well, mebbe he has."

"Well, what dun yo' mean by yo' dunno?"

"It's this way, yo' see" (she used to call him "Uncle" sometimes), "Tom's savin' up; and when he's enough money to set up a-farming we'll be wed."

"And how long do yo' reckon that'll be?"

"Two or three year, mebbe."

"Eh, dear, but that's a great while."

"Not it," put in Mrs. Hinchcliffe, who came in at this moment. "I dunno what hoo wants gettin' wed at all for; leastways for the next five or six year. How dun yo' think I'm to manige this farm all by miself. Sich nonsense!"

"He, he!" chuckled Nathan; "ye didn't think it sich nonsense when poor Fred Hinchcliffe axed yo' to marry him, did ye now?"

"Humph!" responded the widow. "Fred had a house to put me in, and Tom Crossley hasn't."

"But," said Nathan, "I reckon that's not Tom's fault."

Poor Phœbe sighed over her clothes.

"Well, I'll just drop down to Owd Jim's and get mi beer, and then I'll be off whoam."

It was noticed by the landlady at the "Lion" that day that Nathan, contrary to his usual custom, sat and drank his beer and smoked his pipe without saying a word to anyone, and then emptying his mug and knocking the ashes out of his pipe, he ejaculated: "Hang me! I'll do it," and stumped off.

It did not take him long to reach his little two-roomed cottage down the back lane; and after he had eaten his usual meal of bread and cheese he lit his pipe, sat down by the door, and gazed out over the fields with a look of deep thoughtfulness. Presently he rose, looked up and down the lane, and then closing and bolting the door, he shuffled into his bedroom. Nathan did not boast much furniture, and beyond the bed, a chair, and a cumbersome old chest of drawers, there was scarcely anything in the room. To the chest of drawers, however, Nathan bent his steps, and, after much fumbling, drew forth a bag from the bottom drawer.

"Funds is gettin' low, Nathan," said he, peering into the bag; and then, sitting on the chair, he emptied the contents upon the bed, displaying a little heap of gold and silver. Then he began to count, and for a while there was a steady chink of gold in the room. "Forty-five pun eleven shillin's," said he at last; "wouldn't last long—only a couple of years, mebbe, then ye'd have to go, Nathan. Ye mut just as weel go now. Ay, ay! ye've lived longer'n ye thowt, Nathan. Ay, ye'd better go now." Then he separated the silver from the gold, and counting out ten sovereigns, he put the rest back into the bag, and tied the string tightly round the mouth.

That evening, as the setting sun was gilding the gables of Mile Bank Farm, toning the whitewashed walls with its mellow radiance, and converting its latticed windows into splashes of orange fire, old Nathan stepped over the threshold.

"Evenin', Ned," said he to Mr. Crossley, who sat smoking in his ancient chair.

"Why, bless me, Baxter, is that yo'?" said Mr. Crossley.

"Ay," returned Nathan, seating himself, and nodding familiarly to the other occupants of the kitchen. "Hev ye getten yer hay in yet?"

"Verra near," returned the other.

"Good crop?"

"Pretty fair," and the two men relapsed into silence.

"Wheer's Tom?" at last broke out Nathan.

"He's at t' back somewhere," said Mr. Crossley; and Nathan, picking up his hat and stick, sallied forth in the direction indicated.

He found Tom seated upon the shaft of a cart, mending some harness.

"Hullo, Nathan!" said Tom as he came up.

"How d'ye do?" said Nathan; "how's business with ye?"

"Pretty good," responded the other. Then the old man pottered round the pigstyes, peeped into the cow shed, and stroked the watch dog, looking furtively every now and then at Tom. At last he came back and took a seat on the shaft beside him.

"Say, Tom, when're yo' and Phœbe goin' to be wed?"

The young man looked steadily at Nathan for a few seconds before he answered: "Just as soon as I can."

"Savin' up, aren't ye?" queried Nathan.

"Ay," responded Tom, "and it's slow wark, too."

"If ye had £40 now, d'ye think ye could manage it?" said the old man, shifting nervously in his seat.

"Jist you try me," said Tom with a grin.

"Mebbe £35 would do," said Nathan.

"Mebbe it would," said Tom, "I'd try it."

"Well, there, by Gosh! try it!" roared the excited old man, throwing the leather bag at the feet of the astonished Tom, and striding away towards the pigstye, chuckling as though he would burst.

Tom looked from Nathan to the bag, and finally picked it up, opened it, and counted out the gold—£35.

Now Nathan had the reputation of being "pretty well off" in the village, as he had lived there for the last seven or eight years without doing a stroke of work of any description, and never seeming to want for money. He was generally supposed to have rich relations in Bracebridge—the market town ten miles away—though no one ever saw any of them. However, they thoroughly believed the old man to have plenty of money, so that Tom did not feel so surprised as he might have done at the unexpected turn of fortune's wheel.

At last the old man came back.

"Is this for me?" asked Tom.

"Who else d'ye think it's for?" queried Nathan; "but I say, Tom, d'ye think as ye can get the weddin' o'er in a month or two, as I'm going to mi friends in a month or two, and I want to see yo' and Phœbe wed before I go?"

"Goin' to leave Wenley?" said Tom, aghast.

"Ay; ye see I'm gettin' owd, and it's not good fur a man to live all by himself at my time o' life, so I'm goin' to mi reelashuns."

"Well, God bless ye, Nathan!" said Tom as he seized the old man's hand.

"Hush, lad!" said he; "promise me as ye'll not say anythin' about it, and get wed as quick as ye can." And the old fellow shuffled off down the road with his head high in the air, and a smile upon his wrinkled face, chanting in a thin, cracked voice: "Fol-de-rol, tol-de-rol, tol-de-rol, ay!"

II.

THE bells of Wenley church rang out with a deafening crash, scaring the lapwings as they wheeled across the bare cornfields, and drowning for the moment the song of a soaring skylark, as a little procession issued from the old ivy-grown porch. First came Tom Crossley, radiant in a silk hat, and smooth, broadcloth coat, and on his arm, in a simple country-cut gown of white muslin, leant Phœbe—now Mrs. Crossley. Behind them followed Nathan Baxter, tricked out in his best, flanked on one side by the widow Hinchcliffe, and on the other by the buxom form of Mrs. Crossley, whilst behind them beamed the jovial visage of Mr. Crossley, in the midst of a goodly number of farmers and housewives, and lads and lasses.

I will not attempt to describe how the foremost pair of the little procession were pelted with rice and slippers during their short walk from the church to Tom's farm, the speeches that were made after breakfast, the toasts that were drunk, or how old Nathan in the fulness of his joy sang the "Vicar of Bray," or how old Jerry the toll-keeper fiddled until his "E" string broke, and the company danced till they were fain to stop from sheer exhaustion; but as the clock in the church chimed two, and the moonlight cast long shadows athwart the lane, old Nathan ambled homeward in a rather erratic fashion.

* * * * *

Next evening, as the sun was setting down in the west, casting a glamour over field and hedgerow, lending a beauty even to grimy brick tenements, and transfiguring the telegraph wires into threads of burnished gold, Nathan stepped through the gateway of the Bracebridge Union Workhouse. A little parley with the gatekeeper and he was shown up to the governor's room, and as he stumped along the cheerless corridor he chuckled: "He, he, he! By Gosh, I did 'em that time! Gone to me relashuns—he, he, he!"

SWEET RESOURCE.

"And she left him at once, of course," said Bramley, stroking his moustache in slow and meditative fashion.

"Left him?" repeated the little lawyer, with a low chuckle. "Left him? My dear fellow, where did you get your education? Just tell me that. Do you know anything about the kind of women that allow men to throw them down and walk over them, and even dance on them for pastime? Such women have to be thrown out of a fifth-storey window, and to have their heads smashed open before they conclude to give up caring for a man. I don't say that it went that far with Millicent Hastings. She loved that brute, and she'd been brought up with certain old-fashioned ideas about wifely duty."

"What did he marry her for; her money?" asked Bramley.

"Don't ask me," the lawyer laughed.

Both men were silent for a moment. It was a sultry June afternoon, and they sat looking out of the window of their club at a few slow-faring carriages. A victoria passing with a single occupant caught their attention.

"By George!" said the little lawyer emphatically. "By George! Speak of angels and you hear the rustle of their—silk petticoats. Millicent Hastings!"

"In that carriage?" queried Bramley.

"In that carriage, as sure as my name is Lloyd. She looks well, too. You wouldn't think she'd been through so much. Well, well, well!"

"She looks like a good woman," said Bramley. "You think she walked straight in spite of all?"

Lloyd put up his hands in mock despair. "What do I know? She's married again. Got a good fellow for a husband—Western man. Name of Weatherly. I don't suppose she cares so much about him as she did about Hastings; women never go crazy about steady, good husbands."

"Tell me the story you were going to tell. That is if talking isn't too warm work for you just now."

Lloyd fell back in his chair and reflected.

"It's six years ago," he began slowly, "since I first met Millicent Hastings. They'd been married six months, and were rather keeping in quiet because of her relatives. It seems she was an orphan, and she married without the consent of an aunt who was going to leave her some property. However, as Millicent was twenty-two or more that didn't especially matter. Hastings had been speculating and had lost heavily. He was in a shaky condition financially and pretty badly unnerved, and came to my office in that condition one afternoon. I was out, and he left a note asking me for Heaven's sake to call at his house that afternoon if possible. Of course I made it possible, and got there at eight. I'd never been there before, and had only a vague idea that he lived in a fashionable apartment house near the park. It was a nice place, I found, a very nice place—quiet and well arranged. I went up to the sixth floor, and rang the bell. The door opened presently, and showed me a small, queer figure that I took to be that of the maid. 'I—I don't know,' she stammered, when I asked to see Hastings. 'He hasn't come yet. I hope he'll come very, very soon. I—I am so nervous.' Then I knew it wasn't the maid. She had a low, musical voice, peculiarly sweet and cultivated. 'This is Mrs. Hastings?' I inquired. 'Yes, yes; you must excuse my appearance. Pray step into the drawing-room. I sent away the maid yesterday, to economise for the present—while my husband's affairs are uncertain; and—and I've been working so hard to-day—and I don't know how to do anything, unfortunately.'

"By this time she had turned up the gas and I could see a very beautiful young face, flushed scarlet with heat and exertion, and with an accidental streak of coal black on one soft cheek. Her eyes were black and had a strange look of feverish excitement; and she wore a plain little gingham frock and had a towel for an apron. Her head was covered with a handkerchief, and altogether she looked as if she had been having a pretty hard time of it. There was a catch in her voice every time she spoke. 'I don't know,' she said, 'why he hasn't come. He comes home very late nowadays. I suppose he is so worried.'

"I couldn't help feeling a queer sort of pity for her, though for what reason I could not exactly explain. Just then another ring took her to the door again. This time it was a messenger boy. I could hear her ask eagerly for the ticket to be signed, and then the sound of the door closing and the tearing of an envelope. After a few seconds of strange silence she came back. I couldn't tell whether I imagined it, or whether she staggered. At all events, her face had a most pitiful and terrifying expression; I sprang up and caught her arm.

"'Sit down,' I said. 'Have you heard bad news?'

"It seemed as if she couldn't control her throat. Then after a moment of effort she said faintly and with a ghastly smile—'I—I—it's nothing. Only—only I thought it was a message for me from—from my—from Mr. Hastings. And I—I opened it—and it was not for me—but for him.' 'Nothing serious about that,' I said lightly. 'Oh, no,' she grasped, 'no, nothing so serious.' But I noticed that she clutched at the letter desperately and seemed to want to hide it even from herself. I wouldn't have been human if I hadn't felt curious about that letter."

Bramley cleared his throat and said mildly as the other paused for a moment:

"Letter from another woman, I suppose."

"It didn't occur to me," said Lloyd, with a smile, "and yet this was precisely the case."

"Go on," said Bramley, bridling a little over the fact of greater perspicuity than the lawyer had shown.

"Well," continued Lloyd, "there she sat, clutching the letter and looking—I can't tell you how she looked, but there was something terrifying about it to me. I don't know how long we sat there in silence—an uncomfortable kind of silence too, I must confess. But finally there was the click of a key in the door and the door opened. Hastings came lumbering into the drawing-room a moment later. He was a large man, tall, and well built. His face darkened at the sight of me, strange to say. And this nettled me. 'Look here,' said I, 'I'm in a great hurry. It was out of my time coming here to-night, but your note seemed imperative. Now, if there's anything so very pressing, I'm here; if not I must get away to my own home.' The woman got up and went slowly from the room. I thought she walked unsteadily. Hastings answered me in a thick sort of voice. I guessed at once that he'd been drinking. He wanted me to draw a bill of sale, he said, of a lot of personal property. I saw that he wasn't in a mood for business, and I made him a promise to be at my office at nine the next morning, and took a hasty leave. I was so upset by the curious appearance of his wife that I forgot to take with me the stick I carried, not an inveterate habit of mine, but only an occasional one. It was a stick that had just been presented to me, and when I reached the street entrance I remembered it and went back. Just as I was about to ring a sound startled me—a muffled kind of a scream. Then a heavy sound of something or somebody falling on the floor. I rang violently. Rang and kept my finger on the button, determined if he was beating her to scare him from it. I kept on ringing until the door was opened—by Mrs. Hastings. She had her hand pressed to her side, and there was blood from a small cut on the forehead. 'I left my stick,' I said. 'But what is the matter?' She could hardly speak. 'Nothing—I—just had a fall—tripped up over a—a hassock. It is nothing.' I looked at her with mingled pity and anger. It enraged me to hear her lie about it. Hastings' voice came thickly from the rear of the hall. 'You——' he used an oath and an uncomplimentary name, 'you will rob me of my letters, will you? I'll break your head.' I caught the woman by the arm, and dragged her sharply out into the hall. 'Look here,' I said, 'do you mean to let him kill you? He has struck you. Why deny it? Why allow it?' She began to tremble and shake hard, like an ague sufferer. 'Oh, what shall I do? What shall I do? I didn't know the letter. I didn't suspect. I thought it was a message for me from him—and such a letter! Oh, heavens! She calls him her darling love! What shall I do? Where shall I go?' 'Have you no friends at hand?' I asked. She made no reply to this. We heard his footsteps. 'Yes, yes; certainly,' she began to say aloud, 'yes, I will get your stick. How fortunate that—that you remembered. You might have been worried.' She ran back into the drawing-room to fetch it. 'Yes, yes,' she cried wildly, 'you might have been worried,' she ended with a peal of hysterical laughter, and shut the door sharply upon me.

"I stood irresolute a moment, heard Hastings' voice, loud and threatening, a sound as of a chair overturned, and then I hurried away down the stairs, not waiting for the lift."

"I think," said Bramley, "I'd have wanted to stay and see the fun out."

"Fun! Hastings came late to his appointment with me the next morning. 'My wife is ill,' he said. 'She had a fall, and the doctor says there's a bad internal injury.' He looked at me with the sad expression of a kind and affectionate husband, and I felt like kicking him out of my office. But I didn't. 'What's the paper you want drawn?' I asked. He began to explain that it was some personal property he wished to transfer to a lady. He gave me her name, and I took a memorandum of the items, and promised him the paper at three in the afternoon. About an hour later a messenger brought me a note scrawled feebly in pencil; 'I am very ill—perhaps dying. Wish to make a will. Can you please call. Millicent Hastings.' Of course I went to see her. The poor woman was too badly done up to speak. I made the form of a will for her and she signed it, leaving all she possessed to her husband. A couple of women neighbours witnessed it, and then I had a moment to speak with her. 'Oh, I'm dying,' she said, 'I'm dying. And I'm glad; it's my only resource and it's sweet. Let me die and be at rest. I am glad to think of dying. He will not care. He has another woman, the one that wrote that letter.' 'Tell me one thing,' I said, 'her name.' She hesitated with a queer sort of shame and faltered over it. 'Alicia Gross,' she whispered. It was the name of the woman he had made the bill of sale to. A sudden anger seized me. 'You are doing wrong,' I said, 'to shield him and to make a will for him.' 'Am I?' she smiled faintly. 'Well, let me die and go to rest.' She turned her face away and seemed to swoon. I called the women back and came away. She was dying, I thought."

"But she didn't die," said Bramley musingly.

There was a long silence. Lloyd seemed to have fallen into a dream. "No," he acquiesced finally. "No, she got better, got well, forgave him, helped him in his business by selling some property, was good and patient and loving to him—until the day when she met him arm in arm with Alicia Gross; the two were coming out of a hotel. She stood and looked at him for an instant, then passed on. She never went back to the house—not even to take her clothing. She took the first train to her aunt's. A few weeks later she came back to the city and began a divorce suit. Of course she would have won, only——"

"Only what?"

"Only Hastings was kind enough to die in the meantime. And in due course the widow became Millicent Weatherly."

"All's well that ends well," said Bramley. "But I must be going now."

FIGHTING JOE.

"Who and what was he?"

I was standing in the churchyard of a small town on the borders of South Staffordshire one bright Sunday afternoon in April not many years ago.

I was a stranger in that part of the country, and was passing through the place in the course of a long walk from the larger adjacent town to which my business had taken me the day before.

The extensive mining operations of the last twelve or fifteen years had altered the unpretending place materially; and though the quaint old church and some long and low buildings, suggestive of farms and homesteads, still retained an air of rustic simplicity, they were being gradually obscured, and the place itself sophisticated by the formal rows of plain and ugly tenements, built expressly for the mining population, which, every year, was becoming more and more numerous.

I had amused myself by deciphering some of the inscriptions on the gravestones, well-nigh obliterated by the weather-stains and the moss that time had suffered to find root-hold in the hollows of the lettering, when a man, presumably a miner, in the Sunday clothes peculiar to that class, carrying a little child of two or three years, and followed by another, somewhat older, seated himself on a flat stone, and opened a conversation.

A civilly-spoken fellow enough, though with the uncouth accent of the country.

I readily accepted the invitation he offered, and we chatted pleasantly.

He had known the place many years, he told me, ay, long before it had grown into the town it now was—when it was nothing but a humble village, and when the long grass or ripening corn bowed its head to the wind on the spot where the unsightly engine-house and tall, red, chimney now stood, and where the heaps of slag and cinder marked the busy life of the toilers in the earth below.

That handsome marble monument, he told me, denoted the last resting-place of the late rector, and this broad, massive piece of granite was the tomb of a certain local squire, popularly known as "Squire Jack," who, it seemed, was much given to horse-racing, cock-fighting, and such kindred sports, and who, being a sad "ne'er-do-well," a thoughtless, reckless fellow, but withal, good-natured and easy-going, was, as such gentry not unfrequently are, the most popular member of his family.

As my new acquaintance pointed out these objects, and others, which he thought, I suppose, would interest me, he had risen from his seat, and we had strolled through the churchyard.

It was in a corner, and rather in a hollow, that, before a humble mound of green turf, and decked with the pretty spring flowers, carefully placed in the form of a cross, we both, as of one accord, paused. It had not any gravestone, but only a piece of wood, supported by two short uprights. On this was roughly carved, as if with a pocket-knife, these two words: "Fighting Joe."

"That is a strange inscription to put over a man's grave," I said. And then added: "Who and what was he?"

The man seated himself on a stone close by, and was silent for a few seconds.

He had set down the child he had been carrying, and the two little children, attracted by the bright flowers, had found their way to the mound, and were about to gather them.

"Here, you mustn't touch them flowers," he said, and, taking a hand of each, led them away.

"Well, mate," he then went on to say to me, in reply to my question, "I don't rightly know who or what he was. He was a stranger down here, and neither me nor my mates ever heard tell where he came from or who he was.

"When this here pit, Fenton's Pit, we call it, was first worked, we had but few hands hereabouts, and men as could work had no call to wait long for a job, and got good wage as well. Most of the hands were Staffordshire, but we never knowed where Joe came from, and I don't know as we asked, and p'raps he wouldn't have told us if we had.

"He was quiet and lonely-like, and said but little—that is, when he was all right; but when he'd had a drop of drink, as may be of a Sunday night, when he had gotten his wage, of all the hands I ever see to swear, spend his money, or fight, there wasn't one like Fighting Joe."

"And hence his name, I suppose?" I asked. "And of course, it is the old story again—drink, a quarrel, and a violent death; though I cannot understand, in that case, the evident care that is bestowed on the poor fellow's tomb—such as it is."

"No, sir," the man said gravely, after a moment's pause; "not quite all that. A violent death, yes; and such a death as I might pray God might ne'er happen to the worst of us; but it wasn't drink, nor a quarrel, nor a fight with another man, that brought him to it. It was more the other way, poor lad—more the other way."

The rough fellow beside me said this with a gentleness of tone and manner that was sufficiently out of keeping with his appearance to excite some degree of curiosity, and I told him I should like to hear more of the story.

"It's not much as such as you might care for," the man replied.

"Here," he said, turning to the little ones, who were straying towards the green mound again, "you mustn't touch them posies, thou knowest; go and get some of them," and he jerked a small piece of coal he had in his hand towards where some daisies and dandelions were growing in among the rank grass.

"He worked in Fenton's Pit along o' me, an' though we never had angry words, many an' many a day would pass and neither him nor me would speak. He was quick, as I said, and when he hadn't had drink would keep hisself to hisself. There was a lass living in these parts then, and Fighting Joe was fond of her. I don't know that he had said much to her, but we could see he was about as fond of that lass as a lad could well be. I know that, for mother was living then, and this lass would often be between her house and ours.

"It seems that one Sunday, as it might be this, Joe had met her, and told her how fond he was of her, and asked her to become his wife. She told mother this that same night. Well, it seems she said that Joe mustn't look for that, for she was already promised, and was going to be wed that Whitsuntide. When she told Joe that, he never said a word, but he grew very white in the face, and turned quietly away.

"The next day he had to work beside the very man who was promised to the lass he loved. Well, they had been at work for some time, when Joe's mate, turning round to get hold of a shorter pick that was lying near, sees him standing behind him with his arm raised, and the pick in his hand, as if in doubt whether to strike or not, and with a look in his eyes as he had never been known to wear before.

"The two men looked at one another, without speaking for a while, till Joe said: 'God forgive me!' and turned away, and from that day they never worked side by side again. I don't know how it was but we used to think Joe kept away on purpose—I mean, so as not to be in the way to strike the other one. That would be a matter of three or four months before the fire."

"What fire?" I asked.

"What fire?" the other repeated, in a tone of astonishment. "Why, Fenton's Pit. Did you never hear of the fire in Fenton's Pit?"

"No," I replied; "you know I am a stranger here."

"Ah, you must be, I should think," the man said, somewhat roughly, "if you never heard tell of that."

He took a small blackened pipe from his pocket, and filled the bowl in a mechanical way, for his thoughts were evidently far away, and his face became saddened and almost tender in its expression under their influence.

He remained silent so long, that I said: "I should like to hear about that fire, if you don't mind telling me."

"Was you ever down in a pit, mate?" he asked.

I told him no, but had often thought I should like to see one.

"Better stay where you are," the man answered.

"Ah!" he added, after another pause, "it's strange how we mining people die; but it's stranger how we live!"

"How do you mean?" I asked.

"I've worked in the pit for more nor twenty years," he replied; "but I never go down in the cage now—that is, since that time I speak on—but I think I may be going to my grave. What with the rising of the water, or the fall of the coal, or the choke-damp, that means death, the lives of such as us ain't worth much; but all these put together ain't nothing to a pit on fire.

"When the coal is bursting out with heat, and the heavy masses of earth fall down, crushing or laming them that can't get out of the way—when the cry is: 'Every man for himself, and God above for us all!'—when, fainting and struggling, they think for a moment of wife and children, and then they fall and die!

"Well, that was the sort of fire I speak of, and all of those at work in the pit that day rushed for the lift that might carry them up away from the place where the flames were roaring and rushing with the noise of a great wind.

"Well, Fighting Joe was the last man in the lift, as they thought; but just as they were beginning to move, they heard a loud cry for help, and they saw that other one—him who had married Joe's sweetheart—making for the lift, and begging them, for God's sake not to leave him behind.

"Well, I tell you, the lift was overfull then; but Joe sprang from it, and seizing hold of the other one, with the help of those inside, hauled him in, and all we heard him say was: 'Tell her I did it, an' God bless thee, mate!'

"Then we heard the roar of the flames, and we never saw Joe again."

The man sat quietly for a second or two, and though his voice did not falter, he added in a softer tone:

"But the next day, when the fire had burned itself out, I was one of them that went down into the pit.

"There was a crowd of the miners' wives and children standing at the pit mouth, and when we came up again, we laid a body gently on the ground, and the men took off their caps, and said ne'er a word, while the women cried, and many of them sobbed aloud. It was blackened and burned, and but for where the pitman's jacket saved him, it might have been no more than the earth it was lying on.

"But as we stooped tenderly to raise and carry the body away, the jacket fell off, and there on that part where once beat a true heart, was a lock of woman's hair.

"'He had begged it of her,' she said, 'so often, she had not the heart to refuse him;' and God only knows, mate, what comfort poor Joe might have felt in wearing it for her sake.

"We buried him with that little curl lying on his breast, and with many a sob, and many a 'God bless thee, poor lad!' we lowered him to his rest.

"We planted them little flowers, and it seemed to me as if they growed brighter on his tomb than anywhere else."

He paused again, and as I stole a look at him, I saw two large tears rolling slowly down his hard face.

He was a little embarrassed at my observing them, I think, for he said:

"Don't you think worse of me, mate, because I'm giving way a bit, but I am the man Joe saved."

HIGH PLAY.

A COMEDY OFF THE STAGE.

By George Manville Fenn.

SUMMARY.

The story opens with an interview between Lady Braetoun and her son Roderick, in which she endeavours to induce him to give up fast living and marry Olive, Isaac Emsworth's heiress. After the interview he goes to see his racehorse in the country with Lucy Lee, a chorus girl, familiarly known as "Baby." Emsworth takes Olive to consult Dr. Murray, who advises a voyage to South Africa in the Greyburg, in which he also is going. Roderick, who is friendly with Murray, comes for advice on the terribly bad condition of his health, and the Doctor recommends a trip in the same boat. Lucy Lee, on being discarded, returns to her aunt's theatrical shop in Great Russell Street, and tells her the facts of the case, intimating her intention of refusing all the money and presents he offered her.

CHAPTER VIII.

A Threatening Cloud.

"Let me come to you with nothing but what's my own, Auntie," sobbed the girl, sinking upon her knees to clasp the woman's hands and press them to her lips. "I'll be like a servant to you, if you like; only take me, Auntie dear, and let me try and forget it all."

"Take you? Oh, my own, own pet!"

There was another long embrace, and then Lucy rose to her feet, to stand looking hard and strange.

"What is it, my pet?" whispered Mrs. Duncan. "Don't look like that. Are you faint? Let me send for the stout and hysters now."

"Auntie," cried the girl passionately, "I can't bear it. I can't sit down like this without a word."

"Then you should have let him have it at once, my pet."

"No, no, I don't mean him. I couldn't hurt him; I mean her. She has taken him away from me. She can never love him as I do."

"Never, my precious, and serve him right. But come and sit down again, and don't, pray, look like that. You frighten me. I know it's hard to bear, but bear it we must, just as I had to when your pore dear uncle died."

The girl was now pacing the room, her face looking pale and convulsed, as she held her hands tightly clenched before her.

"Don't, don't, my precious, take on about it. Have too much sperritt. Let him marry her if he likes. It won't be very long before he'll wish it all undone, see if he don't. You let him marry; it'll be like your revenge."

"I can't, I can't!" cried Lucy, in a low, harsh whisper. "Now it has come to that, I feel I must do something, Aunt," she cried fiercely. "I told him so. I shall kill her!"

"Lucy! My own gal! Don't, don't talk like that. You can't do it, you know."

"I can, and I will," she almost whispered now. And there was a look in her beautiful eyes, an intensity in her manner, that sent a chill through the coarse woman at her side.

"You can't—you can't do it, my dear. Don't you see there's the lor. It would stop you. It always does stop you from doing what you like. I never see the use of the lor. It never done me any good. If it had done its duty it would have punished some of the people who robbed me. If it had I should have been a rich woman by now. No, my darling, you mustn't talk about killing her, you know, because that would mean killing my darling, too."

"Well, and what does it matter now?"

"Why, my precious, it would mean killing me."

"Poor old Auntie!" said the girl, with a wild laugh. "But I could——" She whispered something in her ear, finishing with a strange malignant laugh.

"And—spoil her beauty for her, and make him hate the sight of her? Yes, there's something in that, my dear. He'd soon have done with her then. And what right had she to come atween you two? But oh! no, no, my darling," continued the woman with a shudder; "you're not the sort of girl to do that, Lucy. There's the lor, too, again, and the perlice. No, no, my precious, you mustn't do that: I can't have you hurt or took away now I've got you back, but if it must be done," she continued huskily. "I wouldn't mind—if it will do you good, my dear—I'd do it, dear, for you."

"I shall kill her!"

"You would do it!" cried Lucy fiercely. "Why, she never did you harm."

"No, but she's ruined you. Isn't that enough?"

The girl made no reply, but stood gazing straight before her into vacancy; a vacancy peopled, however, by the shadowy forms of those who had destroyed the happiness of her life.

At last her lips moved, and a peculiar, intent look was in her eyes, as she said, as if to herself:

"He could never look upon her again—so easy, at any time. Why not at the church?"

"Lucy, my darling!" cried her aunt in alarm, "what is it? What did you——"

"Say?" said the girl, looking at her strangely. "I did not speak, Auntie, I was thinking."

"Thinking!"

"Yes; of what I ought to do. Auntie, I must bring him back to me, so there isn't room for both of us to live."

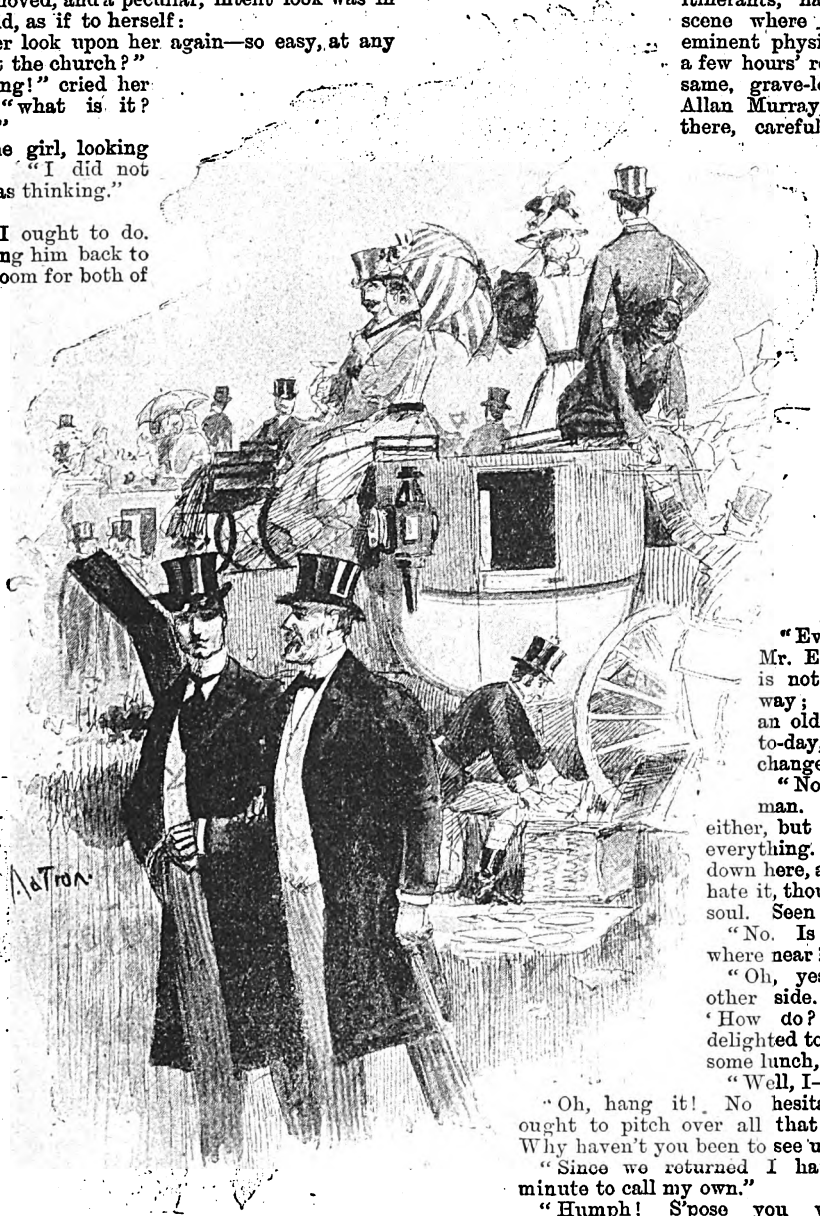
The aunt caught the girl's hand and swung her round to gaze wildly in her face.

"Lucy, darling, don't look like that."

"And he'd never look me in the eyes again—never kiss me and call me all his own," said the girl with a shudder. "It would make him hate me, but he would not love her, and if I did it everything would end."

Mrs. Duncan looked in alarm at her niece, and then about the room as if for help, but saw nothing save a grotesque mask which so hung in one of the corners of the shop that it seemed to be leering round at them with one eye.

Turning again with a shudder to her niece, she seized her by the arms and shook her, but without chasing the fixed strange look from her eyes.



"May I ask your meaning, Mr. Emsworth?"

"Lucy, my precious, what is it?" she cried wildly. "What is it you are thinking, dear?"

"Only whether it would be very hard to die."

CHAPTER IX.

The Dark Races of Mankind.

They generally had a drenching rain at the Highdown races, but this was an exception. The ladies' dresses, the dusty roads, the bright sunshine, all indicated a fine day, and the place was crowded, while carriages of every description were packed wherever the stands had left room.

The fine weather might have been the attraction, but that crowded course, with the hurrying of people to get good places for the best race, the yelling of the betting men, and the mingled strains of bad music cruelly murdered by itinerants, hardly seemed the scene where a hard working, eminent physician would go for a few hours' relaxation. All the same, grave-looking, handsome Allan Murray, M.D., was down there, carefully scanning the carriages, with the consequence that the lines of thought on his brow seemed to deepen. He had been along one line and back by another, evidently in search of a particular vehicle, but in vain; and he was about to cross the course when a quick, decisive voice behind him exclaimed:

"Why, 'tis you! How are you, Doctor? Who'd have thought of seeing you here!"

"Evidently not you, Mr. Emsworth. Racing is not certainly in my way; but the horse of an old schoolfellow runs to-day, and I wanted a change, so I came down."

"No law against it, man. Not in my way, either, but I like her to see everything. Plenty of society down here, and so we came. I hate it, though—I do, 'pon my soul. Seen her?"

"No. Is the carriage anywhere near?"

"Oh, yes; just over the other side. Come and say 'How do?' Olive will be delighted to see you. There's some lunch, too, on the way."

"Well, I——"

"Oh, hang it! No hesitation, man. You ought to pitch over all that shyness with me. Why haven't you been to see us?"

"Since we returned I have hardly had a minute to call my own."

"Humph! S'pose you would be pretty busy," said Emsworth, accompanying the words with a keen look; "but that isn't it altogether. I studied you a bit, Doctor, for I like you, I do really."

Murray looked at him, and a peculiar suffocating feeling came into his breast.

"Yes, that's how it is, Murray, and I'm sorry. I'm not blind, you know. Had to fight too many clever men to do what I've done. But I thought better of you."

"May I ask your meaning, Mr. Emsworth?"

"I'm a plain man, Doctor, and I'll tell you at once. Look here: I rose from the ranks, and I'm not ashamed of it; but I'm always getting my back set up by some one or another who looks down on the plebeian or parvenu, or whatever they call me. I'm tolerated in society for her sake. They let me in because of the heiress. I'm not blind, and I put up with a good deal. I know I am wanting in the polish of a university man, and can't talk as society people do. I've had to make my way. I drop an 'h' now and then, I suppose, or do something wrong in society eyes, but I took to you during our Cape trip, and I thought you too sound and solid a man to look down on one who is self-made. I did, Doctor, upon my soul."

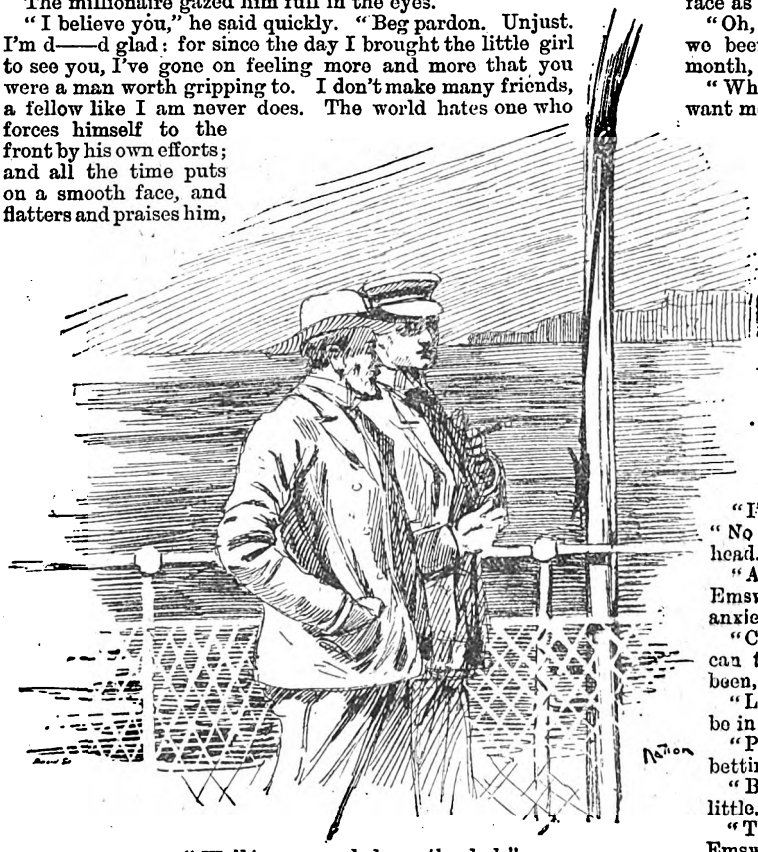
"You wrong me, Mr. Emsworth, indeed, you do."

The millionaire gazed him full in the eyes.

"I believe you," he said quickly. "Beg pardon. Unjust. I'm d——d glad: for since the day I brought the little girl to see you, I've gone on feeling more and more that you were a man worth gripping to. I don't make many friends, a fellow like I am never does. The world hates one who forces himself to the front by his own efforts; and all the time puts on a smooth face, and flatters and praises him,



"Walking up and down the deck."

and friends come to him in shoals, like flies round a bit of carrion, eh?"

"But I don't think you have much cause to complain."

"Don't you?" said the other abruptly. "I do. Why haven't you been?"

"Well, really, I——"

"Humph! ha! Waited for a formal invitation to dinner, I suppose?"

"No, indeed, you wrong me."

"Didn't I say to you over and over again, when you and I were walking up and down the deck of that vessel having our cigar: 'Come and see me, Doctor, when we get back, and I shall be glad?'"

"Yes; often."

"Then why didn't you come?"

"Such invitations, kindly meant, are so common, Mr. Emsworth. People give them freely and think no more of them. I am a busy man. You are a busy man, and——"

"Are busy men to have no rest, sir? You ought to have come, that is if you can bear the society of so common-place a chap."

"Don't say that again," said the Doctor warmly. "I will come and prove to you that your words do me an injustice."

"Hah, then I'm very glad I came down to-day. Thought it a horrible nuisance, for I felt that I shouldn't meet a soul I liked. Come along, here's the carriage. Olive will be delighted; she has felt quite hurt at not seeing our sea-going friend, and has been at me to get up a dinner and invite you. Here, Olive, my dear, I've found an old friend."

Allan Murray's heart gave a great throb as he saw the bright flush and the look of eager pleasure on his patient's face as she held out her hand to him.

"Oh, Doctor, Doctor," she cried, "what have we been doing to offend you? Back a whole month, and you have not been near."

"Why, you have not wanted me, and do not want me now. What do you say, Lady Braetoun?" he said merrily, as he turned and took the hand of that lady, who gave him her best society smile to conceal a slight feeling of annoyance which had troubled her on seeing the very warm reception the young physician received.

"Indeed, no, Mr. Murray—I beg pardon—Doctor Murray. I have been telling Mr. Emsworth that the voyage has done wonders."

"Voyage and the Doctor's advice together," said Emsworth bluntly. "There, don't scold him, Olive. I've given it him well. He is very repentant, and won't do so any more."

"Then I shall forgive him," cried Olive playfully. "But oh, Doctor Murray, do you care for all this stupid racing?"

"I'll answer for him," said her father quickly. "No; he doesn't. Got too much brains in his head. Come down to see Braetoun's horse win."

"And it will win. Don't you think so, Mr. Emsworth?" said Lady Braetoun with real anxiety.

"Can't say, ma'am. Only the knowing ones can tell. I don't understand horses. Has he been, Olive?"

"Lord Braetoun? No, papa, dear. He has to be in the—saddling-field, don't they call it?"

"Paddock, my dear. Hope you are not betting."

"But I am, papa," said the girl, colouring a little. "A pair of gloves."

"Then I hope you'll lose them," said Emsworth gruffly. "I hate racing and betting, and all the rest of it."

"I'm very, very glad to hear you say so, Mr. Emsworth," cried Lady Braetoun. "But, you see, it has grown to be such a custom with the aristocracy that I do not wonder at Roderick taking it up. But we shall have to wean him from it now. Eh, Olive, my dear?"

The girl looked at her quickly, and then turned, to find Murray's eyes fixed upon her intently in a gaze which made her colour vividly.

"I—I—isn't that the bell for the next race, Lady Braetoun?"

"I suppose so, my dear," said her chaperon blandly, and, adjusting her gold-rimmed glasses, she took up a race card and began to study it, while a curious pang shot through Murray, and he turned to look toward the course, along which a line of mounted police were slowly riding.

He was brought back to the present from a memory of many scenes on the great ocean-going steamer, when Olive was receiving the incense of the younger passengers, and most of all from Braetoun, by a hand upon his arm.

"Want to see this tomfoolery?" said Emsworth in a low voice, only heard by the ears for which the words were intended.

"I? No," was the reply, as the crowd seemed to begin to revolve before the Doctor's eyes.

"Come on, then; I want to talk to you. Take care of her, Lady Braetoun. We'll come back after the race for some lunch."

Murray made an effort to calm the rush of emotion which sent the blood hurrying to his temples, and he turned and raised his hat, meeting Olive's eyes again directed at him in a deprecating way, which seemed to say: "Don't be angry with me, Doctor, please."

The next minute he was with his companion outside the crowd, and felt Olive's father thrust an arm through his.

"Hah, we can breathe now," said Emsworth. "How I do hate a mob. Look here, Doctor. I've wanted you to come and see us ever since we got back, so as to tell you what has been going on."

Murray was silent. He knew, and dare not trust himself to speak, for it was all too plain. Olive liked him—her every look and word told him that she liked him. It was all over now; the hopes that had flashed through his brain, and had grown brighter and brighter ever since the day when they first met, had suddenly become dark. She liked him: she looked up to him evidently as a friend whose respect she cared to win, and he had been, dreamer that he was, hoping that some day their intimacy might ripen into love.

Emsworth went on talking about knowing someone before the voyage was planned, about his being so unwell, and yet so much in earnest that when he heard they were going abroad he determined to follow them.

"And you must have seen, my dear Doctor, how devoted he was to her all through the voyage."

These words sounded plainly; the others had all been blurred. And now Murray answered slowly:

"Yes—yes, I saw that Braetoun was attentive; several of the other young passengers were."

"Yes, but he was regularly smitten, and no wonder."

The father looked round proudly at the young doctor, who said in a voice he did not know for his own:

"No wonder!" and then felt as if he would have given anything to be alone.

"Well, of course, I was a bit flattered, and—yes, I'll own it like a man and a father—a bit pleased. Fine old family, high position. Proud thing for me. She's all I care about in the world, and I'll say it: I shall be glad to see her Lady Braetoun, and the old woman the dowager. I shan't marry her though; too wide awake for that! and I shall take good care that she doesn't interfere too much with the young folks. But there, the old girl has behaved very well. I'm not blind. She took to chaperoning Olive from the first, and if ever she tells me she hadn't certain ideas of her own from the beginning I shall say something rude."

There was a burst of shouting, and one of "They're off!" but it was all a confused murmur to Murray. He had only ears for the words of the man at his side.

"It has all been very nice and above board," he continued. "Braetoun was as attentive as could be, but he never spoke till we got back, and then he came to me like a man—a nobleman, and told me he loved her."

Murray drew a deep breath, as if he were in agony, and the scene began to reel round him again.

"Said he had never known the slightest desire to join his fate to any woman before, but that since he had seen Olive life seemed a different thing. Told me as a man of the world honestly that he had been a bit rackety, and fooled away a lot of money, but that henceforth he was going to make a fresh start, and that if I would give my consent to his asking her to be his wife he'd give her a proud position in London, the capital of the world, and—well, all that a honest English gentleman should say to the father of the girl he loved."

"And did he—did he say anything about his health?" said Murray, dragging the words out of him as if they were hard to say.

"His health? Oh, yes! That he had been a bit bad, but the sea trip had set him up and he was a better man than ever."

"A better man than ever," said the Doctor through his teeth.

"Yes, and that he was going to drop racing and sell his horses to pay his debts; and then he quite won me over by his honesty."

"By his honesty!"

"Yes. That's about all. I wanted to tell you for you to congratulate me. Old schoolfellow of yours, you see, and of course you'll be glad to see him well married. I don't mind his being poor. Olive will have plenty, and I shall keep in the background. I'm not going to be forcing myself to the front and be always slapping him on the back so that people may see, and as good as say to them: 'This is Lord Braetoun, my son-in-law.' No; I want her to be happy, that's all I think about. Well, say something, man."

Lady Braetoun.

Murray started at this abrupt request.

"And Miss Emsworth, sir, what did she say?"

"Eh? Well, at first she wanted to beg off. So young, you see. She was flattered, but a bit startled, and I don't honestly believe that she had ever thought much about leaving me, but by degrees she has grown pleased and animated, and the old lady makes a deal of fuss over her, and I suppose it will be all right. No mother to advise her, and that's where Lady Braetoun comes in so well. Oh, it's all right, I think."

"All right, he thinks! Does he know—can he know one tithe of what I could tell him? Ought I to tell him, and stop what would be an infamy? And if I did, what would she say? How could I go impartially and speak? God help me! What shall I do?"

Strange, wild thoughts to torture a loving man, there, in the midst of an excited yelling crowd, for the race was over and the numbers were up.

"Humph! Race is run," said Emsworth sourly. "Braetoun's nag was a bit of a favourite, I hear. Between ourselves, doctor, I hope he has lost. Make him disgusted and ready to give it up. Horse racing's a fine thing. I like to see the beautiful creatures they breed, and to see them run; but modern horse-racing is a miserable set-out of gambling, carried on by blacklegs and swindlers to such an extent that your honest lover of good sport has no chance. I want to get Braetoun out of it as soon as I can. Best thing, eh?"

"Yes, certainly," said Murray, for his companion waited for him to speak.

"Come to the carriage now, and have a bit of lunch. I wanted to tell you about your little patient. God bless her! You wish her happiness, I know."

"From my very soul!" cried Murray, with a sudden burst of energy which made Emsworth look at him wonderingly, and then smile with satisfaction as he pressed his companion's arm.

"Thankye, Murray, thankye. That does me good. I wasn't blind; I saw how my darling had impressed you during the voyage. Do you know, she confided to me, how shocked and startled she was when we first met. She said she expected to find you a grey headed old gentleman, but you won upon her at once, and she soon felt as if she had known you from a child, and could come to you for advice and help in everything."

Murray breathed hard and struggled to keep a calm, composed expression of countenance.

"I was glad to hear her talk so," continued Emsworth, "for I've great faith in Olive's clear-sightedness. It shows me I was not wrong about you. But there—that's over, and I'm glad of it. You don't say much about it, but that's your way. You never do say much. Think the more, eh?"

"Yes," said Murray gravely. "I think the more."

"All a dream," he added to himself; "and now I am awake."

"Ah, Murray, how are you, old man?" rang out as Braetoun caught sight of him, and held out his hand. "Come, Mr. Emsworth, we want that glass of champagne you talked about, so as to drink to my ill-luck."

"What, have you lost?"

"Lost!" cried Braetoun, with a reckless laugh, "why, the horse was nowhere. My Bella Donna could have won, though, easily. Yes, Murray, my usual luck—lost."

"Then we'll have the champagne at once," said Emsworth, rubbing his hands. "I'm heartily glad of it, my boy, heartily."

"Thank you," said Braetoun, laughing, and turning to Olive who looked troubled. "Encouraging, isn't it, for a poor fellow!"

Emsworth looked from the young man to Olive and back, before placing his glass to his lips.

The servant was busy the while, arranging the contents of the lunch basket, and though Murray felt that he must go where he could be alone and think, he could not drag himself away. It was like a waking nightmare to him, in which everything was unreal, even to the last scene of that fateful day.

Murray saw her eyes flash through her thin veil.

For just in the middle of the luncheon, while Braetoun was attending to Olive, who, with animated countenance, was listening to something he was saying, the young man's eyes became suddenly fixed, and a cadaverous change came over his face.

For the moment Murray was the only one present to notice it, and as he took a step forward, glass in hand, and followed his old companion's eyes, he saw that they were fixed upon an elegantly dressed lady who had just unloosed her hand from where it rested upon the arm of a heavy, over-dressed woman. Murray saw her eyes flash through her thin veil, and then she turned to gaze searchingly and fiercely at Olive, who involuntarily shrank away and laid her hand upon Braetoun's arm.

It was all so momentary that Murray was the only other witness of the situation in the comedy of life, till, with a wild passionate cry the girl stepped closely up, then raised her hands, and Olive uttered a faint cry.

BRITISH WORKMAN'S & GENERAL

ASSURANCE COMPANY LTD.

ESTABLISHED IN 1866.

CHIEF OFFICES: Broad Street Corner, BIRMINGHAM.
LONDON OFFICES: 2, West Street, FINSBURY PAVEMENT.

BRITISH WORKMAN'S AND GENERAL ASSURANCE CO. Ltd.

The Thirtieth Annual Meeting was held in Birmingham on Tuesday, the 14th July.

EXTRACT FROM THE REPORT.—The results of the year's working surpasses everything before accomplished. The increase in business in the past, and the still greater increase expected in the future, have rendered it necessary for the Company to take in a further considerable portion of the Broad Street Corner property.

OLD AGE PENSIONS.—During the year further efforts have been made to meet the requirements of the Old Age Pension Scheme, under the Company's Endowment Assurance policies, and Special Tables of Benefits have been issued.

SPECIAL INDUSTRIAL TABLES.—These also have been prepared, and they show the great advantages to be derived from the payment of premiums either yearly, half-yearly, or quarterly instead of weekly. Under these tables a considerable amount of business has already been transacted.

INCOME AND EXPENDITURE.—The total income of the Company was £438,250, and total expenditure £395,249, leaving a balance on the year's accounts of £43,001.

NEW BUSINESS.—The total number of policies issued for the year was 354,805 at an annual premium of £218,587.

CLAIMS.—The amount paid in claims during the year in the Ordinary department was £15,527, including £1,153 in surrender claims. The amount paid in the Industrial department was £160,295, including £8,051 in surrender claims.

The Directors recommend a dividend at the rate of 12½ per cent. upon the paid-up capital of the Company, free of income-tax. This dividend, which is in course of payment, is the largest distribution hitherto paid to the shareholders, and the prospect is of a steadily increasing dividend from year to year. The shares—£1 fully paid—are now quoted at 50s., and at this high premium it is difficult to obtain them.

A YOUNG ENTHUSIAST.—More than thirty years have elapsed since Mr. Port, a young enthusiast in the cause of industrial assurance, conceived the idea of establishing a company in the great Midland capital. He had unbounded faith in the success of a company offering broad and liberal conditions, and was prepared to deal generously with claims as they arose.

A NOBLE SELF-SACRIFICE.—For the first few months after the establishment of the Company the indoor staff of the office consisted solely of Henry Port, and such was the arduous character of his occupation that he laboured by night as well as by day, snatching an occasional hour of repose in the office itself.

The DAY of FEEBLE THINGS.—In the first five years the average premium income was £2,131. The average annual income during the last quinquennium is £347,819. The comparison is convincing proof of the growing confidence of the people, and of the expanding strength and usefulness of the Company. The premium income of the year 1895-6 exceeds that of the average of the quinquennium, and amounts to £428,089.

THE TESTIMONY OF FIGURES.—The premium income for the last thirteen years is briefly stated as below:—

PREMIUM INCOME.

1885	130,057
1886	142,864
1887	153,384
1888	173,543
1889	207,575
1890	243,889
1891	274,969
1892	289,406
1893	306,234
1894	335,282
1895	380,088
1896	428,089

The Company now celebrates its 30th Anniversary. There are only ten other British Life Offices which possess a greater income. Among them are the following:

Established.	Names.	Annual Premium Income.
1815	Scottish Widows'	£947,919
848	Gresham	£862,266
1825	Standard	£786,246
1823	North British and Mercantile	£678,356
1837	Scottish Provident	£585,471
1843	Star	£459,186
1840	U. K. Temperance and General	£439,024
1845	Royal (1895)	£402,460

These Offices were all established before the BRITISH WORKMAN'S and GENERAL ASSURANCE COMPANY LIMITED.

EXTRACT FROM THE REPORT.—The results of the year's working surpass everything before accomplished. The increase in business in the past, and the still greater increase expected in the future has rendered it necessary for the Company to take in a considerable proportion of the Broad Street Corner property.

OLD AGE PENSIONS.—During the year further efforts have been made to meet the requirements of the Old Age Pension Scheme, under the Company's Endowment Assurance policies, and Special Tables of Benefits have been issued.

SPECIAL INDUSTRIAL TABLES.—These also have been prepared, and they show the great advantages to be derived from the payment of premiums either yearly, half yearly, or quarterly instead of weekly. Under these tables a considerable amount of business has already been transacted.

INCOME AND EXPENDITURE.—The total income of the Company was £438,250, and total expenditure £395,249, leaving a balance on the year's accounts of £43,001.

NEW BUSINESS.—The total number of policies issued for the year was 354,805 at an annual premium of £218,587.

CLAIMS.—The amount paid in claims during the year in the Ordinary department was £15,527, including £1,153 in surrender claims. The amount paid in the Industrial department was £160,295, including £8,051 in surrender claims.

TRIUMPHAL PROGRESS.—The progress has been triumphal. The modest venture of 1866 has developed into a large and prosperous company, with a total income of £438,250, and total funds amounting to £249,429.

A NATIONAL INSTITUTION.—In the British Workman's and General Assurance Company Mr. Port has built up a national institution of great usefulness to the community, and it will remain an enduring memorial of his life's work.

A STRAY LETTER.

My Louis XV. chiffonier is a very handsome and graceful piece of furniture. It is inlaid and polished with locks of burnished copper, and always seems to be smiling as if its red and white mosaics were merry, rosy lips.

It was given to me by my grandmother, who inherited it from her grandmother, and I verily believe it once stood in a boudoir of the palace of Marly.

Never was an innocent little piece of furniture abused and railed so mercilessly as my chiffonier was when I chanced to think of it one day during my sojourn at the Piraeus, in Greece. You will, no doubt, ask why I thrust my trembling hand through my hair, and cried out: "Miserable idiot!" without stating whether the epithet was applied to myself or to my chiffonier. Good heavens, the only wonder was that I left a single hair on my head! Judge for yourself.

I had been so unfortunate—some time before—as to be loved by the most charming of women. I shall not attempt to describe her, not even by the colour of her hair; it is sufficient to say that for two years I called her "my angel" and "bright image of my dreams." At the end of that period, I allowed one of my friends to say to me, in speaking of her: "How could you be such a fool?" She sent me back my letters, and I neglected to return hers, but put the whole lot in a drawer of my old chiffonier, without thinking to turn the key.

That chiffonier was in my room; my room was in my mother's château; my mother's château was eight hundred leagues away, in the middle of Provence. In setting off unexpectedly on a diplomatic mission I had completely forgotten to destroy those remains of an attachment which had been delightful—so long as it lasted.

When I accidentally called out the memory of those letters from an obscure corner of my brain, I started up in surprise and shame, for I knew that my thoughtlessness might seriously comprise a woman who had done nothing to deserve such treatment at my hands. I felt that my conduct had been unworthy of a gentleman, and in a fine frenzy I rushed out of the house, inquired for the first steamship bound for Marseilles, took passage, and, listening to nothing but the voice of my conscience, returned to France.

A week later I arrived at the maternal abode, and I will spare you a recital of the ejaculations, the "What, you, George! So soon?" Which greeted me as soon as I appeared. My mother nearly stifled me with her embrace, and was sure that something dreadful had happened to me, and I had great difficulty in reassuring her. When she had grown calm, I said, in an indifferent a tone as possible:

"Will you have my bag sent to my room, mother, dear?"

"Certainly, my son; you must be tired out," she answered. Then, summoning a servant, she said: "Take my son's luggage to the blue room, Pierre."

"You mean the green room," I added.

"No, the blue room," persisted my mother.

"But the green room is my room."

"It was yours once, George," she said smilingly.

"And whose is it now?" I asked in surprise, and my mother pointed to the door, saying merrily:

"Here comes the present occupant."

"Gabrielle!" I cried, going to meet my cousin, the loveliest and most charming of girls, with abundant blonde hair, eyes as blue as heaven, a smile of childish innocence, and teeth like pearls. It was she, of all persons, who was occupying the green room, and who, no doubt, had ransacked the drawers and cupboards.

Unfortunate, thrice unfortunate man that I was!

Gabrielle—gay, artless and confiding, though a trifle shy—gave me her hand demurely, as she said:

"How do you do, Cousin George?"

My face must have betrayed my confusion as I took her hand, and looked searchingly for some sign of dissimulation in her soft eyes. Had she found the letters? Had she read them? To tell the truth, Mme. Blanc had loved me ardently, and had been so imprudent as to express her sentiments in writing, running the gamut of ah's and oh's, with plentiful exclamation points attached thereto. And suppose little Gabrielle had read them—I blushed at the thought.

But, quite calmly, she said: "How do you do, Cousin George?"—that was all; and in my great palm lay a soft, cool, maidenly little hand.

Ah, but what abyss is deeper than a woman's heart, as the Psalmist says; suppose she had read the letters! The only way to make sure was to go into the room and look for them. Gabrielle's room! What sweet melody in the words; yet I felt that I dared not enter that sanctuary, although I had known my cousin since she was a child.

"Come, George, and see how prettily I have arranged your room," she said suddenly.

Joy, bliss, ecstasy filled me as she spoke. I was saved. Innocence had come to the rescue of depravity!

Lightly and gracefully she ran up the staircase. What a pretty figure she had! I followed her like a culprit, feeling almost afraid to go; but yet I must at all hazards get my letters.

My former room was perfectly charming, decked out in blue and white, with no odour of cigars anywhere. The little bed was modestly draped with snowy curtains, which looked like the wings of guardian angels. I looked around anxiously for the old chiffonier. There it stood as usual.

"May I have some water, Cousin Gabrielle? I am dying of thirst," I said.

She took up the carafe, but I, artful demon, had already observed that it was empty.

"Wait a minute; I will get you some," she said, and left the room.

I rushed to the chiffonier, and opened the drawer. Horror! it was empty.

The next instant my cousin returned, gave me a glass of water, then showed me her album, and we talked merrily, just as we used to do when we were playfellows.

But where were my letters? Had she found them and hidden them away, or had she burned them? My head seemed to swim as I wondered.

As soon as I could think of a pretext I left Gabrielle, and in the doorway I met my aunt, her mother. She greeted me joyfully, then shook her finger at me in a mysterious way, and in a very knowing whisper said:

"Come with me, you naughty, careless boy." I followed her into her own room, where she opened a drawer, saying meanwhile:

"When we first arrived here, it fortunately occurred to me that before putting a young lady into a bachelor's room it would be well for me to look about it a little. I have had some experience of young men and their ways." Here she put a package into my hand. "Heavens and earth—my letters!"

I threw my arms round my aunt's neck, kissed her rapturously, and confessed everything.

A week passed. One morning, when I got up, I found a tiny piece of paper lying on the floor, as if it had been slipped under my door. I picked it up; it was a letter.

"What does this mean?" I thought, and then I unfolded it and read:

"Dear Cousin,—Why do you not tell mamma all about it?"

"'All about it!' What does she mean? 'Dear Cousin!' It is from Gabrielle!"

I did not understand it at all, and waited anxiously for the breakfast hour. When I heard my cousin go downstairs, I darted out and was going speak to her; but she blushed, turned her face away, and, putting a piece of paper into my hand, said hurriedly:

"Take back your letter, and speak to mamma."

My letter! I rushed out into the garden, and read the missive. Thunder and lightning! it was my writing, my style, my name.

"You are adorable, therefore I adore you. Will you listen to me? Will you let me devote my life to you? A word from you, and I will throw myself at your feet."

It was, indeed, my letter—it was one of my effusions to the ex-queen of my heart. It had slipped out of the package of letters, and Gabrielle, finding it in the chiffonier, thought that I had placed it there for her, and her answer was "Speak to mamma." The result of the accident was, I spoke to "mamma," and I married Gabrielle; I adore her, and am the happiest husband in the world.

STOLEN! £2,000.

At 3.45 on the afternoon of March 6th, 1887, the paying cashier of the —— bank cashed a cheque for £2,000, drawn by the highly respected firm of Ployd, Gow, and Co., of Fenchurch Street, merchants. It was presented by the manager of the firm.

At 3.55 the manager of Ployd, Gow, and Co. entered the bank and handed in his books and cheques amounting to £5,000. The paying cashier looked up as he heard his voice.

He called someone to take his place and disappeared into the secretary's room, and within twelve minutes the police were at work on the case.

The cheque presented at 3.45 was a forgery, and the man who presented it someone who had made himself up like Mr. Smith of Ployd, Gow, and Co's.

This was not a difficult task. The counterfeit man was the same height as the original and about the same make. Smith had not spoken a hundred words to the cashier during the five years his firm had dealt with the bank.

He always wore a blue serge office coat whatever the weather. He always wore a silk top hat, and it invariably worked its way to the back of his head before he had worn it three minutes.

No one ever saw him at the bank without his gold-rimmed eye-glasses and his tightly rolled umbrella.

Smith had a friendly nod for the patrons he knew in a business way, but he seldom spoke a single word to any one.

Officers were sent to every railway terminus; they searched the hotels and every likely place for a man to try to change his clothes. If the fellow had not some safe hiding place selected in advance the chances were more than ten to one against his making an escape.

In room 5 of Cremane's private and commercial hotel, which I will admit was not a first-class establishment, but still good enough for a traveller earning £5 a week, I read most of the particulars given above in the evening paper. The officials had done their best to keep the whole affair dark until some clue was gained, but the reporters had been too many for them.

I had come in from my round of calls utterly tired out. Reaching my room, I pulled off my boots, lighted a pipe, sat down with my feet on the bed, and this bank business was the first thing which caught my eye as I glanced over the paper. I had just finished the article when the night porter came up.

"Heard about the bank swindle?" he asked, as he entered my room, without the preliminary trouble of tapping.

"Just read it."

"Cool chap, wasn't he? And, I say, there are a couple of detectives downstairs now. They say they've shadowed him here, and they say they're going to search the whole place. They are on the floor below now, and will want to come in here in a minute."

He had scarcely finished speaking when the men appeared. I was a head shorter than Ployd's manager. I was thin, while he was stout, and I was young, while he was middle-aged.

But those two sleuthhounds came in on tip-toe, looked at me out of the corners of their eyes, and sat down on the edge of my two chairs to question me, the bigger of the two taking the precaution to place his seat between me and the door. It was fully a quarter of an hour before they had finished, and then they seemed to take it as a personal injury that I hadn't committed the crime.

Before my visitors left one of them suggested with a wink to his comrade that I might as well be taken along on general principles, as there was no telling what I would not own up to after a week in prison. But the other was not so evil-minded.

In fact, he took a fatherly interest in my welfare and put his hand upon my shoulder pleasantly and compassionately as he advised me it would be better to restore the money while there was yet time. I refused to disgorge, and he went out sorrowing, saying that I had missed a golden opportunity and that I should like to repent and wear a convict's suit.

The hotel was thoroughly searched. Those men did their duty; and I think would have carried off every soul within the place as a suspicious character had not the manager interfered, and the detectives finally withdrew, with at least two pocket-books crammed with notes.

At ten o'clock I was finishing my third pipe and had long before exchanged my paper for a novel. I was just getting sleepy when a queer thing happened.

My bed was in one corner of the room. I sat on a chair on the left-hand side, with my feet across the middle. I had my book on a line with my eyes, and all had been quiet for the last half-hour, when suddenly a voice exclaimed:

"Well, old man, that must be an interesting yarn."

I bounded to my feet and—saw no one. I looked round the room carefully, peering into every corner—no one. I slipped towards the door on tiptoe and opened it with a jerk and saw—no one.

Then I turned, and there was a man standing on the other side of my bed. He wasn't a ghost. He was made of blood, flesh and bones like myself.

To say I was frightened is putting it mildly. I was scared. I sank right into a chair with my mouth open and my eyes bulging out, until my visitor laughed outright.

"Who are you?" I gasped faintly.

"Well, that's a fair question," he replied. "I suppose you've got a right to ask. For the last three hours, up to a minute ago, I was the man under the bed, and now I'm the man on the bed," and suiting the action to the word he lay himself out at full length.

He was a cool hand. I knew human nature well enough to know he had plenty of nerve behind his cheek.

It wasn't all put on. As he lay there I noticed a revolver in his hand. Then I began to understand.

The evening paper had given a portrait of Smith, and I saw that this was his double. It dawned on me all of a sudden that he was the identical chap.

"You were under the bed when I came in?" I queried as we sat looking at each other, and I was wondering how to reach the bell.

"Exactly," he replied.

"And you heard what the porter said, and the detectives?"

"Every word."

"And, to come to the point, you're the man they want?"

"I am."

"How the dickens did you get here?"

"I didn't choose this abode for its comfort," he said, "nor for its company. I had other plans, in fact. But they miscarried. I dodged into this hotel in search of a temporary asylum, and it looks as if I had found a lunatic asylum. Did you ever see £2,000 in one pile? It's a refreshing sight. See here."

He watched me with piercing eyes, and though he was toying with his revolver carelessly enough, I saw he had his finger on the trigger all the time. He bent over from the bed and picked up a bundle of notes from the floor.

"This means a visit to the tailor's, quail on toast with champagne, a long trip to America or the Continent," and he fondly patted the money. "So they've got an account in the papers, have they? I'd like to read it. Thanks."

He skimmed through the article with evident enjoyment, now and then chuckling to himself. Then he said:

"Pretty close shave that. I'm sorry for the cashier, but suppose he will wriggle out of the responsibility somehow. Excuse my asking the question, but what do you do for a living?"

"I'm a traveller in calicoes."

"Married?"

"No."

"Ever been abroad?"

"No."

"Look here, old chappie," he went on with easy familiarity, as he stretched himself on the bed, "you're giving me shelter and I'll do you a turn. Hand in your resignation and come with me. It will do you good and open your eyes. This little pile will do us first class for a year."

"I'll see you hanged first, you cheeky villain," I shouted. "I'm not making tours with bank thieves and gaol birds. Your trip will end in prison, if it doesn't start there."

"Too peppery, altogether too peppery for the head traveller to a respectable firm," he went on quietly. "And do you think I'll be arrested, as you know so much about it?"

"Certainly. I'm going to take you downstairs and hand you over to the police."

"That's a lie," he said, as he swung his feet off the bed and stood up. "I don't blame you for refusing a trip on the Continent, but please don't make an idiot of yourself in other ways."

"How do you mean?" I asked, also getting up and trying to keep my head.

"Just look at things straight and you'll see. I'm no chicken. Having played for a big stake and won it, I am not likely to let myself be balked by a kid like you. I'm armed, as you see. You're not, so keep your back hair on Even without arms I could do for you, being the larger of the two."

"You cold-blooded scoundrel," I muttered.

"No, don't call names, it's low," he said pleasantly. "Let's consider what is your path of duty. I've got the best of the bank. And how many people have the bank got the best of before? Last year over twenty banks closed their doors in the face of depositors. Every failure was brought about by some kind of fraud. And don't flatter yourself that you owe a duty to the public. The public would let you starve or freeze and not move a finger. You owe a duty to yourself. It is to take change of air. And now's your chance. Preserve the present state of your health, that's my advice, and very good advice, too."

"All of which means," I interrupted, "that you will shoot me if I give the alarm?"

"Precisely."

"Then I shan't do so."

"I thought as much."

He climbed again on to the bed and continued: "I thought I was right when I sized you up. We have now come to an understanding. I've got one or two favours to ask, but I won't keep you long, and I see you want to go to bed. Ah, there are your scissors. I must sacrifice my moustache. Please sit over by the window."

He laid his revolver on the dressing-table and cut off his fine chestnut moustache. I sat watching him and wondered if I had gone out of my mind, or if, perchance, I was dreaming.

"You shave yourself, don't you?" he finally asked, as he turned round and faced me.

I pointed to my razor and strop, and in barely another moment he stood before me clean shaven.

He had sandy hair, while his eyebrows were almost red. There was a bottle of black ink on the table. He dipped his handkerchief into it and painted his eyebrows. With the same fluid he made as neat a black eye as any prize fighter would care to boast, and he was chuckling as he turned to me:

"Just one thing more, old man—a suit of clothes. I must get off this blue serge. Perhaps it will fit you. Your oldest suit, please. I will pay cash for it."

I handed over a much worn suit.

"Rather a tight fit, but it will do," he said. "Here's £5 for it."

"I don't want your dirty money," I said savagely.

"Don't be finicky, it's silly. Now, then, to wrap up the money in a newspaper, and then I'm off. Look here, my boy, take this £100, it will make up for any little inconveniences I have caused you."

"I'd starve first."

"Oh, come now, you're too good for this world. What are you going to do when I leave the room?"

"Kick myself for an ass and then go to bed, most likely."

"Go to bed without the kicking part. You are a very sensible young man, you may take my word for it. If I'm arrested I'll say nothing about what happened here. Ta, ta!"

He reached the doorway and then he turned. "Here's a present for you," he sang out and threw his revolver on the bed. "It's no use to me, I lost my cartridges getting here. Adieu," and then he was gone.

I locked the door and sat down. After a quarter of an hour I slipped into bed. The next morning I awoke with a fearful headache. I went to my dressing-table and there, rolled up in a neat parcel, was the £100.

Did the man get away? Yes; he walked downstairs and out into the street, and the detectives never got a clue of him after that night.

About the money. I returned it to the bank by post, and that part of the business is still worrying the detectives. I could tell them a thing or two, but I won't.

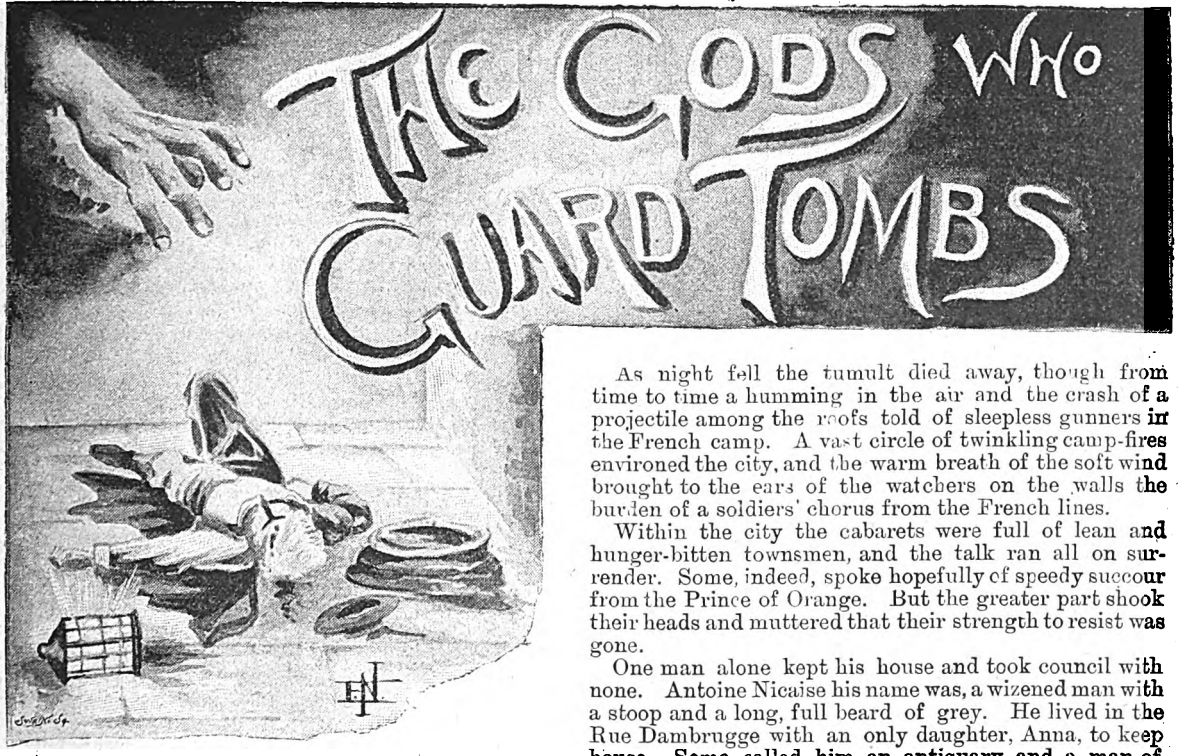
The Gods Who Guard Tombs



All day long the big siege-guns had battered and boomed round the walls of Tournai. On the plain about the city the French troops marched and counter-marched, throwing up earthworks above ground, while below, the sappers burrowed like restless moles, ever drawing nearer and nearer to the foundations of the besieged city. To and fro across the face of the country scurried the cavalry, raiding farms and granaries, driving before them herds of cattle, and bringing great store of grain into the camp.

Within the town the bright sunshine fell on pallid cheeks and bloodshot eyes. Four long weeks had they withstood behind their walls the terrible onslaught of the French army which was fighting under the very eyes of the most Christian king, Louis XIV. himself. But now they were almost come to an end. Food and water there was little enough of, and already they had stripped the lead from the roofs of churches and burghers' houses alike to make bullets and cannon-shot. From their counter-mines the workmen could hear the steady thumping of the French advance, and above ground the forlorn hopes grew stronger and bolder every day.

That very afternoon the attack had been concentrated on a breach in the southern bastion held by the picked troops of the Royal Auvergnais Regiment. The Frenchmen had scaled the steep escarpment nimble as goats and gained a footing in the breach. For a while the great guns were silent, but a terrible hurly burly of sound took their place. Shrieks and groans; the cheers of the assailants and the answering shouts of the besieged; bugles blowing and church bells jangling a tumultuous alarm sent up into the quiet sky a vast discordant clamour. In the end the attack was repulsed; but the wavering confidence of the townsfolk was mightily shaken.

As night fell the tumult died away, though from time to time a humming in the air and the crash of a projectile among the roofs told of sleepless gunners in the French camp. A vast circle of twinkling camp-fires environed the city, and the warm breath of the soft wind brought to the ears of the watchers on the walls the burden of a soldiers' chorus from the French lines.

Within the city the cabarets were full of lean and hunger-bitten townsmen, and the talk ran all on surrender. Some, indeed, spoke hopefully of speedy succour from the Prince of Orange. But the greater part shook their heads and muttered that their strength to resist was gone.

One man alone kept his house and took council with none. Antoine Nicaise his name was, a wizened man with a stoop and a long, full beard of grey. He lived in the Rue Dambrugge with an only daughter, Anna, to keep house. Some called him an antiquary and a man of learning, but others wagged their heads and said: "Some day the Devil will fly away with him and all his works!" and left him to go his own way..

In a back chamber but scantily furnished yet bestrewn with many books sat Antoine intent upon an ancient volume, straining his eyes in the dim candle-light over the crabbed writing on the open page. The book he read was not printed with type, but laboriously traced by a monkish hand. As he read it, it was plain to see that within him worked a great eagerness: and now and again he broke out aloud with a show of petulance:

"Curse them and their siege! Wherefore can they not yield or repulse the enemy? Here is a great store of wealth lying near to my hand, yet for these rascally Frenchmen must I sit close within these bare walls, and dine scantily off horseflesh and yermin. May a plague lay hold on them!"

On his right lay rule and compasses and a large sheet of parchment on which was traced a plan with intersecting lines carefully measured and set to a scale. To this he would turn from his book and carefully consult, marking here and there little crosses in red ink.

Suddenly the door opened and a slight, fair haired girl entered timidly enough. The old man looked up.

"So, then, thou hast returned, thou naughty child! Where hast thou been gadding about when no honest maid should be astir? I'll warrant thou hast been talking lightly with that wastrel Pierre Gobrecht and forgetting thy old father!"

"Nay, father," returned the maid, her fair skin all ablaze and a tear in each eye, "Pierre is no wastrel, but a sturdy armourer such as all men praise in these days; and I love him!"

Digitized by Google

"Armourer!" says he. "Look you, Anna, I will have ye marry no armourers. Let but these sons of Belial, these French fiends be gone with their cannon, and I will find that which will make thee above these burghers, and above the burgomaster himself. Thou shalt wed a duke or a baron and have a castle and many servants and jewels."

"But, father, I want none of these things. I would rather have the love of an honest man like Pierre, than be the proudest lady in the land."

"Peace, girl! leave me to my work!" returned Antoine sourly, and Anna left the chamber with a sore heart.

Now as the night drew on there were rumours of a surrender; and these spread rapidly, and few of the townsfolk slept, but stood at their doorways talking excitedly. At daybreak there came together the burgomaster and the governor and certain of the chief captains who were over the garrison. And these met in the burgomaster's house. But about noon, when the firing should have been at its hottest, a white flag was run up from the principal tower which defended the gate of the city; and when this was seen, the French gunners let be for awhile.

From the big gate issued a little band headed by a herald with a white flag, and so were lost in the French lines. But soon came the tidings that the leaders of both sides had arranged a truce for three days whilst conditions were discussed for the yielding of the city.

On the second morning of the truce Antoine Nicaise rose early and breakfasted before daybreak. When he had finished he took a great empty sack and flung it over his shoulder, and in his hands he carried a pick and shovel. But the parchment map or chart that he had expended so much care upon he thrust into his bosom. And when Anna would have asked him whither he was bound, he answered shortly: "I go to win thee great riches," and so was gone. But Anna was greatly perplexed, and would have stopped him, but that she feared his wrath. So she held herself within doors all day wondering greatly what had taken her father.

Antoine went out with his sack and his tools down to the grand square, passing the church of St. Quentin which was sadly mauled by the cannon-fire of the French. When he came to the great gates he found them open, and a large crush of country folk pouring in with provisions to sell. The antiquary took no note of these but elbowed his way through the clamorous crowd and out into the open plain. Once there, he turned sharply to the right and making a detour arrived at the east corner of the city. From this point there ran a great highway right to Namur, but it did not enter the city, skirting it rather and crossing the border into France. Tradition and the tales of the country folk held that this highway was built by the Romans. Here the French troops had not established themselves, for the city on that side was too strongly defended by nature and art to afford any hope of breaking in. And of passers-by there were none.

Antoine Nicaise dropped his tools and sack from his shoulder. Thrusting his hand within his cloak he pulled out the parchment and examined it carefully. Then he marked a point in the centre of the road and took thirteen strides from it. At the thirteenth he stopped, and, throwing down his cloak to mark the spot, ran to fetch his pick and shovel and sack.

Just there was a little mound such as you may see on many country roads. This the old man attacked with his tools, manifesting an astonishing energy and strength not to be expected from a man of his meagre stature and scanty breadth of shoulder. At first the earth fell away easily before his onset until he had digged a hole deep enough to take him up to the chin. By this time the sun had climbed to the meridian and beat sheer down on the old man's back. Still he toiled on, his face begrimed with sweat and dust from out of which gleamed his deep-set eyes fired with a lurid light of anticipation.

All at once his spade struck upon some hard substance. With a half-muffled cry of glee the antiquary pushed back his long matted hair and in fevered haste cleared away the soil from the spot. Peering down as the sun's rays fell upon the hole, he found a massive stone flooring carefully laid. A shout of exultation burst from his lips. Down on his knees he went, thrusting his long skinny fingers into the cracks, striving to tear up the great stone with his puny nails, till the blood ran out from his finger tips. Then he took his pick, bearing his whole weight and strength upon it to move the stone. But the masonry was stout and heavy; for long it resisted all his efforts. Despite the heat which was now become very great the old man plied his tool upon the interstices with a desperate energy. The perspiration streaming down his visage fell upon his long beard, matting the hair, till he wore the appearance of a maniac.

Yet at last the work was accomplished: the stone moved slowly but surely, until it was levered up and a gaping cavity disclosed. Flinging himself flat upon his stomach Antoine thrust his right arm into the opening and brought it back with something that shone dully in the sunlight. It was a golden vase of ancient workmanship.

For a few moments the old man regarded it in silence, his hand trembling with uncontrolled excitement. Then with a fearful look about him he thrust the vase into his sack, and taking flint and tinder from his wallet kindled a light by whose rays he lowered himself into the cavity.

By the light of his candle Antoine found himself in a narrow cell with walls of solid masonry. About the right hand side ran three stone shelves, one above the other, whereon were ranged various articles. It was from the topmost of these shelves that he had reached the golden urn.

Whether the vessels on the shelves were all of gold the dim illumination of his torch failed to inform him. But opening the mouth of his sack he swept them in, vases, urns, a necklace, and a heap of coins whose falling clink sounded sweet in the antiquary's ears; last of all he laid his hands on a flask which seemed to contain a liquid.

As he pushed the flask into his sack a shadow fell across the ground at his feet. A cold fear seized his heart, turning him deadly sick so that he scarce durst raise his head. From above a voice cried roughly:

"What have we here? Here is some sneaking plot if I mistake not! Henri, Richard, Mortbleu! Hither, lads, and look you on this old mole, sapping with some ill-intent, I'll warrant me."

With shouts and imprecations two or three soldiers leapt down into the hole and dragged the trembling antiquary out. But he had the presence of mind to grasp his sack tightly.

Blinking in the bright afternoon sun and his teeth chattering with fear Antoine Nicaise stood in the midst of a patrol of French musketeers on the dusty road.

"Holy virgin!" exclaimed one who carried a pike and wore a sergeant's stripes, "this is a notorious mummy Say now my antique crow-scarer, why dwell ye in a hole in the ground? Art afeared lest the sun's rays should scorch your delicate complexion?"

The soldiers welcomed this sally with a shout of laughter. But Antoine kept his peace, though his knees could scarcely support him. And the sergeant continued:

"Come now, thou blind old mole, cease to wag thy beard and answer my questions or I must convey thee to the provost-marshal. But what is this?" and he laid his hand on the parchment which the rough hauling had caused to project from the old man's robe.

As the soldier's eye fell upon the carefully traced lines and the red crosses marked here and there he knit his brows and exclaimed in a sterner voice:

"This smells of some deep laid scheme. By'r lady I think I have unearthed some plot here. To the king he shall go and that without delay. Henri, Mortbleu, seize the villain and hold him fast. Fall in you others, and quick march to the king."

Down the dusty road tramped the little knot, the sergeant's pike and the muskets and accoutrements of the men spirting little dazzling flashes of reflected light as they moved in order. And in their midst tottered old Antoine, still tightly clutching his sack, his lips working and his eyes strained with fear.

Meanwhile in the silent house in the Rue Dambrugge Anna Nicaise went about her household work with an anxious look, for her heart misgave her whither her father had gone. Not for three long months had he crossed the threshold to go forth, but had kept his room poring over the ancient volumes and measuring out lines on his parchment. As every hour sounded she would go to the door and look out, but only the sunlit empty street met her eyes.

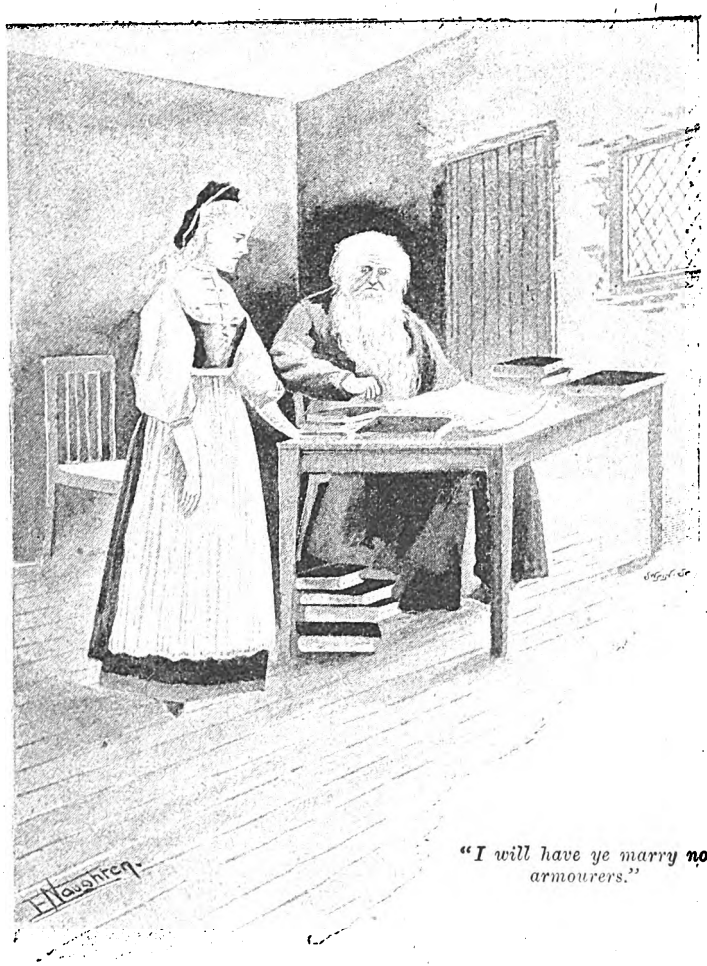
So the afternoon drew on until it might have been five of the clock when the girl heard footsteps sounding in the vacant street. Running to the open door she was met by the tall figure of her lover, Pierre Gobrecht the armourer.

"Oh, Pierre, hast thou heard aught of my father?" she cried, "he went forth at daybreak, I know not whither, nor would he tell me. Now I am sorely afraid some mishap has chanced him." And burying her face in her hands she fell to sobbing bitterly.

"Nay, Anna, never be afeard," said the armourer, clasping her in his arms, "perchance thy father hath lost his way or found an old friend."

"But he never had any friends," protested the girl. "He must have fallen into the hands of the French!"

Now Pierre set about comforting her as lovers have done since the flaming sword barred the way to Eden, and will do till the crack of doom. And presently he said he would go forth and look for the antiquary; and at that nothing would do but that she should accompany him. So the pair went out towards the great gates, and of every wayfarer they inquired if he had seen or heard aught of Antoine Nicaise. But all of them returned the same answer that neither had they laid eyes upon him nor looked to hear of him abroad that was like a hermit. And at each answer after this fashion Anna's heart sank lower, and she had much ado to keep from weeping afresh.



"I will have ye marry no armourers."

But just as they reached the great gates, there encountered them one with a full body and short thick legs who came bustling towards them. He was a shoemaker who lived in the Rue Dambrugge and a gossiping fellow, portentously important in the street, but at home a menial to his spouse. And when he saw Anna he called out upon her and told how he had seen her father hauled off to the French camp by a party of soldiery.

At these sudden tidings the poor girl was like to have swooned, and leant heavily upon Pierre's arm. But shortly recovering she insisted that her companion should lead her with all haste to the French camp to seek her father. And this at first he was loth to do, not caring to expose his betrothed to the jests of the soldiers. But her intreaties prevailed, and they went out through the gate into the wide expanse of the plain.

Now after some minutes they came to the outskirts of the French camp, and despite her anxiety Anna greatly wondered to see the order and strictness of rule which was manifest throughout that great army. Round the circuit of the encampment were posted sentries at equal distances, walking to and fro with musket at shoulder. Ever and again a relief guard would be marched down to relieve with due precision and discipline one of the sentinels. On an open space squads of men in bright blue uniforms and white breeches were being drilled, with many hoarse calls from their officer. On the left lay the cavalry lines, long rows of picketed horses champing and whinnying, while on the right were massed together large tumbrils filled with ammunition for the ordnance.

As they passed quickly through the turbid life of the camp Pierre laid his hand on the shoulder of a tall grenadier who was hurrying past:

"I prithee, sir," he exclaimed, "tell me if thou knowest aught of a certain old man whom report says has been taken prisoner this day by a French patrol."

"Ay, that do I," responded the other gruffly. "He whom you seek is but just now brought before the king out yonder," pointing to a large farmhouse that lay some thousand yards away. "You had best go thither. King Louis is fond enough of a fair lass's face!" And he turned such a glance of admiration on Anna as had like to have brought upon him the weight of the armourer's fist. But realising the danger Pierre restrained himself and they hurried on to the farm house.

In front of the door paced a long, thin, lath of a dragoon with an enormous moustache and a mahogany face, a large sabre at the slope over his shoulder. As he walked he clinked his spurs and jangled his scabbard on the ground. At a little distance a group of six of his comrades, the rest of the guard, sat in a row on a seat that ran along the wall, chatting and laughing together.

As Pierre and Anna walked swiftly towards the door with the intention of entering, the big dragoon thrust his long form before them, exclaiming:

"Stand back there in the King's name!"

Then seeing that the armourer pressed forward, though Anna hung back timidly, the trooper brandished his sabre, preparing to strike down the intruder. But Pierre was too quick for him. Bending low he ran swiftly under his guard, grasped him by the waist belt, and with a throw often practised in the playing fields round Tournai on saints' days, hurled the dragoon over his shoulder. With arms and legs wide apart he described spread-eagle fashion a semi-circle in the air, and then striking the ground with considerable force lay still, stunned.

But before Pierre could gain an entrance the other troopers, who had gazed in amazement at their comrade's mishap, flung themselves upon him, and for all his brawny arms and desperate struggles their weight bore him down. Pinning him to the ground they deliberated what they should do with him.

But apparently the noise of the struggle and the girl's shrill cries had penetrated within. For now an officer of high rank came hurrying out and inquired the reason of the tumult.

On seeing him the soldiers let go their hold on Pierre and he stood up, and with him the sentry who had now recovered somewhat, but still rubbed his sore head with a grim look upon the cause of it. So each told his story and Anna added her testimony. The upshot of it was that the officer directed two of the men to lead the prisoner into the building, charging them to guard him straitly, and to bring the girl with him.

At first the difference between the bright sun outside and the dim light of the farmhouse blinded Pierre and Anna. But their eyes growing accustomed to the change, they found themselves in a long chamber with a low ceiling, raftered and coloured a dusky brown by many years of smoke. Round the wainscotted walls were gathered noblemen and officers in gorgeous uniforms and long curling wigs. At the far end of the room on a raised daïs sat the Grand Monarque himself, for here it was he held his daily court. He was dressed in a long pale blue coat, a flowered crimson vest, and black silk breeches, a slight figure of a man, not uncomely in countenance, yet with a commanding eye and a regal air. Around him were grouped two princes of royal blood, the High Chamberlain, and the Provost Marshal, Alexandre de Goulard, a harsh, black-visaged man with a huge moustache curling back towards his ears. In a chair set by the king's side Anna saw one whom she thought the most beautiful lady she had ever set eyes on. She was of a goodly stature with a finely proportioned figure. But her face and features were of a rare excellence; her eyes black as night and large-orbed, while her raven tresses curled down each side of her countenance, and were pulled back over her shell-like ears. This was the King's "Second Spouse" as she was termed, Madame de Montespan, a woman of great beauty and wit. And at that time her will was paramount with Louis.

Anna had scarce time to discover her father standing over against her between two soldiers when the King spoke:

"How now, my Lord Marquis, who are these malignants who disturb our court assembled here?"

"May it please your Majesty," returned the officer, bowing low. "These are two townspeople of Tournai

This fellow would have forced an entrance in, and when the sentry forbade him, took him and heaved him over his shoulder. And as to the girl, she will have it that she is the daughter of yon old hermit."

"Is it so, my lord?" returned the King, who appeared in a goodly humour. Then, turning to the armourer: "So then, my young brawler, you would even force your way into the royal presence without a by-your-leave, and when my good fellows hindered, you set about breaking their necks. By my star, madame," he exclaimed to the lady at his side, "but methinks it would serve my turn to have him strung up at once as a warning to turbulent fellows and destroyers of the peace. And as for the damsel," he added, turning to Anna, "I trow you came to assist your companion by turning the heads and breaking the hearts of my lieges with that pretty face." And he stared hard at her, so that she was fain to hang her head.

But Pierre, nothing daunted, spoke out right bravely. "Nay, sire, I had meant no harm to your soldiers. But that saucy knave at the door would not let me pass when I sought to bring this lass to her father, who she heard was in prison."

"Well-a-day," returned the king, smiling somewhat, "stand aside until I have done with this venerable prisoner. Guards, bring forward the old man!"

So Antoine Nicaise was led forth and set in the centre of the room facing the daïs, and all eyes were turned upon him. The king questioned the sergeant of the patrol who had taken him, and he told his story, how they had discovered the prisoner digging by the roadside, and on him had found a map in different colours, and how this had smelt to him of plots and mining. When the king had heard this, he turned to Antoine and bade him speak. And the antiquary obeyed, making obeisance to His Majesty.

"May it please you, Sire, but I am no malefactor, neither have I hatched any plot against your Majesty. My name is Antoine Nicaise, and a simple antiquary of Tournai am I, nurtured in poverty. Yet I have ever been a student, and spent years in poring over old volumes. Now it happened in my youth I did some slight service to a monk of the Franciscan Abbey which lies some four miles from the city. He was an aged man, and a student like myself, and when he came to die he sent for me, and," continued Antoine, "if I do not weary your Majesty I will relate how I came to be digging by the roadside."

The king, who appeared greatly interested, signed to him to proceed.

"On his death-bed he sent for me, and when I arrived he motioned me to his side and said:

"'Antoine, I have conceived for thee a great affection, and would requite thee for the service thou didst once render me. As for me, I am a-dying, and riches are no more than the dust of the road. Yet with thee it is different, for thou hast a child to nurture and provide for. Look you in yonder press,' said he, pointing to a corner, 'and take from thence that antique volume. Study that and therein you will find a sure road to wealth.' And with that and a word of farewell he turned his face to the wall and died.

"So I took the book home, Sire, and studied it then at my leisure. It was written in the Roman tongue by the crabbed hand of a monkish copyist, and not facile for weakening eyes to read. Yet at the last I unearthed its secrets. It proved to be an ancient record of the Druids written in the reign of the Emperor Domitian.

"Therein I found it stated, as indeed the peasants tell to this day, that the road at the east of the city was built by the Romans as was their custom when they had conquered a country. For as your Majesty is well aware it was a saying amongst that proud nation 'All roads lead to Rome.' Likewise this book revealed that, as was the wont of the Romans, their rich dead were buried by this roadside, and in their graves were stored with the ashes, jewels and coins of great value. By conning the pages assiduously for several years I constructed a plan which the soldiers who arrested me have taken from me, suspecting it to be some treacherous plot against your Majesty.

"I had no sooner completed this map, marking out the position of the graves by careful measurements, than the French army was directed against the city, and the siege began.

"You may figure to yourself, Sire, the rage and despair with which I watched your lines drawn around our walls, fearing lest some unlucky cannon ball or stray musket-shot might terminate my existence, and bury my secret with me.

"At length there came the time when, reduced by famine and pestilence, the commanders of Tournai flew the flag of truce. As quickly as I might my preparations were made, and to-day at early morn I set forth with pick-axe and shovel, my plan in my bosom, and having gained the road digged there with all diligence till I found the object of my search. And the rest of the tale, Sire, your soldiers have related."

To this long recital King Louis had listened with great attention, and the interest of the tale had taken the whole assembly by the ears. Madame de Montespan leant forward with sparkling eyes and parted lips. The silence was broken by King Louis.

"Antoine Nicaise," said he, "we have heard your tale, nor do we disbelieve it. But it yet remains that you should put the topstone to the structure of your narrative by disclosing to us what you discovered in this old Roman sepulchre. For by all accounts it should prove somewhat entertaining."

"Willingly, your Majesty," returned the antiquary, and with that he pulled apart the mouth of the sack. Diving his arm into its recesses he brought out one after another all those articles that had lain hidden in the grave for so many centuries, and handed them to the King.

First he drew forth an alabaster vase, containing the ashes of the dead Roman. Then came another vase of gold, chased with the loves of gods and goddesses; then three gold rings adorned with precious stones, two gold spurs, the bit of a battle horse inlaid with silver and gold, upon which the rust of many years lay lightly. With these were a seal on which was emblazoned a rough coat of arms, and a necklace of pearls. And at this last the fair eyes of Madame de Montespan grew big with surprise and delight, for the stones were large and choice. But still Antoine brought out fresh spoils from the sack's mouth—a golden stylus and a hundred pieces of gold bearing the effigy of the Emperor Domitian.

"Stay," exclaimed Louis. "If I have read my history aright, and the works of the ancients, there should be an offering of wine to slake the thirst of the toiling ferryman of the Styx. Where is Charon's flask of wine?"

"Nay, but that is here, too," answered the antiquary, drawing forth a crystal flask. "The wine has become quite clear."

"Come, gentlemen," said the king in a merry mood, "who will drink a health to this old Roman lord?" But none of the courtiers seemed eager to pledge the ashes.

Suddenly Louis uttered an exclamation. He had taken up the alabaster vase, and, having broken the seal thereon, was pouring out the ashes. As he did so, his eye caught upon an inscription on its uptilted surface. Slowly he spelled out the words, till at last the sentence was complete. And thus it ran:

"Dii qui sepulchra custodiunt, poena acerrima afficiant illum qui in hoc mausoleum irrumpat. In vita sua casus resque adversas satis crudeles Aurelius Silvius passus est, in sepulchro saltem placide quiescat."

"Eh bien," cried King Louis, looking round. "Who amongst you, gentlemen, will turn that into French for us?" Then, no one offering among the courtiers, he added: "It seems we must e'en translate it for ourself. Thus, methinks it should go: May the Gods who guard tombs punish him who breaks open this mausoleum. The troubles and misfortunes of Aurelius Silvius have been cruel enough during his lifetime; in the tomb at least let him have peace."

As the King recited this in a slow and solemn tone, the more superstitious of those about him shook their heads and whispered to their fellows that they at least would not care to change places with the antiquary. But Louis said:

"Come, now, good sir, you have proved the truth of your story up to the hilt, and as for us you are free. Yet belike you have only exchanged one judge for another yet more potent because unseen. Fear you the curse of these dead ashes?"

Antoine stood up straight smiling scornfully.

"Many thanks do I return to your Majesty for your noble generosity and justice. But for the curse, it troubles me not at all. Ill words break no bones, they say, and I fear a live man's arm worse than the idle threat of a parcel of ashes. But with your Majesty's leave, I would humbly offer Madame this necklace of pearls, which is not unworthy to deck that ivory neck."

But Madame, though her heart greatly desired the necklace, was yet constrained by fear to reject the offer, roundly declaring that she would have no part or lot in breaking into the Roman's tomb.

So the king ordered the guard to release Antoine and his daughter and Pierre, sending them back to Tournai with an escort, for the incident had greatly entertained him, relieving as it did the tedium of camp-life.

On the next day, when the truce expired, the terms of capitulation were agreed upon, and the town was handed over to the French on honourable conditions. But the antiquary journeyed secretly to Antwerp, and there disposed of his treasure to an English merchant, returning well pleased with his bargain. Among the gossips of the town, indeed, when tongues wagged freely, it was confidently reported that he had received the price of one hundred thousand livres. Be that as it may, Antoine Nicaise remained in the old house in the Rue Dambrugge, saying little to his fellows, and sternly forbidding his daughter from any intercourse with her lover. Meanwhile a French garrison was quartered on Tournai, and the citizens, being unmolested, returned to their avocations, and the city resumed its ordinary aspect.

But the return of peace without brought no quiet to the antiquary's mind. A restless desire ever burned in his bones. He could not sleep of nights, but would lie awake, his quickened fancy roaming over the treasures that yet lay hidden in the graves along the roadside. Ever it appeared to him that giant hands, formless but of a terrible intensity, laid hold of him and dragged him forth from the city to the Roman highway. His blood coursed at fever-heat through his veins, and he would be impelled to rise from his bed and lighting a candle sit poring over the parchment until the dawn of day brought sanity to his brain.

Thus the time passed. The blackness of night brought ever an intense longing, a keener thirst for more gold, which the calm light of day could scarcely master. Hazardous it could not but be, since all the country-side knew of his great discovery. Already he dreaded lest the parchment should be stolen from him, and hid it at the bottom of a heavy iron-clamped chest.

Drew himself into a doorway to escape observation.

But at last the visions of the night, these terrible, mysterious impulsions, turned the scale. One night after Anna had retired to her room, Antoine made his preparations softly, and biding impatiently till a half hour after one sallied out into the vacant street. His features had grown gaunter as the desire consumed him, and from beneath his broad-brimmed hat his eyes gleamed like burning coals.

A damp, warm wind met him as he stole down the street, and the overhanging eaves of the houses dripped with moisture. Little pools of rain lay here and there in the unevenness of the way, and blinked beneath the infrequent oil lamps till to Antoine they seemed like twinkling eyes that spied on his every step. Despite the closeness of the air and the thickness of his cloak the old man shivered like one caught with a fit of ague.

This time he avoided the great gates of the city, and directed his steps towards a point where a breach had been made by the French cannonade. As he crossed the Place des Armes he heard the tramp of the approaching watchman, and drew himself into a doorway to escape observation. Presently the man appeared, swinging a heavy lantern, and calling as he went: "Two of the clock, Sirs, and a cloudy night."

On sped Antoine noiselessly past the great houses that lifted their walls to the lowering clouds, and whose blank windows stared across the square like the pathetic sightless eyes of a blind beggar. Once he thought he heard stealthy steps at his back treading in time with his own, and turning round sharply caught, as he thought, a dark shadow slipping quickly behind a projecting buttress. With a catch in his breath and a sinking in the pit of his stomach that brought on a deadly feeling of nausea, he compelled himself to retrace his steps, and prove if his eyes had deceived him. Nothing, however, could he find lurking behind the buttress; and, comforting himself with the thought that it was but the silent flight of a night-bird, Antoine resumed his way.

Threading a narrow lane at its further end he came upon the place he sought. Here the ordnance of the French had battered a great gap in the wall, and about the cavity lay strewn in fantastic masses, great heaps of broken masonry, fascines and sacks of earth. Through these the old man groped and blundered, with many imprecations as his shins struck against sharp edges, till at last he passed through the dry moat and out into the open country.

Not a solitary star broke through the blackness which lay like a thick blanket hung low over the plain. But Antoine Nicaise knew the ground well, and, turning sharply to the right, took his bearings by a tall row of poplars, and hurried along over the humid ground.

To his fevered brain the void night was filled with fearful gigantic shapes, that crowded round him, urging him to quicken his pace. All at once to his strained ears came a sharp sound, like the rattling of a displaced stone a hundred yards behind. This time he dare not turn back; a panic terror took him by the heels, and for all the weight of the tools onhis shoulder and his heavy cloak, he hurled himself headlong forward, splashing through mire and puddles, till at length he gained the goal he sought for.

But here another difficulty met him. In the lack of light one portion of the high-road was so like another that it seemed as if the antiquary's journey should end in vain. But Antoine was not to be baffled. Casting all fears to the winds as the gold hunger gripped him more fiercely, he took a lantern from his sack, and by the aid of steel and tinder, lighted the candle. Then, pacing up and down some two hundred yards either way, the lantern revealed a familiar clump of bushes that stood in his mind's eye as a landmark. The rest was easily done. By the candle-rays he consulted his map, measured out the distances, and in the end hit upon the exact point.

A gloomy dawn found him deep in a cavity of his own making, and ere the bells in the city towers and steeples sounded the hour of eight Antoine had forced his way into the second mausoleum, and stood surveying its contents with the aid of his lantern.

On a sudden a pebble dislodged from above came rattling down at his feet. Another followed, striking him upon the head. Startled, he dropped his lantern on the ground and looked up. Over the edge of the aperture appeared three faces, and at the sight of them Antoine Nicaise felt his time had come. Three evil faces were they; the first, a long, lantern-jawed, cadaverous visage with deep-sunk, malevolent eyes; the second, covered with a red bristling moustache and beard, with a purple scar running obliquely across the forehead; and the last pouch-cheeked, double-jowled, with features contorted in a horrrible grin.

The old man's knees rapped together. At his feet the candle in the overturned lantern flared and flickered as the wax melted. A frenzied terror shook him, his ears were filled with a great roaring, and before his eyes in lurid red letters stood out the words: "May the Gods who guard tombs punish him who breaks open this mausoleum."

He tried with all his force to cry out. But as his mouth opened the keen point of a dagger hurled deftly from above took him in the throat, and he fell forward on his face, clawing convulsively at the ground.

"Curse me," ejaculated the rotund robber, as they filled in the grave after they had emptied it of the spoil. "This antiquary was surely a man of forethought thus to dig his own sepulchre. He hath saved us thereby much trouble and no little expense in sexton's dues."

So Antoine Nicaise was seen no more in Tournai. And when the rumour of his disappearance spread abroad folks shook their heads and whispered mysteriously. So that to this day they will tell you in the city how the Devil flew away with the antiquary.

BY MERE CHANCE.

With a gesture of annoyance, he flung his pen upon the table.

"It is useless! I shall never succeed in describing this scene until I have actually experienced it," he said to himself.

An ordinary, common or garden writer of short stories would never have taken the matter so to heart. But he, Paulus Frank, the apostle of realism, could never allow a story with description in it that was not true to life go into the ruthless hands of the critics.

The plot of his novel was certainly simple enough. Two jealous, spiteful women had entered into a plot against the noble, innocent heroine of the tale.

By every possible means they sought to destroy her position in the eyes of her husband, and those of the world. They finally agreed upon the plan of sending an anonymous letter to her husband, wherein they accused the wife of faithlessness.

Paulus Frank cultivated close relations with a man whom he had selected as the model for this hero, and often invited him for that reason to his house.

He had just reached the point where he had to describe how this man, who was naturally cold blooded, stands before his wife with a deadly pallor on his face and confronts her with the letter, threatening to shoot her unless she makes a frank confession of the whole transaction.

And it was just this scene that Paulus Frank felt himself powerless to describe.

Would the wife defend herself with the vigour and spirit against such an attack, or would she merely allow herself a contemptuous little laugh when brought face to face with the calumny?

Would her insulted and innocent heart rise in indignant protest against such a gross accusation, or would she merely let the matter drift on and make no further explanation than a quiet denial?

What expression would her face wear? Would she turn deadly pale or wear the flush of shame? Would her hands pluck nervously at her little handkerchief, or would she stand motionless and erect before him as if turned into stone under his very eyes?

And the answer to all these questions he did not find readily in his mind. Inspiration had left him in the lurch. Twenty times and more he strove to put on the paper the powerful scene which was to be the climax of his story.

But it was in vain, for success did not shine upon him, and he became more and more certain that he would only be able to portray the scene with justice and power when he had actually been through it himself, and felt every phase of emotion recorded in lines of fire on his heart.

Once this peculiar thought had taken possession of him, he was unable to rest until he saw it realised.

It came to him one morning with such force that he let his fist fall upon the table with a bang that almost shattered the glasses.

"Have you gone crazy?" cried his pretty young wife, raising her clear blue eyes to his face. "What's the matter? Ever since you began that wretched novel of yours you seem to be quite a different man."

And as he only stared at her and made no answer, she went on to reproach him soundly for his conduct.

"It cannot continue like this," she concluded. "It must stop before long," and then buried herself again in her work.

At the same moment the servant appeared on the scene with the announcement that the doctor was at the door.

A young man entered and greeted the husband and wife with the familiarity of an old acquaintance. Frank returned his greeting, then looked vacantly before him, and appeared to interest himself deeply in the pattern of the tablecloth.

Shortly after Frank went to his study with pleasure written all over his face. At length he seemed to have found a way out of his difficulty. He wavered, however, undecided for a little while. But why not? What harm was there?

Besides it was not possible in any other way. He would be obliged to write a plain, accusatory letter to his wife, but then he would confess it all afterwards and ask her forgiveness.

Thus there could be no further harm attaching to his plan, and he would be freed of all difficulty and be able to describe the scene with powerful realism.

He could not understand why the idea had not occurred to him sooner. It was so simple and so natural, and there seemed to be absolutely no other escape from his difficulty.

Thank goodness the time was now approaching when he would be able to hear the bitter protest of the innocent and calumniated wife.

Forthwith he was anxious to execute his design, but his heart beat a little faster at the thought of it. With difficulty he wrote a few lines in an altered handwriting, which interpreted in a pitiable way the accusation of the wife whom he adored and loved. And, in order to make the deception more complete, he added thereto the initials of the name of her supposed lover and traducer.

For this purpose he selected the name of the young doctor who had only a few minutes before come to his house on a visit.

"It is true, I know, that my wife cannot endure him," he said to himself, "but what of that? The scene will be all the more natural and powerful."

Yet somehow as he wrote the address on the envelope —his own address—a sad feeling stole over him.

"Some things cause pain, even in a joke," he murmured to himself. "How thankful I am for my wife's stainless character!"

And with trembling fingers he finished the writing. Then he weighed carefully in his mind what the next step should be and finally carried it to the post-office himself.

All was going splendidly. In the evening they intended to go to the theatre, so that she would find this letter, on which so much depended, among her other papers and letters when they got home again. The whole scene would be acted at night just as in a real novel. It was splendid.

When they came out of the theatre it was already late.

"After midnight," remarked Frank as they passed the tall clock in the hall.

He asked the maidservant who opened the door for them if there were any letters, and she gave him those that had come while they had been at the theatre.

While his wife sank with a tired sigh into an arm-chair and untied her veil he remained standing and ran his eye over the addresses.

Suddenly something seemed to strike him. He raised his eyebrows slightly, and casting a stern glance in the direction of his wife tucked the correspondence under his arm, bade her good-night, and went abruptly into his study.

The young wife observed him narrowly, drew a deep breath as her custom was, and shook her head. She did not ask him whether there were any letters for her among his own, and he, of course, did not tell her.

Then she took her candle from the servant girl, and walked slowly towards her bedroom.

Once in his workroom, Frank indulged in a contented little laugh. At last the goal was in sight. In a few moments he would know all he wanted to know! Yes, all, and he laughed again. Then it would be easy for him to describe the scene from beginning to end in a masterly manner.

Just a little more patience, and her maid will have left her. Going up and down in his room, he calculates what effect will be produced on the world by his novel, drawn in the most realistic manner from Nature itself.

"I wonder what makes her so slow to-night?" he said to himself.

In the stillness of the night he could hear the sounds of their voices. Then he heard her lay down her rings on the marble slab of the dressing-table. Thereupon the clear sounds of her merry laughter floated through the air to his ears.

"To-day of all days, she seems to take so long," he murmured to himself.

A little while longer he walked up and down the room with excited brain. Then he heard the opening and shutting of the door and steps dying away in the distance.

"At last!" he exclaimed with a sigh.

Softly and with great caution he pressed the door handle, walked lightly through the dressing-room into the bedroom, and entered with such suddenness and violence that the young wife cried aloud with fear and astonishment.

"How you frightened me! Have you gone crazy?"

He made no answer, but stood in silence, watching carefully every gesture that she made and every change of expression that crossed her face.

Then in measured steps and with a pale, earnest face he approached her.

The fair young wife sat upright in bed.

The night candle burnt brightly on the table beside her.

With trembling, feverish hands he held out the terrible letter to her.

"There! Read that!" he cried in an angry, pained tone of the outraged, injured husband.

The woman turned suddenly to a deathly pallor. She seized the letter hastily and cast a rapid glance over it.

For a moment she raised her eyes to her husband's face, but only for a moment, for she immediately again read over the letter that she held in her trembling hand.

"I know all," he added quietly, watching every movement she made. "I know it all," he repeated louder and in sullen anger.

She made no reply. Her mouth twitched nervously, her eyelids dropped, and with a wild cry of hysterical anguish she slipped out of the bed and flung herself at his feet. The amazed husband looked on with a dull sensation of horror in his heart, while she clung to his knees, and with an agonised voice groaned out:

"Forgive me! Forgive me!" JESSIE BOYD.

Jumbled Story Competition.

A good number of competitors in this competition came very near putting the story together correctly, but a certain proportion failed to strictly comply with the conditions. Some wrote the title or the author's name, some omitted stops, some pasted on the lines so feebly that they came off before the paper reached the checkers, while a few neglected to put their names on their attempts. Altogether, thirty-four competitors were absolutely correct. We have added a few shillings to the £10, with the result that each winner receives 6s. as a share of the prize. A Romance of the American War.

It was in the year 1862. We were lying before Richmond, and McChellan was waiting for orders, which, alas! never came, to move on to the Confederate capital and put a speedy termination to the war.

Our Colonel was a noble specimen of a Virginian gentleman, who had at the outbreak of the struggle espoused the cause of the North, in opposition to the wishes of his wife and relatives.

His patriotism brought about a separation from his family.

His wife and her daughter, a young girl of sixteen years, went to live with his father-in-law, who was an ardent Confederate, while the Colonel joined the Union troops at Washington.

This much of his history we knew, and it accounted for his almost gloomy demeanour.

It was evident that he loved his wife and child, and though he had given them up at his country's call, yet the separation was hard to bear.

Still, not a murmur passed his lips, and he was respected and loved by the regiment who acknowledged him as their leader.

I was at the time a captain, commanding a detachment under him, and one evening he sent me word to come to his headquarters.

"Captain," he said to me as I entered, "I have just received a communication from General McChellan himself, that the enemy have obtained secret information of the movements of the very division I command. There must be spies in the camp. This thing must be stopped. My honour and fidelity to my country are brought into suspicion thereby. I commission you to ferret out who it is that betrays us, and no mercy shall be shown him."

"Colonel Thornton," replied I, "my suspicions have been awakened in the same direction."

"Ah," exclaimed he, "whom do you suspect?"

"Some time ago," continued I, "we had a young drummer boy among us. The other day he was brought into the camp a corpse. The men had found him dead in the woods. His face was shattered by a ball beyond all recognition, and he was only known to be our drummer boy by the clothes he wore. A sheet was wrapped round the corpse, and it was interred. Just as the body was being lowered into the grave, the sheet slightly fell away from his head, and I saw that the hair was black. At that time it did not strike me, but afterwards I remembered that our drummer boy had flaxen hair. Since then I cannot help suspecting that that boy was a spy, and that he had used this stratagem to escape from the camp unnoticed."

"You say he was only a boy?"

"Yes, a lad about sixteen years old."

"I believe your suspicions are right. When did this occur?" said the Colonel.

"Yesterday morning."

"No doubt the boy has obtained all the information possible, and is now on his way to join the Rebel Army."

"If he is," said I, "he can still be captured. The Confederates are over two days' journey off. The boy is no doubt skulking through the woods, and the recent rains have made the way almost impassable to one on foot. If I set out at once with a detachment on horseback I think I can overtake him."

To this the Colonel agreed, and less than fifteen minutes later I started at the head of six men on my expedition.

We scoured through the woods during the whole night, and as we were well mounted we travelled a considerable distance.

Just at daybreak the next morning a cry of one of our men drew us up before a clump of bushes.

There, on the grassy mead which carpeted the earth, lay stretched in a deep sleep a young girl.

Her dress was torn and bespattered with mud, her arms and hands were scratched by the briars through which she had passed.

Yes, she was very beautiful, and as I peered into her face, I was struck with the resemblance she bore to the drummer boy for whom we were searching.

Yes, there was the same fair countenance, the florid complexion, the flaxen hair, now loosened from its restraint and extending in a mass over her head and shoulders.

My heart throbbed violently as I thought that the drummer boy might have been a girl in disguise, that the sleeper was a girl spy.

To satisfy my mind I alighted from my horse and bent closely over her. Fatigue and exhaustion had rendered her sleep so profound that I did not awaken her.

I drew forth a package of papers from her pocket.

They were addressed to a noted Confederate general.

I broke the seal and read the contents.

There was a full description of our numerical strength, our plans and future movements.

There was no doubt.

The beautiful sleeper was a girl spy.

"Men," said I, and my voice slightly trembled, "do your duty."

With averted countenances several of my men approached and wakened her.

"Oh, I am lost! I am lost!" cried she, sinking to the ground.

"Handcuff her," ordered I, "and place her on a horse."

"Ah," shouted she, "whither will you bring me?"

"To the Colonel," said I.

"Oh, no, no," begged she, turning as pale as death, "do not bring me to him. Kill me here. I fear not death. I beg not for life. Only kill me, kill me on this spot."

Her pleading was, however, in vain. I could but order my men to proceed as I had directed. She now began to struggle and scream. It was with the greatest difficulty that she was bound and put on horseback.

It was late in the afternoon when we arrived in camp.

I immediately proceeded to the headquarters of the Colonel.

"Well," asked he, as I entered; "have you succeeded?"

"I have," replied I, "the spy is caught."

"Caught?"

"Yes. Only it seems that the drummer boy was but a disguise. The spy is a girl."

"A girl!" exclaimed he in surprise.

"Yes, here she is."

My men at that moment dragged in the struggling captive.

Freeing herself from her captors, she rushed towards the Colonel, and kneeling in the dust before him, exclaimed:

"Father!"

"Ida—my daughter!" shrieked he in such a tone of anguish that it pierced the very souls of those who heard it.

It was midnight when the court-martial adjourned.

The Colonel had not taken part in the council, and I was commissioned to inform him of the result of their deliberations.

I found the Colonel sitting at his desk reading a Bible.

He seemed unnaturally calm.

"Well?" asked he eagerly. "They have found her guilty?"

I could only nod.

"Oh, Heaven!" he cried, momentarily overcome.

"They have found her guilty," said I, "but they have not sentenced her. They know how much you love your daughter, and they have left it to you to decide her fate. You can doom her to death; you can set her free. Oh, sir, let me beg for your daughter's life. Let her live. A father's love will be a sufficient reason for this act of clemency in the eyes of all the world."

He paced up and down the room with agitated steps.

I anxiously waited for him to speak.

At last he turned to me and abruptly said:

"Bring her to me, and be present to await further orders."

I departed, and a moment later returned with the beautiful girl.

With slow steps and eyes bent to the ground, she advanced until she stood before her father.

He gazed at her for a moment, and then turned away to hide the tears that sprang to his eyes.

"I must be firm, I must be firm," he muttered.

Gradually he became calm, and, gazing full at her, said, in a voice that betrayed not the slightest sign of passion:

"Ida, you were the light of my days, the hope of my existence. I thought to behold you the happy wife of a worthy man. But now all that is passed. You have chosen not only to betray your country, but your father."

"No, no," she cried wildly; "not my father, not you. My grandfather pictured to me how glorious would be the service I could perform for the South. Everyone around us was ready to die for the cause. I felt the inspiration; I became a spy. When I was sent to this division I knew you were its leader. It is true I obtained the information they desired of me. I carried the messages with me when I was captured. It was my intention to surrender them up only on the condition that whatever would happen your life should be saved."

"I care but little what becomes of me," replied he sternly, "it is the betrayal of your country that demands your punishment."

"And that is?" gasped she.

"Death!"

The next morning was sad and dreary.

The drizzling rain fell from the dull, leaden clouds.

All nature seemed to weep at the mournful spectacle about to be enacted.

The Colonel was calm and stern.

Not a sign of the tumult within his breast was visible in his almost impassive countenance.

"Lead forth your prisoner," said he to me in icy tones.

I left his presence, and soon returned with horror depicted on my visage.

"Oh, sir," cried I, kneeling before him, "she is dead!"

"Ah, dead!" exclaimed he.

"Yes," continued I, "she lies cold and inanimate in her cell. She has poisoned herself, for I found this phial in her hand. See, it is marked 'poison.'"

"Heaven's will be done," ejaculated he.

"Sir," cried I, "she is now dead. You have kept your faith to your country. Will you allow us to prepare for an interment worthy of the daughter of our commander?"

"Do with her as you may," sighed he, sinking gloomily into a chair.

I left him thus to make the necessary arrangements for the funeral.

It was a grand affair, but the father did not attend it.

* * * * *

Three years passed away, and the war was over.

Colonel Thornton had been raised to the rank of general, and I to that of colonel.

We were in Washington, and I sent the General a courteous invitation to my approaching marriage.

He arrived quite late, and the guests were already assembled in the magnificent hall.

Not without a tremor I led my beautiful bride up to him.

She raised her veil, and, kneeling before him, softly murmured:

"Father!"

He staggered back, grew pale, and seemed to be struggling with a violent emotion.

Then stretching forth his arms he clasped her to his breast, and, whilst tears coursed down his furrowed cheeks, exclaimed:

"Alive, my Ida, alive. Oh, Heaven be praised!"

An explanation, of course, followed.

I confessed that I had induced the girl spy to counterfeit death as the only means by which she could save her life and her father's honour.

The funeral had been but a sham, and the girl spy was secretly conveyed to her friends.

I dare not reveal the secret while the war lasted, and the company was equally bound to silence.

When, however, peace and harmony had been restored to the country, I sought her whose life I had saved, and, wooing, won her.

The General, in the fulness of his joy, forgave the ruse, and his happiness was made complete by a reconciliation with his wife, who was also present.

Years have passed since then, and when I behold the beaming countenance of General Thornton, my father-in-law, I thank Heaven that it was permitted to me to save the life of the "Girl Spy."

PAUPER BLUE BLOOD

BY WINIFRED GRAHAM.

Author of "When the Birds Begin to Sing," "Through the Valley," "Six First-class Passengers," etc., etc.

CHARACTERS.

SEFTON RAVENSCROFT.—Son of the late Sir Reginald Ravenscroft and a pauper, owing to his father's failure.

GEORGINA PLUFF.—A governess in the family until Sir Reginald's death, when she intimidates Sefton into marrying her.

JOHN PLUFF.—A wealthy retired grocer, and cousin to Georgina Pluff (Lady Ravenscroft). In return for attendance at his dinners and At Homes, he supplies her with money.

MRS. RATHBONE.—A widow of whom John Pluff is rather fond, to the disgust of Georgina, who anticipates becoming his sole heiress.

LADY NORAH CANNINGTON.—In love with Sefton but who is compelled by her father to break off the engagement, owing to the former's poverty, and marry the Duke of Malvern.

CHAPTER XVI.

MAKING THE RUNNING.

THE baby was six weeks old, and Georgina had been quarrelling with her husband on the subject of god-parents.

"Of course, Pluff will have to be one," she declared, "that goes without saying."

"I wish you would not say 'Pluff.' You have only taken to that expression lately. Can't you give him a 'cousin' or a 'Mr.' occasionally?"

"I've picked it up from Mrs. Humphery's letters; our long correspondence has made us so very intimate, and she always speaks of John as 'Pluff,' now. Perhaps it does sound rather masculine."

"That you shall never do!"

"Any how, I would rather he was not asked to be godfather."

"And why not, in the name of goodness?" cried Georgina shrilly.

"Well, it might be awkward for the poor little beggar when he grows up. John Pluff will take a sort of parental interest in him which he may not quite appreciate when he's old enough to understand."

Georgina looked at her husband solemnly.

"Sefton, I really did not give you credit for being such a fool. I hope you don't intend training the boy to be stuck up and rude to his mother's relation."

"I don't wish to argue about it, but we've had enough of John Pluff. I'm not going to have a grocer for my son's godfather."

"Grocer, indeed! He left the business four years ago. Besides, you seem to forget a boy requires two godfathers. I mean mine to have money for use, and name for swagger. I shall therefore ask my cousin and your uncle, Lord Macphairson."

The words startled as well as angered Sefton. He brought his fist down on the table with a thud.

"That you shall never do! Have you no sense of decency, no proper pride, no fine feelings to know when you are snubbed? He never approved of our marriage, and on hearing of it wrote my mother a very hot letter, which, out of consideration, I refrained from showing you, though you richly deserved to read it. Since then he has utterly ignored our existence, and you would so far lower yourself to ask a favour of him."

"You exaggerate everything, Sefton. Because the old idiot was crotchety at first, that is no reason why he should not have calmed down by degrees, and be ready to take the olive branch I am about to hold out. Now that I have done the right thing, and presented his sister's son with an heir to the estate, he may look more leniently upon me. I will humour you so far: if Lord Macphairson consents I'll let you off John Pluff. A little buttering note to him saying the swells offered, and we could not refuse them, though I was bitterly disappointed, etc., will put it all right. Then you can ask your beloved Mr. Shirling, and," with a sneer, "the Duchess of Malvern to stand as godmother!"

Sefton gave Georgina a look she did not forget for the rest of the day. She could not think what it reminded her of, but remembered eventually she had seen something like it upon one of the waxen murderers in the Chamber of Horrors.

"Write," he muttered, "and see what you will get from Lord Macphairson!"

A mocking laugh was his only reply as he left Georgina.

"You think you know a great deal," she said when he was well out of earshot. "But I can write a fascinating letter when I please, and I fancy I shall succeed in 'fetching' Uncle M."

So she indited a pathetic little epistle, with a good deal of unnecessary gush towards the finish. Had she known where to stop she might have gained the day.

Lord Macphairson hated humbug, and no small quantity of scandal had reached his ears concerning his nephew's wife at the time of Sir Reginald's death.

He answered Lady Ravenscroft by return. The letter was handed her at dinner. She waited before opening it till the servant left the room; then she did so slowly, and without looking at her husband. He, however, watched her face curiously, guessing the refusal from the vexed twitching of her eyebrows. She set her lips, breathing fiercely through her nostrils; then she folded it again without a word, still keeping her eyes averted.

"I should like to see the letter," he said at last.

Hot, petulant tears of offended dignity were forcing their scalding drops to the surface of Georgina's vision; she dared hardly trust herself to speak. She could not cope with Lord Macphairson's reply; it was too clever—and too true.

Tearing the sheet into atoms, with the fierce gestures of one who destroys a mortal foe, she crumbled the scattered pieces in her hand and flung them across to Sefton, saying: "Take the letter, and read it, if you like!"

He watched her sail from the room with the air of a tragedy queen, her head aloft, her eyes flashing; but for once it was not acting. The dramatic hand of Nature had asserted itself, and given a strange majesty to Georgina's bearing.

The scene quickened Sefton's sluggish blood; he felt like an actor in a drama, forgetting for the moment that he was himself. Following Georgina stealthily, he tracked her to the shrubbery. The red blossoms had long since died and been cut down, but she knew the spot, and it was thither she wended her way.

"Reginald," she whispered, "come to me; come, if you can, I adjure you, in the name of our love!"

She stood with her face turned up to the sky.

Two strong arms gripped her suddenly; hot, mad kisses fell upon her ashen cheek—kisses she had not felt for an eternity, kisses that had come from no lips but those that were long dead.

She stared at him, her fingers strained through her hair

She dared not move; but a scream, half joyful, yet thrilling with agonised terror, broke from her. As it did so, the man thrust her away. He remembered she was Georgina.

His wife looked at him wonderingly, still trembling from the shock.

"See," she said, "how long it is since you held me in your arms. I did not know you; I was afraid."

A nervous laugh broke from Sefton.

"I beg your pardon," he replied. "For the moment I thought I was my father."

She stared at him, her fingers strained through her hair, dishevelled from his caress.

"What do you mean?"

There was a horrified vibration in her tone.

Sir Sefton could not explain.

"Come in," he said; "these September nights are cold." She followed him without a word, still perplexed and somewhat dazed.

"You look tired. Go to bed, Georgina. I shall smoke in the study."

He walked away. She heard him lock the door.

"What did it mean?" he asked himself—"that wild fever of hate or love?" He felt as if he were stabbing her with every kiss, yet it gave him momentary, inexplicable delight.

"I suppose it's the same old riddle," he said, lighting a cigarette. "The mystery of sex!"

An apparition in pale blue greeted Georgina's astonished eyes.

Until the end of July Georgina had received constant letters from Mrs. Humphery, detailing Mr. Pluff's movements. He was seen driving daily with Mrs. Rathbone in the Park, and not only that, they had also appeared at theatres together and other places of amusement.

Then London became deserted, and the thread snapped. John Pluff drifted seawards, wrote frequently to Lady Ravenscroft, but never mentioned Mrs. Rathbone. For all his cousin knew, he might have married the widow secretly. The dread of this possible dénouement troubled Georgina sadly.

But now that she had carried her point and John Pluff was expected for the christening, her fears were lulled. At least, he would be free from Mrs. Rathbone at Ravenscroft Park!

Georgina, however, reckoned without her host. For the day after John Reginald had received his name at the font, her nerves experienced one of the severest shocks she had ever suffered through Mr. Pluff.

They were walking together, she and Cousin John, talking of John, junior's future, when an apparition in pale blue greeted Georgina's astonished eyes.

It was Mrs. Rathbone, in a diaphanous muslin gown, a hat of palest forget-me-nots, holding a sprig of unripe blackberries in her gloved hands. She gave a little shriek of joy upon seeing Lady Ravenscroft, and tripped forward on her high heels.

"How do you do!" she cried, beaming beneath Georgina's frigid welcome. "Delighted to meet you again; and dear Mr. Pluff, too, looking so well and sunburnt after his visit to the briny!"

Lady Ravenscroft noticed John showed no sign of surprise. He just gazed adoringly at this faked up specimen of decaying youth, and retained the widow's hand.

"How is it you are here?" asked Georgina, ill-concealing her amazement and displeasure.

"My doctor ordered me country air. I was to take a thorough change, he said. So I thought a little driving tour would do me good. I happened to be passing, when I heard from Mr. Pluff that he was staying in this neighbourhood. An excursion alone is always tedious, so I decided to put up and rest a few days at an ideal farmhouse close by, and was wending my way now to call upon you, Lady Ravenscroft."

Cousin John looked horribly triumphant. He actually appreciated this woman's pursuance of him. It appealed to his conceit.

Georgina said "Oh!" rather expressively, and relapsed into silence.

Mrs. Rathbone held up her blackberry twig pathetically.

"Can you tell me if these nasty, hard, red things are really what we used to eat and enjoy in our childhood?"

"Is it so long that you have forgotten?" asked Lady Ravenscroft sneeringly.

"Yes, indeed. I am thirty-three to-morrow."

Georgina longed to tell Mrs. Rathbone to her face that she was an untruthful cat, and must be fifty if a day, but refrained for the sake of John Pluff and his money bags.

"Oh! that's nothing!" broke in the man's cheery voice, "you're quite a chicken still at thirty-three. Guess you married the General young, for all the adventures you crammed into your married life!"

"Indeed I did! He plucked his flower in its bud. I was only sixteen, and still in the school-room, when he made me his offer. The Bottlemeads protested at first, declaring that such a mere child could not be fitted for the responsibilities of matrimony. But the dear General's persuasive powers prevailed, and then—he was such a good family."

"The General showed his excellent taste," declared Mr. Pluff. "He knew a good thing when he saw it, and didn't let the grass grow under his feet. I admire his foresight. He could tell what you'd grow into—you bet."

"I hope he was not disappointed," sighed Mrs. Rathbone.

The conversation was growing beyond Georgina's powers of endurance.

"Don't let us stand like so many tramps on the roadside," she said testily. "Come, Cousin John, or we shall be late for tea, and Sefton gets dreadfully hungry before five."

She turned without inviting Mrs. Rathbone to accompany them. Mr. Pluff's sense of hospitality was outraged.

"I say, Georgy, you have forgotten your manners, I think. You are goin' to ask Mrs. R. to join us in a cup, eh?"

The widow was blushing as red as her wig.

"Of course, if she likes," replied Lady Ravenscroft, "only you know Sefton has such a headache to-day."

"He didn't mention it to me," retorted her cousin.

"I have no wish to intrude myself upon Lady Ravenscroft," said Mrs. Rathbone, an angry look in her eyes.

"Oh! don't you notice her," whispered John Pluff, squeezing the widow's elbow. "Georgy can be an awful shrew, but she simmers down. She don't mean no harm. It's just her way."

"A very unpleasant way for all that," replied Mrs. Rathbone. "I shall go back to my humble glass of milk at the farm, and that dreadfully thick brown bread. Which is the turning, Mr. Pluff?"

"Georgina," he called to the retreating figure. "I am going to see this lady 'ome, so don't you wait tea."

Lady Ravenscroft turned sharply. She had only made matters worse by her exhibition of temper. They would be alone at the farm, and Mrs. Rathbone's back was up. Who could say into what folly she might lead poor misguided John.

"Please don't be offended," she cooed softly, changing her tactics, "I dare say it will cheer Sefton up. Whatever I say or do on the spur of the moment is always misunderstood!"

Mrs. Rathbone appeared pacified. She was dying to get into Ravenscroft Park.

Lady Ravenscroft shadowed John Pluff for the rest of the day, but when he started out to walk home with Mrs. Rathbone, Georgina's weary feet refused to carry her a yard further. Yet she waited for him at the gate anxiously.

He was an unconscionably long time, and not in the best of humours when his cousin commented on his lengthened absence.

"You don't give a fellow a chance," he said, "to make the running. By Jingo! she's a stunning woman, but don't give you no opportunity to pop the question. She's tip top company so long as you trot 'er out, and do 'er well, but when you begin to get practical she's wonderful shy, and rakes up the dear General just when the words are a swelling and a burning on your tongue. He's never allowed to lie peaceful in his grave, poor chap."

Georgina tottered and nearly fell.

So the game was up! It rested now in the widow's hand!

CHAPTER XVII.

An Accident.

Mr. Pluff spent the remainder of his visit almost entirely in Mrs. Rathbone's society.

He frequently brought her to various meals at Ravenscroft Park, telling Georgina to do the thing in style, and he would settle the accounts at the end of the week.

His cousin, too disgusted to protest, watched the courtship in mute horror.

The apathy of despair was upon her, she felt numb and sick with disappointment.

All her rosy dreams of inheriting John's fortune dwindled.

Surely some guardian angel should have stayed her fingers when she penned that fatal advertisement for a paying guest! Now, just retribution stared her in the face, as she watched Mr. Pluff drive away daily with the widow, to admire the first pallor of autumn's yellow lines upon the dull green trees.

"Such beautiful country!" Mrs. Rathbone exclaimed in rapturous tones to Georgina, "and Mr. Pluff has such a poetic soul. You would not believe how deeply he is affected by Nature, quite touching in a man of his build!"

"Yes," retorted Lady Ravenscroft snappishly, "he's too stout for sentiment. At his age he ought to have done with such follies. I wonder you can encourage him."

"Really! Well, we all take different views of human nature, and I believe that the soothing influence of the world beautiful, seen and discussed in the presence of a kindred soul, calms the brute nature, and makes poor, low, grovelling man almost divine!"

The widow raised her eyes upwards as she spoke.

"Bah!" retorted Georgina. "There's not much of the divine in John! But I would rather see good honest feet of clay than hidden vice posing on a pedestal whose foundation is hypocrisy."

"A strongly expressed opinion," murmured Mrs. Rathbone unruffled. "You confuse sentiment and sentimentality, Lady Ravenscroft. They are absolutely different. The first is ennobling, and the second merely the outcome of drivelling morbidity. The only fault I have to find in dear Mr. Pluff is his lack of ambition to leave his mark on the world. I am a true Bottlemead, and had I been a man instead of a weak and helpless woman, the craving for immortality which permeates nearly every human breast should never have been left unattained by me! My husband, cut off in his prime, had courage if needful to face the death dealing cannon with a smile upon his lips.

"You will never make a hero of John Pluff," said Georgina bitterly, "and I should hardly think your grand Bottlemeads or the General, who was such a good family, would care to see you associating (were they alive) with a man who four years back stood behind the counter of his own grocery store dealing out flour and sugar to the inhabitants of Sydenham."

Georgina watched eagerly for the effect of this speech, but Mrs. Rathbone smiled placidly.

"Mr. Pluff," she murmured, "is by nature refined and gentle. Flour only whitens the hands, and some libellous people had told me your cousin was a Soho butcher, though of course I never believed it. Still it is pleasant to hear the truth from one of his nearest living relatives."

Georgina bit her lip. The shot had failed.

A pause, during which the subject of their recent conversation appeared in white flannels that suited ill his portly frame, a coat of divers colours, and a straw hat. He removed the pipe from his mouth upon beholding Mrs. Rathbone. She was gowned in a coat and skirt of navy linen, a coquettish little sailor hat tilted rather on one side rested upon the marvellous red curls of her elaborate wig.

"You confuse sentiment and sentimentality."

"We're got up regular fine for our expedition!" exclaimed Mr. Pluff.

"Where are you going?" asked Georgina.

"Oh, didn't I tell you? Mrs. Rathbone wanted to go out on the river here. Of course, I know it's a mass of deeps and shallows, and no ordinary rowing boat can be navigated with them rocks about. But the farmer at Mrs. Rathbone's lodgings knew of a young fellow in the village who keeps a canoe. 'That will just suit us,' said I. 'Go and tell the lad I wish to hire it for my lady friend.' So the farmer struck a bargain with the boy, and the boat's waiting now at the stepping-stones; as tidy a little craft as ever I saw."

"But do you know how to paddle it?" asked Georgina. "The stream is very strong. I am sure it is not safe."

She was wondering what her cousin weighed, and whether, if he managed to squeeze his body into the canoe, the frail bark would sink to the bottom.

But John laughed long and loudly at her fears.

"We are not nervous," with a proud glance at Mrs. Rathbone. "There's a woman of spirit for you, Georgina! She won't hesitate to trust herself to me. Dare say we shan't go far, but it's pleasant to lounge on the water. Well, so long, my dear!" waving his hand to Lady Ravenscroft, and offering the widow his arm.

The two sauntered away, Georgina's eyes following them none too kindly.

"Lucky the canoe won't hold three," whispered Mr. Pluff, "or she," jerking his thumb in a backward direction, "would have offered herself as sure as a gun."

"I am afraid my presence here causes Lady Ravenscroft some annoyance. I wonder why?"

Mrs. Rathbone raised her eyebrows innocently, half smothering a sigh.

"It's the green-eyed monster, my dear Mrs. R., that is troubling my poor little Georgie, and sometimes I do feel downright sorry for 'er! She is so wrapped up in me, she can't bear not to have my undivided attention. You see her husband is a grumpy sort of chap, and no company!"

"I think he looks mad!" replied Mrs. Rathbone. "His eyes frighten me! He always seems to be staring—staring—at something that is invisible to others. I have felt little shivers all down my spine often when he comes near me, and should never be surprised to hear that an awful tragedy had taken place at Ravenscroft Park."

"No; now you don't mean that, really?" he gasped. "You see his Pa must have had a screw loose to blow out his brains for nothink. You make me regular shuddery!"

"Still I can't be blind to the fact that I depress his wife more than he does."

"Well, to be candid, my dear lady, it's your 'air. She was jealous of it from the first. That Titian tint fairly unsettled her. She has not got much to boast of on 'er own head, and the colour is just muddy! She would give her eyes to grow a pile like yours."

"Now you flatter!" laughed the widow, shaking her flaring curls at him. "Bad boy!"

They were nearing the silver stream, and the sight of the canoe excited Mr. Pluff. He held forth on his nautical powers, how he had steered the Skylark off Brighton, and gained a reputation at Margate for rowing out the prettiest girls, and hiring the best boats at the tallest prices.

But Mrs. Rathbone discovered to her sorrow, when eventually they were settled in the slender Canadian, that Mr. Pluff had absolutely no idea of managing a canoe.

He paddled wildly first one side and then the other, wobbling it so dangerously—she screamed and implored him to stop.

"It's all right now, I'm getting into it," he assured her. "Don't you fret yourself."

But for his heavy weight acting as ballast, they must have upset. Mrs. Rathbone knew this, and as the tide whirled them down, her terror increased.

She was wise enough, however, to see that Mr. Pluff would never give in so long as she doubted his powers of steering.

"There! You are doing it splendidly!" she gasped, concealing her agitation. "But you must be so hot, and I should enjoy a little quiet chat with you! Supposing we were to stop under that next tree?"

The intonation of her voice, the expression in her eyes, was irresistible. John Pluff could but obey.

She grasped a low bough of the tree gratefully.

"How pleasant and cool it is here!" she murmured. "The peace of this spot charms me!"

A satisfied chuckle broke from her companion, if ever his chance had come it was at this moment.

"Mrs. R.," he began determinedly, "now mind," as a faint crimson dyed the whole of her face in a moment, "I'm not to be put off. You've shilly-shallied with me long enough. I've a fine fortune to offer you and a large 'eart, what seems about to burst right out of my shirt whenever you deigns to smile upon me. Now, won't you be pleased to take a second 'usband, and be the bright star of his 'ome, the guiding planet in his empty life?"

A look of perplexity stole into the widow's eyes. Mr. Pluff noticed they had a hunted expression and that she raised her hands as if to ward off something.

He waited in suspense for her reply.

"Your question is a very difficult one for me to deal with," she began nervously, yet gazing at him in the same admiring manner. "Your goodness to me is so overwhelming, your generosity so touching, that I could fall at your feet, were I in a more suitable position to do so, and kiss your very boots. By this you will see that my whole heart is in your keeping, and were it possible for me to become your wife I would marry you to-morrow—but——

"To be candid with you, my dear—John" (she spoke the name tenderly) "I must own to a slight—a very slight deception, which, when you know all the circumstances, you will, in your kindness, overlook and forgive."

"Deception? Eh, what's that?" asked Mr. Pluff, pricking up his ears.

"I wanted your friendship, the strong arm of a man to lean upon—one I could trust to the world's end. Have you ever wondered why I am so friendless and deserted, associating with none of my husband's late admirers? My own past is spotless as the driven snow, but his——"

Here she broke off again, and applied the corner of a scented square of lace to her lowered eyes.

"Yes—yes."

"His was a great and grand career; but he was frequently led away by impulse, and his sweet, confiding nature was taken advantage of by scoundrels. He is now—poor, gallant soul!—not chained, as you supposed, by the fetters of the grave, but behind the ruthless bolts of a horrible gaol; therefore I throw myself in my loneliness upon your pity—to intreat you not to cast me off, but to respect my confidence and cherish my stricken and empty heart!"

For a moment Mr. Pluff could not speak. Mrs. Rathbone supposed he was overcome by emotion, struck dumb by her pathetic tale. The tone of his voice somewhat took her aback when John Pluff thought fit to reply.

"Oh!" he began, deliberately eyeing her severely, "so you're not a widdy after all, and the dear General's in chokee, is he? A nice fool you've made of me, Mrs. R. If you 'ad confided in me from the first I would have stood by you and respected you. But what I do hold to is honesty and openness. So long as people treat me fair and square I don't say nothing; but when it comes to a lady passing 'erself off as marriageable goods when she's got a live partner of her own locked away—well, I'll be jiggered if I like it. You've been makin' use of me, Mrs. R. You wanted a handy man to trot you about, and burn 'is wings like a bloomin' moth buzzin' round a candle! You 'aven't acted right by me, and no amount of talking will mend the matter. As to calling it a slight, a very slight deception, that's bally nonsense, though of course I don't know 'ow thin your poor gentleman may be. Still, though the law does think fit to detain 'im, is that any reason why I should dishonour 'is name still further by a-cherishin' of your lonely 'eart. I'm downright disappointed, and that's the truth!"

Mr. Pluff's plain speaking staggered Mrs. Rathbone. She had mistaken her man for once.

"You are very hard, and speak most cruelly!" she whimpered. "I did not know you could be such a monster, or I should not have betrayed my secret."

"Oh, don't you fear as I shall repeat it. I ain't that sort. But what I do say and stick to is that you are not the person I took you for, Mrs. R. I thought you a true and honest woman with noble hinstincts and the right kind of principles. I've been dodging about after you for the last three months for the sole object of placing you at the 'ead of my table, and saying—that's Mrs. Pluff. Now the deal's off, and we'd best part."

Mr. Pluff gurgled and rose to the surface.

He pushed the canoe into mid-stream, and in moody silence Mrs. Rathbone watched her flushed and angered escort frantically endeavour to paddle against the current.

His efforts were futile, the boat turned and twisted till it struck heavily against a rock, lurching violently. In his hurry to right it, Mr. Pluff upset the canoe on the other side. A wild scream and the General's wife was plunged head foremost into the water.

Mr. Pluff gurgled and rose to the surface.

Where was Mrs. R.?

MY ARISTOCRATIC CUSTOMER.

Bullion, my friend, whose laugh as he spoke was not as jolly as usual, is known to be one of the largest and most reliable dealers in jewellery and precious stones in London.

"Was I ever bit?" he said; "yes, I have been bit, and in the worst way, too. As I have acknowledged this much to you, I may as well tell the most complete swindle of which I was ever made the victim.

"One day in August all my assistants but one were away on a holiday, and I was 'tending' shop. Business was dull, and I thought as I gazed out upon the almost deserted streets, but for all the profit there was in keeping open, we might as well shut up and be off.

"My attention was aroused from this reverie by the opening of the shop door. I looked up as there entered a perfect type of the gentleman. His clothing was of the best material, and in thorough taste. He was tall, with snow-white necktie, and gold-rimmed spectacles across his nose. He might have been a bank manager, a member of Parliament, a clergyman. He certainly looked respectable enough to be either.

"'I have been recommended to you, sir—Mr. Bullion, I believe?'—I bowed—'by Messrs. Blank, Blankety and Blank. I understand you have the best assortment of diamonds in London.'

"'I believe that no house in England carries a larger or more varied stock,' I replied.

"'Well, my daughter is with me here from the provinces, and has met the gentleman to whom she has been engaged for several years. He has been through the Burmese war and gained the high promotion he merits, but his leave of absence is short, and I have yielded to the young people that the wedding should take place here.

"'Lacking time to make preparation for more rational gifts, I must do the best I can, and deck her out with the jewels that all women love so well. At all events, diamonds are a good investment. Let us see what you have.'

"I displayed my entire stock, tray after tray of glittering gems I produced, and though he handled them and held them up in different lights, there was not one sign of those suspicious movements which we dealers have learned to know so well and to watch for so closely.

"At last he made his selections—a pair of earrings sixty pounds, a bracelet one hundred pounds, a brooch twenty-five pounds, a solitaire ring forty pounds, and a lace pin for the only bridesmaid twenty pounds. All these were set with the finest first-water diamonds; two hundred and forty-five pounds—rather a good hour's work for a hot August morning.

"While it was being done up, the gentleman was busy counting over the contents of a large pocket-book, and when I handed him the small but valuable package and the bill (the bill, from force of habit, being presented a little in advance) he passed me over some bank notes. There were two hundred and forty pounds in all.

"Replacing the large pocket-book in his breast pocket, he produced a small purse, and proceeded to pay the balance. After searching in every pocket he found himself a sovereign short.

"While he fumbled and fussed, and while I partly occupied myself in trying to look as though I was paying no attention to him, I noticed a rather roughly dressed, thick-set man pass and re-pass the door. Then he came up and flattened his nose against the plate glass window. His next move was to place his body inside the door and close it. Then, with a sigh of relief and a disgustingly familiar wink towards me, he said, under his breath: 'In time, after all?' then stepped up to my customer, whose back had been turned to him, and smacked him on the shoulder.

"'Hey, Dick, at your old tricks yet, are you?'

"The gentleman turned round and seemed to be struck speechless. As for me, I was red-hot with rage.

"'What do you mean?' I demanded, 'by coming into this place and insulting my customer? Who are you, sir?'

"'Customer, eh? Been buying, has he? He's a nice customer, he is; and as to who I am and what I mean, there's my card, that'll soon tell you all you want to know.'

"'I don't want your card, sir. This gentleman has bought my goods and paid for them—paid for them, sir!' and I glanced at the card and saw detective thereon, but still I was not ready to believe. 'I don't care if you are a dozen detectives, you can't insult gentlemen in my shop; I'll call a policeman.'

"'Call three or four if you want to,' said the rough intruder; 'but, Dick,' and now he addressed the gentleman, 'will you go quietly with me, or will you not?'

"Judge of my amazement to hear my elegant customer exclaim; 'You've got me dead, wot's the use o' chinnin'?' and then the mask fell, and I could see what a sleek-looking, deep villain he was.

"'You see, sir,' said the rough man to me, in a tone of apology, 'this is Diamond Dick, the downiest jewel thief in the business. I know his lay, and saw him come in here, and I think you'll say it's mighty lucky I did.

What he paid you may look all right, but you'll find something crooked in it. Anyhow, he's 'wanted' for three or four other jobs in as many places.'

"To say I was astonished is to draw it very mildly. I was so dumfounded that I lost my head completely.

"'Jest let me see the cash he gave you,' said the detective, and I handed it over.

"'Jest so,' said he, again; 'I'll jest take charge of this until we get to the office, and,' putting his hand in the villain's pocket, 'I'll jest take charge of these shinersalso, then you'll know they are all safe.' And he transferred money and jewellery to his own pocket.

"My former customer was surly and had nothing to say. Of course, I had to accompany them to the police station. I bade my assistant call a carriage, and we all entered. A short drive brought us to the police station. The cells were in the basement, the office on the floor above.

"The carriage halted. Under instructions from the detective I alighted and entered the office, to wait until he locked his prisoner in a cell downstairs, prior to making a formal complaint. As I closed the door of the room I heard the carriage drive away.

"I waited five minutes, ten, fifteen, and then heartily out of patience, I abruptly made my way into the presence of the Inspector, and demanded when he was going to take the charge against Diamond Dick, and asked the whereabouts of the detective.

"The Inspector stared.

"I explained.

"The Inspector smiled.

"I became angry.

"Then he grew serious.

"'My dear sir,' said he, 'you are evidently the victim of an artfully planned robbery. The villain and detective are confederates, and your money and diamonds are, I am afraid, lost to you for ever. I am very sorry, and will help you all I can, but you see it will be a difficult job to track the thieves down. We have absolutely no clue to work upon.'

"And a difficult job it proved—too difficult, in fact, for Scotland Yard to cope with, for I never set eyes on my gems again." H. P. Leggett.

THE TRAITRESS.

By leaning out of the little balcony of my town chambers I could catch a glimpse of the street-artist who worked on the pavement below; I could see the top of his venerable, white-haired head, and occasionly had a momentary vision of two white hands outstretched in an appeal for aid from the passers-by.

These hands particularly interested me. It seemed remarkable in a man of his age and occupation that they should be so white and smooth and delicate. The fingers were long and slender, and the nails well kept and pointed. His face, too, was none the less remarkable, for beneath the rags and dirt that he affected I could see that he must once have been a handsome man. As an artist I observed this, although to a casual passer-by it would not be noticeable; an artist is one who can see beauty in everything.

In the same way I observed that the woman who lived in the great house opposite must also once have been beautiful. In spite of the paint and the veils and the ungainly clothing and her withered cheeks and sunken eyes, I could imagine her with the freshness of youth and health upon her; and she was surprisingly lovely.

When I had nothing better to do, I would sit in my window and wait until she should come out to take the air. Presently her carriage would drive up; a magnificent equipment with its silvered harness, prancing horses and liveried men. The butler would swing open the door, and my lady, passing by the bowing footmen, would come to the top of the steps. Then a strange thing would happen. She would pause for a moment and throw a glance at the figure of the street-artist across the road; she would shiver, and shrink away; then she would run hastily down the steps, and with one last look, into which was thrown a mingling of hate and loathing and fear, she would enter her carriage and drive quickly away.

On these occasions I leant over the balcony and looked at the old man below. He would be sitting forward, with his white hands held out in front of him, his head thrown back, and a fine look of triumph, scorn, and defiance in his bright eyes.

When my lady drove home again a similar scene would be enacted. As the carriage approached the house she would shrink away from the street-artist; yet her eyes would invariably be drawn towards his, and shivering, she would quickly leave the carriage and seek the safety of home.

It was an oppressive, sultry day in July, when London was broiling under the hot sun, that I first became acquainted with the street-artist. I had paused for a moment to admire a ship he had drawn, and to give him my usual donation, when I noticed he was sitting forward in a huddled position, with his head on his knees. He was evidently suffering from the heat. I asked him whether he would come up to my rooms and have something to refresh him. He refused at first, but eventually I had my way, and, collecting his things together, I took his arm and led him upstairs to my comfortable bachelor quarters.

I sat him down in my easiest chair and mixed him a reviving drink. He sipped it gratefully, and seemed happy.

After that I frequently took compassion on him, and in the end we became firm friends.

One day when he was in my room his eye fell on a little silver vase which I numbered among my treasures. I had thrown a bunch of violets into it as I came in the night before, and when he had finished examining the workmanship he sniffed the flowers eagerly.

Then he leant back in his chair and sniffed them again.

"They remind me——" He checked himself abruptly, and put the vase hastily down. "They remind me of something," he said.

"There is nothing," I remarked, "that brings back old memories so much as a scent. The whiff of certain brands of cigarettes, for instance, or the scent on a woman's handkerchief or dress, or, as in your case, of a flower. Won't you confide in me?"

I refilled his glass and he took up the vase again, sniffed the violets once more, then leant back on the cushions, and told me his story in a few tragic words.

"These were the flowers that she always wore. She was wearing them that night in the conservatory. I shall never forget it. She was lying back in a low chair by my side, with her hands hanging down, and her eyes half closed, looking languidly into mine. She allowed me to take her hands, to stroke them, and fondle them, and to whisper a hundred sweet things in her ears. I was mad. She turned me mad. I swear that she led me on, until I was mad."

The old man leant forward, and his voice was very eager.

"Then I told her of my hopes and ambitions. I was young then; only between twenty and thirty years old. But I had my dreams and ideals, and what is more I had turned them into practical form.

"When I was nineteen I had an idea. Only two living people knew how great and how mighty an idea it was; it would have revolutionised the whole world. From that moment I thought of nothing else. I spent my fortune in fulfilling it, thousands and thousands, too many to count, and on the same night that I allowed a woman to turn my brain, the time had come—my model worked.

"That night I sat alone in my workshop, and saw my hopes fulfilled. I allowed my mind to wander, and leaning back from the table, I fell asleep and dreamt a strange dream of my conquest of the world.

"Two days later she came to see me. Beautiful as she had looked that night in the conservatory, she was ten times more lovely as she stood at the door, her fingers resting on the handle, and a smile on her lips. I sprang forward to meet her, and, taking her in my arms, I kissed her. She returned my embrace.

"She said she had come to hear more of my ambitions, and to see my ideal. And I, fool that I was, innocent, trusting fool, I led her to my secret working place, and lying beneath its glass globe I showed her my model.

"Then I told her of the dream that I had had the night before, and I asked her to share my triumph. Already I had held out my arms to claim her for my own, when suddenly the love-light died out of her eyes, and stepping back she said, in cold tones that haunt me to this day: 'Perhaps you are not aware, sir, that in a week's time I marry Lord Gateacre.'

"I was numbed: I could not speak or breathe; I felt as a brute animal must feel when a slaughterer's axe finds a resting place in its brain; I believe my heart broke.

"At that moment I heard a sharp click. My eyes fell on a tiny camera that she concealed in her hand. The sound brought me to life again. She thought, no doubt, that I would be too numbed to move.

"She was about to photograph my model.

"In an instant I realised everything. My brain found the reason of it all as in a flash. She had led me on to love her, in order that, in my mad passion, she might wean from me my secret. Then she would take it to her chosen master and sell it to him.

"Now she had almost learnt it; with the photograph that she would take, she would be able to understand it. Ah, the traitress! The vile, the accursed traitress!

"I seized the delicate model in both hands, and holding it high above my head, I hurled it from me; it crashed against an iron anvil, and fell, broken into a thousand fragments at her feet.

"At the same instant the camera clicked again, but my outstretched hands was all that the photograph revealed. I have preserved them as they were then, and she dreams of them every night.

"I turned round, and I believe I should have seized her by her white throat and strangled her. But she had fled.

"A week later she was married. As she stepped proudly down from her carriage, holding the arm of her lord, she saw me, as you see me now, squatting at the side of the street, with my hands outstretched, and my eyes gleaming, and she looked on the life that she had ruined.

"She was carried into the house, senseless.

"Since that day I have sat in front of her home, and I look at her as she comes out, and I look at her as she drives away, and I look at her when she comes back. I haunt her always, she dreams of me at nights, her beauty fades, she grows old and shrunken, and she will die."

The old man leant back on the cushions, and reached out his hand for the violets.

His story had exhausted him.

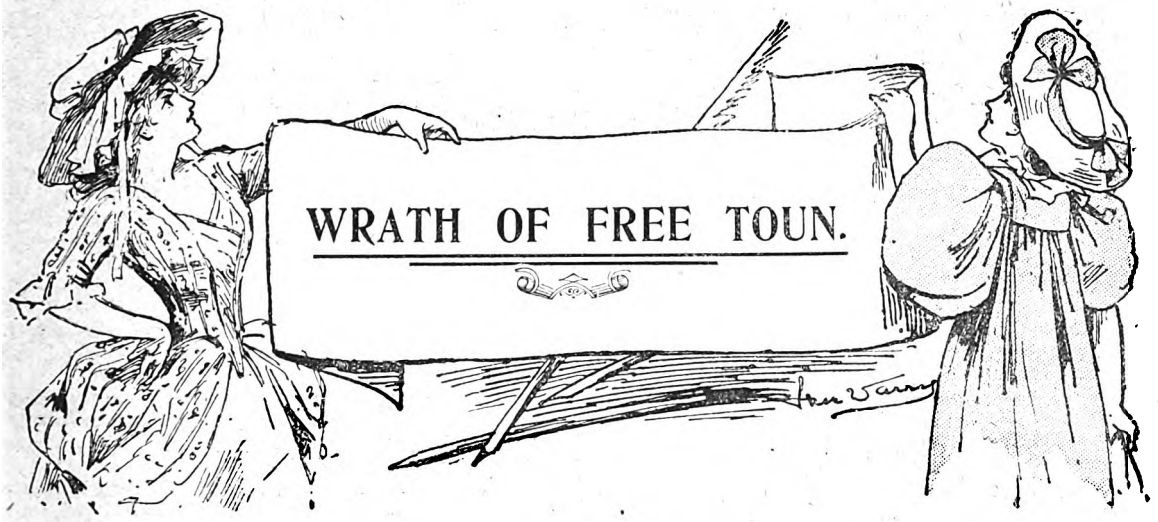
JUMBLED STORY. No. 8.]



The sentiment was a truly patriotic one.

Sedan had fallen but a few days before; and all Germans whom they had met up to the present had open eyes.

They marched away from the little valley with bands as the sun was rising gloriously and pouring his rays in the vicinity of the regimental stores.

In the hurry of departure they soon forgot a little national disgrace.

But they were not disposed to take much trouble in France.

They did not understand.

Later in the day a poor-looking woman with one child had been recently disturbed, and who was weeping excuses made by a dirty little Polish Jew.

The miserable Jew whined and wept, and protested qualifications for acting the part of judge.

It was easy enough to guess his nationality; he was a German: and it is clear that he is nothing but a German Frenchmen felt that nothing but blood could wipe out the enemy.

They had caught him red-handed, absolutely attempting to understand him.

And none thought of the woman with the ragged shawl whom they had just shot as a spy.

They were in no humour just then for sifting the Polish Jew than the German armies.

So they brought him before the general, a bluff, hard general, when they told him that his orders had been playing, colours flying, and the various other accompaniments of "glorious war."

"What were you doing there?" thundered the general. It will encourage the others."

"He was sneaking about near the bread waggons, that day, "a likely story, I must say. Where are his dirty beard, which evidently had not been trimmed for this important capture.

"Where was he found, do you say?" he asked.

He was a miserable enough looking specimen of general," was the reply of the lieutenant who had made that he was doing no harm—that he was only looking around her head, lying beside the mound where the sod proved to be.

"Sacré nom," he exclaimed, "the little fool. Why but his cries fell upon deaf ears. Mercy!—after Sedan!

It would make a beginning, as it were.

"Bread!" sneered the general, who had dined well drinking, hard-swearing soldier, with as much feeling in weeks past.

At least that is what he tried to tell them.

And it was so much easier to overcome a diminutive wife and children, I should like to know. He only speaks before a platoon, and bound his eyes.

Besides, he was easier to deal with than most of the humanity, in all conscience, small and thin, with a husband, who had left her the previous evening to try red-handed, prowling about within the French lines, for a bit of bread to bring back to his wife and childen.

The general was told about the mistake they had made.

So they took her, and showed her the newly-made Jew, and the Jews have never been a popular people in the camp, and began to make anxious inquiries about her spy. Take him away and let him be shot at daybreak.

Of course, the blood of this weedy-looking wretch could duly carried out.

The unfortunate wretch implored them for mercy; and obtain food for herself and the children.

"So perish all enemies of France!" exclaimed the grave.

They took him away, and on the following morning, his body as there is in a plank board, and about as many not be reckoned as very much; but it was something.

A likely thing, forsooth.

They threw him into a hastily made grave; and down upon the small valley, they led him forth, put him in her arms, and leading another by the hand, came into then prepared to retreat further before the advancing incident like this.

They questioned her; and after some time they found bitterly; while her two children looked on with wide that the missing husband was none other than the Jew did he not say so?"

The word was given, the rifles rang out, and the little Jew fell forward upon his face, dead.

After all, it was only the fortune of war.

A WOMAN'S TRICK.

Briefly, the situation was this: Lord Douglas had declined to give the appointment of Minister of Pepotoi to his old college friend, Deane; he had, in fact, intimated in his formal letter, that he had selected Diggles for the post.

Now Diggles, as all the world knew, was brother-in-law to Mrs. Montague; but whether this had anything to do with the matter it was not known. People said it had.

For they had noticed that his lordship made himself very pleasant to that lively and vivacious widow.

And it was known that she was for ever in dearth of flowers and jewels. Certain it was that she was now kept very well supplied with them.

Perhaps, for this reason, she cultivated Lord Douglas, in spite of the fact that with every package he inclosed something less acceptable (and less substantial) than the offering.

It should be mentioned, moreover, that Lord Douglas, in a moment of pressing need, had tied himself down for life to a very ineligible personage.

He himself bore his years well, and looked, especially in his long frock coat, every inch the Cabinet Minister that he was. With his wife, however, it was different. She seemed to grow stouter and shorter and redder as every year advanced. Finally, he was compelled to leave her down in the country, through fear that she should be mistaken for his housekeeper, whenever he was in town.

To make the situation clear, it should be added also that his lordship lived in mortal dread lest it should reach his wife's ears that anything beyond the strictest line of acquaintanceship passed between Mrs. Montague and himself.

Mr. Deane, the disappointed aspirant to the Ministership of Pepotoi, had long lived in hopes of obtaining this post.

It meant a good deal more to him than people supposed.

He was a hard-working, capable man, if not particularly brilliant, and he had every right to expect that it should have been his. It was clear to see that Diggles had obtained it merely on account of the fact that he was brother-in-law to Mrs. Montague.

The blow had fallen on Deane and his pretty little wife as they were taking their first sip of coffee one morning at breakfast. His face fell as he read the letter, and, with a mumbled apology, he gathered his other papers together and hastily left the room.

His wife looked wistfully after him, and then at his uneaten breakfast. She read the letter through, and her mouth took a determined expression.

That afternoon Mrs. Deane dropped in at the well known jewellers of Bond Street, Messrs. Brightstone and Rubett. As an esteemed customer she was privileged to wander about the shop at will until she should chance on a suitable trinket for a wedding present.

It happened that her search led her to a counter where two immense bronzes had been placed for the time. Although engrossed in the tray of knick-knacks which the assistant was displaying, she noticed, herself unseen, the glass doors swing open, and a tall, commanding-looking man enter.

"Is that pearl necklace ready yet?" he demanded.

Messrs. Brightstone and Rubett bowed low to the counter. They were very sorry, but it had not arrived; it would come in a couple of hours.

Could they send it off for his lordship? It would go by the five-o'clock post without fail. Would his lordship be good enough to give the address?

"203, Craven Road, Park Lane," replied his lordship in a loud voice, and strode angrily from the shop.

Mrs. Deane's heart stopped beating. She felt as though she would like to shriek. Here was an opportunity dropped right at her feet. She had only to stretch out her hand and take it, and she would win her game. She had thought all the morning of some means by which she might work the combination of Lord Douglas and his jealous wife, and Lord Douglas and pretty Mrs. Montague, and here was the solution.

"Have you any pearl necklaces?" she asked.

Messrs. Brightstone and Rubett had a few in stock, but, unfortunately, all of an inferior quality. Madame might have one at a bargain.

"Lord Douglas has just ordered a similar one to this," the firm continued, holding up for inspection a necklace of unique form.

Mrs Deane concluded the bargain, and drove away with the purchase.

She wondered, as she went home, if it was very wicked, this plot that she had devised. It was a chance, however, of ousting Diggles, and not to be missed.

At his office next morning the first thing Lord Douglas did was to write to Diggles, informing him of his appointment as Minister of Pepotoi. Then he looked at his letters. Among others was one which made him turn very pale when he had read it. He studied it again, and grew still paler.

It was written in a feminine hand, and ran as follows:

"Dear Lord Douglas,—I am in terrible perplexity: Two roads lie before me, and I do not know which to take. I ought, I feel, to let your dear wife know everything I have learnt. But on second thoughts I determined to send the parcel which I received by mistake this morning from Messrs. Brightstone and Rubett direct to you, and hear what you said. Yesterday I ordered a pearl necklace, and this morning I received one, but a different one, and one of superior quality. On a card inside was written: 'To Mrs. Montague, 203, Craven Road, Park Lane,' and below: 'With Lord Douglas' compliments.' I still keep the necklace, and await your reply as to what I shall do with it.—Yours sincerely, Mary Deane.

"P.S.—Your letter was such a disappointment. Will you not reconsider your decision?—M. D.

"P.S.S.—I still feel that I ought to write to your wife.—M. D."

Lord Douglas read this letter through three times; then he bit his lip hard, and his voice was very shaky, as, turning to his secretary, he said: "Have you posted that letter to Diggles yet?"

No, my lord," the man replied; "I was about to address the envelope."

"Then you may leave it," said Lord Douglas. "I have decided, after all, to give the position to Deane."

And Mrs. Deane chuckled to herself when the next post came in.

SUMMARY.

The story opens with an interview between Lady Braetonn and her son Roderick, in which she endeavours to induce him to give up "Baby" Lee, a chorus girl, and marry Olive, Isaac Emsworth's heiress. Emsworth takes Olive to consult Dr. Murray, who advises a voyage to South Africa in the Greyberg, in which he also is going. Roderick, who is friendly with Murray, comes for advice on the terribly bad condition of his health, and the Doctor recommends a trip in the same boat. "Baby" Lee, on being discarded, seeks means of revenging herself on Olive.

CHAPTER X.

A Blackguardly Compact.

Cyrus Daines had just seated himself at the table to enjoy his breakfast, armed with the last new review and a paper-knife looking like an ivory scimitar, carved as it was out of a huge walrus tusk. The room was the very perfection of a dwelling-place for a bachelor of literary taste, for it was lined as far as it was possible with well-crammed bookcases, and where it was not possible for a bookcase to stand, pictures, old china, curious weapons, and bits of bric-à-brac that were quaint and pleasing to the eye, and for the most part Japanese, filled up the gaps.

The place did not betoken wealth in its owner, but a tendency to comfort, and the situation was good, being a front room on the first floor in Jermyn Street, a heavily draped archway indicating — correctly — that there was a bedchamber behind.

The occupant, who laid down review and paper-knife beside his plate and coffee-cup, and took up a flower vase to sniff at some choice roses which decorated the attractive breakfast table, was a keen-eyed, fair, young-looking man of thirty, large of forehead — white as a woman's — and showing the net-work of blue veins in his temples; small of the lower portion of his face, his chin being made to look more pointed by a sharply trimmed beard of the smallest dimensions, and still more sharp by making the most of a tiny moustache with wax. Good-looking, but not attractive; for, to continue, everything was too sharp; his dark grey eyes were piercing, and his slightly aquiline nose, though beautifully and classically shaped, looked as if the skin had been too tightly drawn over the bone, while his white teeth seemed the sharpest of all. The very aspect of the man indicated that his tongue would be a keenly pointed weapon, kept well on edge for the benefit of his friends and discomfiture of his enemies, of which such a man would be sure to have many.

He was most carefully dressed, with the exception of the dressing-gown he wore, which was old and worn and emitted a peculiarly strong odour of choice tobacco, the means for smoking which were visible in various shapes about the room, and the scent of the roses having possibly suggested another kind of incense or fragrance, he pushed back his chair, and rose to cross to the mantel-piece, walking with a slight limp, and showing a peculiar attenuation of figure.

Invalid, who makes a brave effort to fight his weakness, you involuntarily said, weak from accident of birth, not from dissipation.

He took a cigarette from a box, lit it, and went back to the table and picked up the morning's paper, glanced at the Summary, and then turning to the sporting news, ran his eye down, pitched the paper aside and touched a table gong, which emitted a keenly piercing, silveryring.

"Poor old Rod!" he said, with a contemptuous laugh, as he examined his long, thin, white hands, turned his signet ring a little round, drew down his cuffs, and subsided into his chair. "Gone again. Well, he must have got well through all he has, and now starts with a fresh fortune—if they'll let him. Not bad taste."

The man . . . went on arranging the bright breakfast service.

Just then the door opened, and a man-servant in neat striped jacket entered with a tray containing coffee-pot, toast-rack, hot roll, and something savoury of odour in a covered dish.

"No letters, Joe?"

"No, sir; nothing but the paper this morning. Lord Braetoun's horse nowhere yesterday, sir; forgot to tell you when you came home last night."

"Which means, you stupid idiot, that you had something on the race. And I told you not."

The man coughed slightly, and went on arranging the bright breakfast service.

"How much did you lose?" continued his master, taking up the great paper-knife and holding it as if about to decapitate the disobedient slave.

"Nothing, sir. Won."

"How was that?"

"Well, sir," said the man deprecatingly, "when you pick up a few tips, and know as a gent always has the luck against him, why, if you bet at all, you don't back."

"So I pay you good wages and find you a very comfortable, easy place, so that you may take advantage of the knowledge you gain of my friends to help to fleece them."

"Beg pardon, sir," said the man in an aggrieved tone, "I didn't win it of his lordship."

"That will do," said the master sharply, and the man left the room.

"Somebody else has, though, I'll be bound. Eh? What do you want?"

"Beg pardon, sir: his lordship."

There was a quick step on the landing, and Braetoun, looking haggard and careworn, strode in, giving his hat and cane to the man, before throwing himself into an easy chair.

"Morning!—Another cup and plate, Joe.—What'll you have?"

"Nothing," said the visitor sourly.

"Yes, you will.—Devilled kidneys and some tea—quick as you can."

The man glided out of the room, and the owner of the rooms began to pour himself out some coffee.

"Call him back, Cy. I want some brandy and soda."

"I suppose so; and you'll have tea. You did look decent day before yesterday. Seem to have had a wet night. What a fool you are, Rod."

"Tell me something I don't know, will you?" said the visitor bitterly.

"You don't know that yet. Here, you were regularly pulled round by that sea trip, and old Murray together, dropped in for a magnificent piece of luck, all going well, and you must begin the old game again. How long will it take you to learn that you must lose over horses in the long run, and that when you do, brandy won't bring the money back?"

"There, don't you turn against me, Cy. I came for comfort, not abuse."

"Come to the wrong shop then. I can't comfort. I can show you your faults."

"I don't want showing them; they're always dancing before me like so many devils."

"Had more brandy than I thought for last night. Better go and see Murray or you'll be having a mad fit again."

"Curse Murray!"

"That's right. Always curse those who do you good. Have a turn at me too. Go on. It will not spoil my breakfast."

"Do, for Heaven's sake, keep that vitriol tongue of yours quiet for a few minutes. Can't you see I'm in trouble?"

"Plain enough; but 'vitriol tongue' is good, though rather strong. But if you will risk money on races what is the good of ruining your health—I mean the apology for it you've got left—by flying to the brandy because you lose?"

Braetoun made an angry gesticulation, and shifted his position on the chair, started up, and crossed to a side table on which stood a water-cooler, poured himself out a glass and tossed it off.

"Hot coppers, eh? Can't recommend that water, old fellow; better have waited for the tea. I can back that."

"Cy, old man, I'm in a devil of a mess," cried the visitor throwing himself again in the chair.

"My dear Rod, you've been in a devil of a mess ever since we were at Eton. It is your nature to."

"And I want you to help me."

"Old story, and you know as well as I do that I can't. If I did play the gallantly heroic faithful friend, and raised money on all I've got, and backed your bills, it would only be trying to make one drop fill the Trafalgar Square fountains."

"Who said a word about money?" cried Braetoun savagely.

"You didn't mention it," said the other, eating away calmly, "but your words chinked like coin and rustled like paper. Want words then?"

"Yes; help and advice."

"Acts, deeds, and exploits, eh? Well, fire away."

"You are so clever."

"Excuse my rising to return thanks."

"You've got a way of getting over people with that tongue of yours."

"False, base flattery. Didn't I try to get that old scoundrel of a money-lender to renew your bills, and failed dismally?"

"Oh, that's nothing; money-lenders have no hearts, but ——send that fellow away as soon as you can."

For the man had entered with a fresh breakfast-tray, and proceeded to arrange the things in front of Braetoun very slowly and with great care, as if from sympathy with the loser of a race by which he had benefited.

"That will do, Joe," said his master, and the man left the room, feeling as if he would like to stay.

"Now then," said Daines sharply, "what do you want me to do?"

"Well, look here. You know I ran my colt at Highdown yesterday?"

"And lost. I know."

Braetoun winced a little, but went on:

"The Emsworths were down there."

"To see you lose. Look here, you want help. Take my advice: don't let the old man see any more of your losing games, or he'll be crying off with the match."

"There'll be no need; I'm going to drop all that now."

"He knew you lost?"

"Yes; but that wasn't the worst of it. They had taken down lunch, and the mater was with them."

"Yes; she is playing her cards very nicely for you, my son."

"Don't be a fool," said Braetoun angrily.—"We were in the midst of lunch and wine when someone came."

"The murdered Banquo to the feast?"

"Someone as bad. She came up towards the carriage."

"Which she?" said Daines caustically.

"If you are going to keep on fooling I must go," said Braetoun angrily. "You know whom I mean."

"I'm mum. Go on: I suppose you mean Baby Lee."

"Yes: came on purpose to make a scene. I could read it in her eyes; she was going to make a furious attack upon Miss Emsworth, when she had a sort of hysterical fit, and had to be carried off the ground. Fortunately Murray was with us, and he helped to get her away."

"Did he know who she was?"

"He seemed to guess from her words."

"And did Miss Emsworth, and your mother?"

"No, they didn't quite understand it. She hadn't time to speak. Passion, I suppose, but she was quite overcome. They fancied she had been betting on my colt, lost, and was savage with me."

"Then it turned out all right for you, and there's no need for help."

"But there is. I tremble for the future."

"Bah! Part from her civilly. Tell her the comedy's at an end, and you're going in for tragedy."

"I'm afraid it's tragedy now, and she'll stop the comedy to come."

"Oh, rubbish! Behave well to her; she seems a nice little woman."

"I did all I could; gave her the house, furniture, and carriage, and a heavy cheque."

"That ought to satisfy her."

"But it doesn't. She has returned everything—presents and money, and letters."

"Give her some diamonds then."

"Where am I to get diamonds? I'm regularly stumped."

"Pooh! Not you. As soon as they know in Bond Street that you're to marry a wealthy heiress, you may order all the diamonds you like."

"She wouldn't take them, Cy. You don't know what a temper she has—I do."

"Strikes me, Rod, old fellow, that after all she must really care for you."

"I'm afraid she does," said Braetoun gloomily.

"Poor fellow; how horrible! Why, what a little fool the woman must be. It's ridiculous. But what can I do for you?"

"Help me, man; I daren't go to her now. I'm an engaged man, and I live in constant dread that she will call on the Emsworths and make a horrible scene."

"Yes: that would be awkward. The father would be furious, and the lady—nice, sweet innocent little body, by-the-way—would throw you over as sure as a gun."

"That she would," said Braetoun.

"Thinks you're a preux chevalier, and that sort of thing. Well, Roddy, old man, it strikes me that you're in what our friends across the water would call a pretty considerable muss."

"Well, I don't come here to be told that."

"S'pose not. Why did you come?"

"To see if you would help."

"Strange thing how my old school-fellows do come to me for help, especially if there's a lady in the case. Safe sort of card to play, I suppose. Little weakly cripple, and to be trusted."

"Of course, you always were a good clever fellow, Cy, and ready to help a lame dog over a style."

"Similia similibus curantur; lame dog to help another lame dog, eh?"

"That's it. Now then, set your wits to work. The mater's dead upon my marrying little Emsworth."

"Well, it would be the making of you. I suppose you could keep the old man out of sight."

"Oh, yes; I don't suppose we should be bothered much about him after we were married."

"Very warm, Rod?"

"I suppose so, but its rather a come down for a Braetoun to marry the daughter of such a man."

"Yes, it is, but money's money, my lad, and the lady is very presentable."

"Yes, she is rather nice."

"Wouldn't be if she knew all."

"There, that'll do. Now come, don't beat about the bush, say something, don't keep on eating."

"Give me time, old man, I ruminate like an ox when I eat, I'm thinking away all the time. It's a knotty point. You see, it's a grand thing, I should say, speaking as a slack-baked waster from old Mother Nature's pottery, upon whom the fair sex has never cast the amatory eye—a splendid thing for a man to have the chance of marrying a woman who really cares for him."

"And has an enormous fortune."

"Ye—es," said Daines, pushing away his plate and putting some more sugar into his coffee, to sit stirring it round and round; "but have some more tea."

"Oh, confound your tea! Talk—talk—talk! This worry tells upon me. I'm as seedy to-day as can be."

"A grand thing to be able to marry a woman who really worships you and thinks you perfect."

"Well, that's how a woman ought to feel about the man she marries," said Braetoun coolly.

"But, from what I've seen of life, not one woman in a score does. Soon gets to know too much of a man's seamy side, I suppose."

"Look here, Cy; you're getting into one of your confoundedly talky-talky moods, when you grow more cynical and say nastier and more spiteful things every minute. I've come for a sensible, matter-of-fact way out of this difficulty. Where are your cigarettes?"

"Old spot, dear boy; help yourself."

Braetoun took and lit one, to begin smoking fitfully.

"Now, then," he said; "come back to the subject. What would you do if you were me?"

"Do? Well, if I found out that a woman really worshipped me, and had proved her love, I should say to myself: 'That girl is as near perfection as mundane angels can be,' and I should consider that her genuine love covered everything. I should marry her as soon as I could."

"Well, of course, it's all so new. I haven't found out all that yet, but it's going on all right. I'm the better for my trip. The old man's willing, and I shall marry her as soon as I can."

"I was talking about the other one," said Daines quietly.

"What," roared Braetoun, dashing down his cigarette; "marry a ballet girl! I?"

"Man raises the woman he marries to his own station, dear boy."

"Cy, you're a fool."

"Can't help it. Nature made me the fool and cripple you see, and foolish parents insisted upon cheating the undertaker by rearing me."

"Marry Baby Lee, of the Theatre Royal, Thespis, when I I'm almost without a shilling!"

"If the girl loves you as you say, you'll be a rich man, Roddy."

"You idiot! If you weren't such a wretched little cripple I'd shake you till you couldn't speak. Confound your sharp-edged tongue! You said all that to get a rise out of me, just when I'm in the greatest hobble I was ever forked into in my life."

There was a little reddening of Daines' thin, white cheeks, but he went on unmoved.

"Best advice I can give you for both your sakes, and for that of the lady heiress as well. Rather hard on her, dear boy."

"Ha, ha! Here's little Diogenes Daines turning moralist. Look here: you'd better marry the girl yourself."

"The heiress?"

"You!" cried Braetoun, with a look of contempt which slightly deepened the colour in his friend's cheek. "Bah! —Baby. Now, that would be a way out of the difficulty."

"Perhaps she wouldn't have such an idiotic little cripple, Rod."

"I don't know. You've got what Paddy calls a soothering tongue of your own when you like to make it so. I believe you could humbug any woman into thinking you cared for her. Why, Cy, old man, she'd be the very thing for you. Damme, I'd give you five thou. if you'd marry her—I'd give you ten."

"Out of your wife's money?"

"Never you mind where the money came from," said Braetoun sourly. "I'd give it to put an end to the difficulty."

"And a very nice generous, manly offer," said Daines, lighting a cigarette.

Braetoun winced and stared hard at the speaker, who went on lighting his cigarette without moving a muscle of his face.

"Look here," he cried, "did you mean that sarcastically?"

"Sarcastic! When you offer me a chance to put ten thousand in my pocket and a pretty little wife on my arm? Hardly such an idiot as that. Well, I'll see the little girl for you and have a talk with her. I may, perhaps, bring her to reason without inflicting a miserable cripple upon her as a husband. Is she still at Brompton?"

"Don't I tell you she's thrown up everything? No: she's with an old aunt in Great Russell Street. Mrs. Duncan, the costumier."

"Been there and tried to bring her to reason?"

"Yes: twice," said Braetoun sulkily.

"Well?"

"The old cat of an aunt flew at me and told me I ought to be ashamed of myself. Curse her!"

"How people do object to being told home truths," said Daines quietly. "And you told her you were not a bit ashamed, eh?"

"Wrong. I told her I was deucedly ashamed to be seen coming to her old rag shop, and that she and her niece ought to have been thoroughly grateful for what I had done, and then I came away."

"Without seeing the little girl?"

"Of course. I didn't want to see her again."

"Go back, old man, and see them both. Make them the offer once more of what they threw up in a pet. Perhaps they'll both have calmed down now."

"No, I can't stoop to do it again. But I'll hold to my bargain. I can't talk to either of them without flying in a passion. Since my illness I'm easily put out. You could go in that calm, cool, dispassionate way of yours and talk them round. Will you go? I give you carte blanche to settle the matter for me."

"Rather hard, too, upon me, to send me into the siren's cave. Suppose she really does capture me?"

"Don't be a fool. Will you go for me?"

"Oh, yes, I'll go."

"Cy, old man, you're a trump."

"I am, Rod. But let me see. Theatrical lady. Must introduce myself as a general utility man. Make the best terms for you I can?"

"Make any terms. You see what is at stake. Marry her if you like, and I'll hold to my bargain. The little fool, going on like this! Whatever did she expect?"

"Ah, to be sure, whatever did she expect? They are such fools, these women. They've no brains whatever, only vain little heads stuffed full of a soft kind of pith, which they call faith."

"There, there, there: don't preach, man. You'll do the best you can for me?"

"Of course, I will. And so you'd wish me to marry her?"

"If you liked. She really is a good little thing. But are you in earnest? 'Pon my soul, I never know when you are chaffing and when you are not."

"Wonder if you did," said Daines, looking at him with a peculiar, dry expression of countenance. "Really, old man, I hardly know myself. But, I say, this is serious. Are you going honestly to cut all the past when you marry this Miss Emsworth?"

"I am, on my soul."

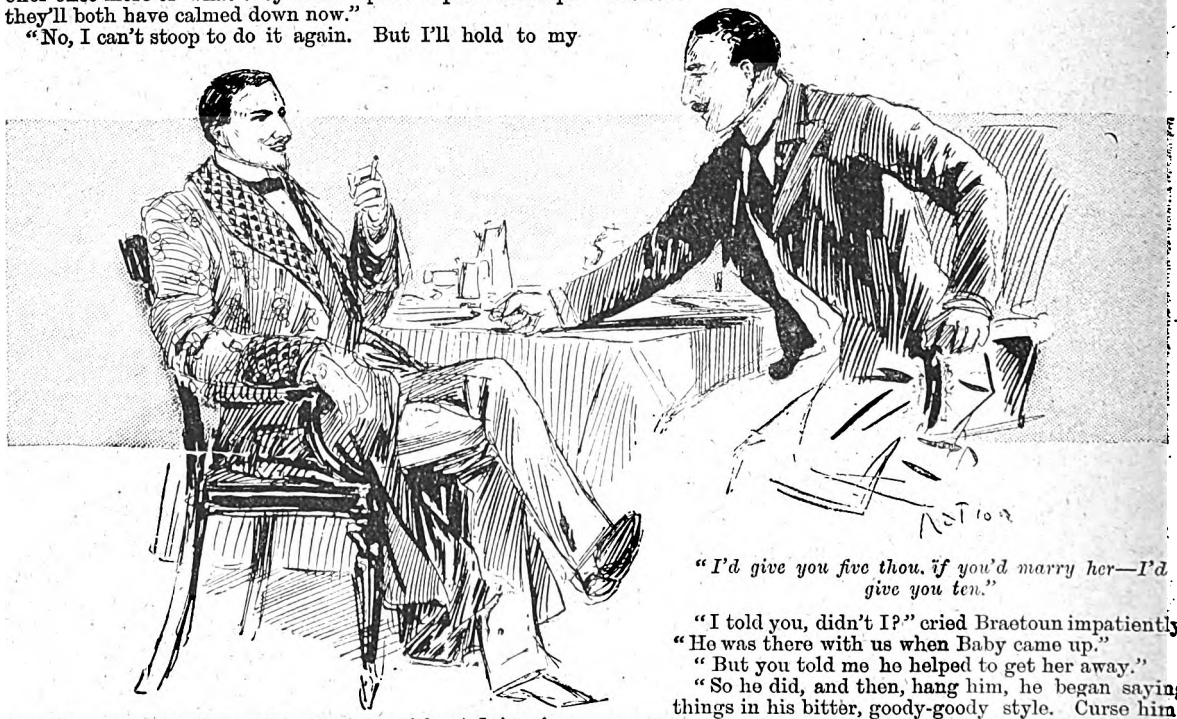
"Then, first of all go and see old Murray again. You don't look quite up to the mark."

"Oh, I'm all right; only a bit ruffled over this affair."

"More than ruffled. Rod, you look ill. Go and see him."

"Can't. We're a bit out."

"You can't afford to be out with Murray. What's the matter?"



"I'd give you five thou. if you'd marry her—I'd give you ten."

"I told you, didn't I?" cried Braetoun impatiently. "He was there with us when Baby came up."

"But you told me he helped to get her away."

"So he did, and then, hang him, he began saying things in his bitter, goody-goody style. Curse him! I can't stand it from him. I'm beginning to hate him."

"What did he say?"

"Never mind. Enough to make me feel as if I could shoot him."

"Don't. It would be like committing suicide."

"Why?"

"He told me he was the only man in London who understood your constitution. You've got very shaky, Rod, so take care, and don't kick away the prop that can hold you up."

"He's an offensive prig, with his assumption of what he calls honour and straightforward dealing. I used to like him, but of late——"

"It's grown more t'other, eh?—Going? Well, take care of yourself, while I take care of myself. Ta-ta."

Braetoun nodded and went out of the room, leaving Daines to sit back smoking another cigarette very slowly.

"Why am I going to do all this?" he mused. "I shall be acting like a scoundrel to help a scoundrel, and because we have always been so-called friends.—I'll put on my coat and go at once," he muttered. "Poor little Baby, there was always something about her that I liked. Only to think of the little hussy turning out so brave and true."

CHAPTER XI.

A Fish out of Water.

For the tench is said to be the physician among the fish.

It was the first night at the Thespis. The new burlesque was to be produced, with Edwards, of the quaint voice and figure; Lesser, of the dry method and twinkling feet; Ella Weller, who could look fascinatingly pretty, sing, dance, and act as well, for the first lady; and a host of other talent, as it was termed by the lessee—the said talent consisting in the possession of pretty faces, graceful forms, and the ability to act like an artist's lay figure. But with a good orchestra, whose leader had hashed up all the popular songs with sauce piquante, pretty scenery, and limelights at every wing, there was enough to attract one of London Society's many circles, and every seat was engaged.

The first-nighters were there in full force, and among them a few who were not first-nighters, unless at the theatres where good comedies were produced, and among these last was Allan Murray, who went, he told his friends, for a little diversion after a great deal of hard work.

There are serious diversions as well as light, and as to himself Allan Murray's diversion was to sit on the prompt side of the theatre, where he could see Lord Braetoun's private box, one of the best in the house—consequent, this, upon the fact that he had been long intimate with the lessee, and had possessed the right to go behind the scenes when the popular favourite, Baby Lee, was the great attraction.

Cyrus Daines, too, had left his blue china and bric-à-brac, to appear in faultless evening dress in a stall nearly in the centre of the same row as that in which Murray was seated.

The house filled rapidly, and Murray shook hands with his old college friend, Daines, and fully expected to be bantered in that worthy's most sarcastic manner for coming to a burlesque. But the thin dapper little fellow was particularly quiet, and went on almost directly to his place; and Murray noticed that he kept on glancing from time to time at the empty box on the grand tier—the second from the stage on the off prompt side.

In a few minutes Braetoun entered with his young wife, and as she settled herself in her seat, charming in her full flush of girlish beauty, glittering with diamonds, and carrying an enormous bouquet of lilies and roses, he stood back a little, looking pale and blasé, and gazing nonchalantly about the house, as he divested himself of his heavy fur-trimmed overcoat, nodding once or twice to friends in the stalls.

Quite a battery of opera-glasses was directed at once upon this box, and Murray, as he stood up, could hear scraps of conversation about its occupant—"Lady Braetoun"—"just married"—"millionaire's daughter"—"lucky fellow, Braetoun"—"charming"—"too much of the country lass," etc., etc.

But the opera glasses were passed unnoticed by Olive, to whom the scene was enjoyable to a degree. She had come at her husband's suggestion to see the new burlesque, and her eyes wandered here and there, till she caught sight of Cyrus Daines, who bowed to her, and she returned the salute at once. The next moment she had seen the tall dark figure of Murray, and she bent forward with her face lit up with smiles to give him a pleasant nod, turning directly after to call her husband's attention to these friends, with the result that Braetoun scowled.

"What the deuce brings him here?" he said to himself. "Come to stare at us, I suppose." The next minute he had taken his seat, stretched out his hand for the opera-glass he had placed upon the quilted cushion before him, and was focussing it for a sweep round the house, when Murray saw him put it down again quickly and begin talking to his wife.

This was simultaneous with a rustling in the box overhead, into which someone had just been ushered, but who it was the doctor could not have seen had he wished. He was conscious, however, of a curtain being slightly drawn by a delicately gloved little hand, then a great bouquet of yellow roses was laid upon the cushion, and the battery of opera-glasses was directed now in this direction.

A few minutes later Allan saw Daines bow to the fresh-comer, and the bouquet, whose flowers protruded over the quilted satin, was slightly agitated, and he noticed that smiles were exchanged, and men leant forward and whispered one to the other.

"Who is that charmingly dressed little woman in the box opposite to ours?" said Olive.

"Eh? Opposite to ours?"

"Yes; she is wearing black gloves, and is using her ivory opera-glass. I think she is looking across at us."

"Looking across at us?" said Braetoun, with a slight change in his voice. "Oh, yes, I see the one you mean—in mock pearls and the white ostrich-feather edging to her dress. H'm, some actress, I suppose."

Then Braetoun said something unpleasant respecting the lady's future—to himself—and a petillation of clapping ran through the house as the conductor entered, took his place, bowed, and turned back to business.

For almost directly after, the house lit up, the bâton was waved in the air, descended, and there was a musical crash, the bright, merry music rippled though the house, and for the next hour Olive sat light-hearted, and almost child-like,

Her eyes wandered here and there.

"Don't think much of her, but her diamonds are lovely."

giving herself up to the full enjoyment of a scene that was perfectly new to her. Her attention was on the stage all through, and she saw nothing of the pair of bright eyes that hardly left her and her husband. It was nothing to her that they formed the subject of a good deal of conversation among habitués of the theatre, and that remarks flew fast at the wings whenever the various members of the company were off the stage.

For the times when Baby Lee was the great attraction at the Thespis were canvassed freely, and ladies who had been jealous of her success were not above meaningly alluding to the way in which some people came down in the world.

"My word!" said one sweet gushing creature, who generally occupied the front end of a line in the chorus when a stage picture was formed, "don't she look pleasant? She's been watching Lord Braetoun most ever since the curtain first went up; and when she hasn't been watching him she's been looking spiteful at his new wife. Don't think much of her, but her diamonds are lovely."

Allan Murray saw but little of the burlesque, heard scarcely anything of the music. He could not gaze at Braetoun's box, but he mentally saw its occupant all the time, and mingled with his depression there was a feeling of satisfaction, purely unselfish, for whenever he had glanced at Olive it was to see that she looked animated and happy, and kept turning to her husband to call his attention to something passing on the stage, while he sat blasé and discontented, longing for some excuse to get her away, but finding none.

The drop scene fell at the end of the first act, and there was the customary exodus from the stalls, whose occupants sought the buffet, corridors, and the boxes of friends, or changed places so as to engage in conversation, or discuss the qualities of the new piece.

It was in this change that Cyrus Daines came along the row of stalls to pass Murray, who fully expected to hear him say: "Come out for a cigarette?" But Daines merely nodded, and said something hurriedly about the way being so narrow.

"One moment," said Murray, as Daines passed him. "Who is in this box overhead?"

Daines looked at him curiously.

"Don't you know?" he replied in a low tone.

"How should I? I can't see from here."

"Braetoun's little girl—Baby Lee."

Daines passed on, and Murray sat back in his stall, with a choking sensation at his throat, and then glanced up at Braetoun's box, to see that its owner had left his seat, and that Olive was looking straight through her glass at the box opposite to her; but the next moment she had lowered it and was gazing straight at him.

As soon as Olive saw that Murray was looking at her, she put down her glass and greeted him with a smile, which he read aright, as it seemed to him that she was saying:

"Everybody is visiting friends; why don't you come and see me?"

He could not resist the desire to go round, and he left his seat to pass through the little crowd in the entries, and at last reached Braetoun's box, feeling glad that he had not encountered his patient on the way. For a hot feeling of anger was rising in his breast, with a very strong suspicion that he knew where Braetoun would be. And if, face to face there, Olive should see her husband in company with this woman, and ask him who she was—with that sweet ingenuous look in her eyes, what was he to say?

"So base—so cruel!" he thought. "I dare not go."

For a few moments he paused, hesitating. Then, as if attracted by a power he could not master, he turned the handle of the door and went in.

"Yours faithfully, J. R. CANHAM."

Illustrated Family Novelist, November 30th, 1895, says: "A great many women who are plump by nature worry about their stoutness. However, there are some perfectly safe remedies for embonpoint, among them being the Trilene Tablets, which are not only safe, but absolutely beneficial to the general health, and speedily produce the desired effect."

"1, Letterstone Road, Fulham, S.W.
"SIRS,—I found myself decreased and better for your treatment, and can get about more freely.
"Yours sincerely, F. E. GODDEN."

"6, Brighton Terrace, Hull.
"MRS. JOHNSON has much pleasure in saying she has derived great benefit from your Tablets."

"3, Castle Road, Deal.
"MRS. J. PEARSON is glad to say she is much thinner."

Convalescent Home, New Brighton, Cheshire.
MISS S. J. PRITCHARD says: "They have done me good. I am 21lb. lighter already."

"Bretton West, near Wakefield.
"MISS L. LANGFIELD has taken a box of Tablets, and is already 7lb. lighter."

"Claremont House, Shrewsbury.
"DEAR SIRS,—I have nearly finished your Tablets, and cannot speak too highly of them. They do me good in many ways, being a valuable tonic and bracer up of the nervous system, and, being of a gouty tendency, they have also done me good in that way. I am very much thinner.
"Yours truly (MRS.) K. M. ANNAND."

25, Windsor Terrace, Penarth, Cardiff.
MISS M. FLAVELL says: "I have lost 2 stone, and am much better in health."

Extract from Bury and Suffolk Times, June 15th, 1894: "Miss Atherton sings and dances as piquantly as ever, and is a marvel of agility, considering how much flesh she has put on of late. Her friends should induce her to take a course of Trilene Tablets, about which I hear wonderful things. One portly acquaintance of my own by merely a few weeks' use of these little Tablets, has reduced his bulk perceptibly. I am assured the Tablets are harmless and tasteless, and that the Trilene Company in Finsbury Pavement, London, are doing an enormous and ever-increasing trade."

486, Market Street, Whitworth, near Rochdale.
MISS GRINDROD writes: "Have had one 2s. 6d. box of Trilene Tablets, and am 5lb. lighter."

2, Chariot Street, Hull.
MR. JUBB, Chemist, says: "My customers speak highly of your Tablets."

Windsor Hotel, Merthyr Vale, South Wales.
MR. J. THOMAS writes: "When I started the Tablets I weighed 17½ stone, and have got down to 14st. 9lb."

West Cornforth, Ferryhill.
MR. WM. USHER says: "A sister of mine, who was 17 stone, was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 15 stone."

Aspern, 29, King's Hall Road, Beckenham.
MISS S. WOODHOUSE writes: "I have much pleasure in stating that your Tablets are really a safe cure for stoutness; they have cured me, and I am a perfect figure now."

MRS. GIBBON, of Radford Cottage, Bitterne, says: "I have derived great benefit from your Tablets, especially abdominal."

131, Victoria Street, London, S.W.
MRS. ARTHUR WEGUELIN (the "Society" celebrity) writes: "By simply taking the Trilene regularly, and without change of diet, I have lost 1st. 4lb. in four weeks."

SHORT STORIES.

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 400.] For the Week ending August 29th, 1896. [ONE PENNY.

"DID I see any fighting in Venezuela?" responded my brother, who had just returned from there, and about whose safety we had been very anxious during the last periodical revolution in that country of political unrest.

"Well, of a sort I saw plenty. It was fighting, but not war, as you would construe the term in the 42nd. If I could have had a handful of your men with me, I'd have made some of those cowardly Venezuelans sit up."

I looked at his strong, upright form, broad-shouldered and muscular, with a sigh of regret. He would have been as fine a soldier as any in the British Army. His whole heart and soul were in soldiering, not for the amusements attached to the life, but purely from the love of it, as a profession.

Unfortunately, however, at the time when he had to pass his competitive examination he failed in some subjects which I must own seemed very immaterial to the making of a good officer.

I, who am far less fitted than he, obtained my commission through a better knowledge of the art of spelling, and being more closely acquainted with the historical phases through which my country had passed in years gone by.

My brother being rejected as a servant in arms of the Queen, followed the example of many others, and travelled.

All rights reserved.]

America, both North and South, had the greatest fascination for him, and he happened to be up the country when one of the so-called revolutions broke out.

"Tell me about it," I said, as we settled down to a smoke over the fire after dinner.

He watched the feathery blue rings rise in the air and vanish, placed his feet on the fender, and looked steadfastly into the crimson glow.

I fancied from his expression he was recalling something unpleasant. I waited in silence for him to begin.

"I had been travelling, as you know," he said at last, "through many of the South American States, and had a very good knowledge of Spanish. I met with a fair number of adventures, but not until I reached one of the small towns in the interior of Venezuela did I take up arms. While staying there I came across some English miners, a class you find all over the world. There was plenty of good sport, and I got to know some of the most influential inhabitants. They are supposed to hate the English, which they do collectively, but their appreciation of the race is shown by their anxiety to get them to join any one party in a scrimmage with another.

"They know an Englishman can be relied upon, whereas their own leaders cannot, though at times they will fight like demons. The people of the district were suspected, and rightly, of organising a rising against the government. So the latter thought it best to take the job off their hands, and send a force to quell the idea. On hearing this, a call to arms was made, and to my surprise a deputation waited upon me to request me to lend my services, and take a prominent position in the little army."

"That just suited you!" I exclaimed.

"Yes. The opportunity of getting some experience of real fighting was too much for me, and I consented!

"It didn't run to uniforms, but otherwise the equipment of our force was good.

"Drilling commenced, and in a few days we were able to move our body of men about in quite a respectable fashion. Intelligence soon came that the invading forces were at hand.

"A river divided them from us, along the banks of which I set out with a reconnoitring party. From observation and intelligence I discovered they did not exceed us in numbers, though no doubt they were far more efficient in the art of war. They encamped near the river, with the evident intention of bridging and crossing it. There was one thing to do, and one only to my mind. Attack them! The blow would be so thoroughly unexpected, that success seemed to me certain. I propounded my views, which were well received, and I was asked to carry out the attack.

"I knew the country fairly well, and arranged for the greater part of my force to cross at a ford some way above, and work round under cover of the dark.

"I determined to cross with them, having selected a picked body of a hundred strong, and take up a position under cover of the river bank.

"At daybreak our enemies would attack, when I hoped, with my men, to rush the camp. All went well as we took up our position unobserved, everything was quiet and orderly. As the first streak of dawn appeared, I hurriedly inspected my company, who were apparently ready for the fray, and nicely hidden from observation.

"As the first shot rang out on the still morning air, followed quickly by a volley, my little band rose. In accordance with my directions they started at a smart trot, without firing until they got to close quarters.

"Half the ground had been traversed, when a deadly fire from the camp poured into us, which we readily replied to.

"The bullets however kept whizzing in, and I felt suddenly that there was hesitation in my band.

"With a loud cry I dashed forward, yelling the charge, and rushing frantically into the camp. But I had not reckoned for a heavy entrenchment, which, however, I cleared only to be seized immediately, on my headlong fall the other side!

"I looked round for my men.

"Not one to be seen!

"The firing ceased. They had all bolted, right enough, too, since I had attacked an almost impregnable position. My men saw this long before my fatal leap, and also the rest of the army on the other side.

"The damage done to the foe was slight, but unfortunately for me their leader was shot.

"This incensed the soldiers beyond measure, as they surveyed their captive—a hated Englishman!

"The whole affair was laid at my door, and they clamoured loudly for my life. But the officer in charge placed me under arrest, saying he would attend to my case when the work of the day was over.

"There was a brick building in the camp, with two rooms belonging to some farmer, in one of which I was placed under strong guard.

"During the day the rebellion was quelled, and towards evening I was tried, and, no doubt very rightly, sentenced to be shot at daybreak.

"The officers, on the whole, behaved very well to me, ordering me to be supplied with food, coffee, and cigarettes.

"Gradually I began to realise the hopeless situation, seeing only too clearly my folly in taking up a cause, the merits of which I knew so little. Yet, even with the sentence of death hanging over me, the most depressing thought of all was the fact that I had made such a foolish mess of my military tactics.

"I ought not to have assumed such a position, and felt my conceit almost deserved the fate awaiting me. I really experienced at first some slight comfort in the fact that I was going to be put out of the world. At least I should be saved the derision and contempt of the men whom I had led into such a mad enterprise.

"I looked round my prison, a dull sensation of apathy at my heart. Escape through the windows seemed easy enough, but I knew too well what my reception would be without, for I could hear the steady tramp of sentinels. Even now in my dreams the regular fall of those feet outside my prison walls will wake me with a shudder.

"The thought of approaching death momentarily shaped itself more vividly in my mind. I tried to prepare for my end, but only the thought of that fatal leap and my ridiculous expedition rose to taunt me. There was no light, no consolation, no hope!

"Sounds in the adjoining room attracted my attention. It was carpentering—I listened curiously.

"When my coffee was brought in, I asked what was going on.

"The soldier, who was very communicative, told me they were putting the dead officer in a coffin, and as the custom is in hot climates, he would be buried that night.

"When again left alone, I looked at my coffee, but did not drink it. Though at first I said I felt comforted at the idea of death, I found myself clinging desperately to dear life with a wild longing.

"What if I tried the Monte Christo plan? But how would that save me? Better be shot than buried alive.

"All was still. I felt my body tremble and my pulses quicken.

"I crept stealthily across the room, and, stooping down, placed my ear to the door. Not a sound within, only grim death reigned in that silent chamber. I pushed the door open and looked through.

"There stood the coffin in solemn state, one or two forlorn looking candles guttering upon it, dimly lighting the bare walls, throwing queer shadows around.

"On the floor lay some carpenter's tools.

"A sudden thought flashed through my brain, one of daring possibilities. It seemed to brace me, and then intoxicate my mind, deadening fear, and awakening my crushed hopes.

"I placed my hand to my head, and staggered back against the door, for the room whirled round, and I seemed to discern the outlines of the coffin through a dense mist.

"Pulling myself together, I crept softly forward, and knelt down by the wooden box. What if this strange inspiration, this one last shot failed!

"I would not harbour the question, but forced it back as with eager fingers I unscrewed the coffin lid. I raised it gently, without a sound, and the livid face of the poor dead captain stared up into mine.

"To-morrow, if I could not save myself, I should be even as this lifeless clay, lying cold and stiff under the destroying volley.

"The haunting fear of the Eternal Unknown spurred me on to action. I was so full of life and activity, I could not die without a struggle. The sight of the corpse had a great effect upon me. The mystery of death was torture to my racking brain. Reverently but quickly I grasped the body in my arms, and lifting it from the rude shell, bore my ghastly burden to the adjoining room, where I laid it under the blanket that had been given to me.

"Then I returned and commenced operations, every moment fearing to be overheard.

"I took the candles off the nails in which they were stuck, and turning over the coffin lid, fastened in several long screws, being careful they did not come through. Then tying some string round them, I made a handle, about where my hands would be when lying within. It only took a few minutes to fill up the old screw holes with tallow, and rub the tops with dust, to make a very fair resemblance to the heads of the screws which had gone. Hastily replacing the candles on the nails, and the lid over the lower part of the coffin, I crept in, and with my string handles drew it over me, holding it down firmly.

"My first feeling was one of suffocation, so unbearable that my scheme already seemed impossible. 'Should I have time to make an air-hole?' I thought, 'and would it be safe if I did?' I resolved to try, and pushing my lid down, reached a large gimlet, with which I bored some holes at the side.

"A tramping of feet, and I dropped the tool, drawing the lid to its proper place.

"As the door latch turned, my heart beat violently. Had they seen it move?

"With all my might I clung on to the lid, the muscles in my arms swelling, my teeth clenched, my breath coming quick and fast.

"That was the most agonising moment of my life, as I waited in dread suspense, all the vitality in my veins frozen with horror.

"The sound of a low, monotonous voice broke on my ear, the words brought the reality of my awful position vividly before me. The priest was blessing this mockery of death! As he ceased, the soldiers went to the door of the adjoining room. Would they discover the exchange? I heard it open and shut again, they were evidently satisfied I was asleep under my blanket. The coffin was raised, I still clung to the lid, fearing it would slip, but my grasp was so tight, that the only risk was in the string breaking.

"My feelings can be imagined, as they carried me on their shoulders, these strong men who were prepared to shoot me down like a dog at daybreak.

"I knew only too well what a wild plan I was pursuing. How mad this attempt to save myself would have seemed at any other time! But desperation and acute emergency will drive one to any lengths, and I had seen so much of the superstition of these people.

"So I clung to my wretched thread of hope, and prayed as I never did before! I did not know where I was being taken, but judging from the time it was out of the camp.

"The formula of this military night funeral was familiar to me. I should be set down at the side of the grave on the ropes that would lift and lower me, while the priest sprinkled some more holy water. Then the firing party would fire, and the earth be shovelled in.

"Before the steady march ceased, I raised my lid slightly to get a good breath of fresh air. Then an abrupt halt, and I was deposited with rather jerky motions on the ground.

"The crucial moment had arrived when a dash for freedom, life, and air, should save or end my existence! My last, my only chance, a final intreaty to the powers above, a bracing of the nerves, resolution, and then——

"I gripped my string handles tighter, and with one mighty effort dashed up the lid, shrieking wildly in Spanish: 'Io soy el espritu del su jefe, Escario!' (I am the spirit of your leader, Escario.)

"The lid struck the men violently who stood beside the coffin, and strong soldiers as they were, for whom bullets had no terror, they started back cowering and white, consumed with superstitious dread at this weird resurrection.

"Whether they believed I was indeed their fallen chief, or a devil bursting from bonds, I know not, for in the twinkling of an eye I was away under cover of the night. Before they had time to consider, the phantom vanished, seizing the opportunity of a momentary panic.

"Thank Heaven there were no stars or moon, and if ever a man ran like the wind, I did that night."

"Dick," I cried, springing up and laying my hand on his shoulder, "old man, I congratulate you."

"Well it was a near shave, certainly. But fortune favoured me, and coming across some friendly miners, I lay perdu awhile, disguised as one of them. Eventually, as my presence proves, I got away, and I do not think that corner of the globe will ever see my face again."

The Stump of a Cigar.

I.

ALCIDES PAILLET, artist of the Latin Quarter, hurrying to an appointment with Georges Vaquier, a journalistic compatriot stopping at the Hotel de la Perle, Place de la Sorbonne, crossed the threshold, leapt the staircase, reached the third floor and knocked at door 39. No response.

"How queer!" said he. "Vaquier cannot have forgotten our rendez-vous, or can I be mistaken! This is certainly the address he gave me."

Just at that moment his eye caught sight of the key in the lock, left there by his friend, of course, expressly for him.

"Ah, 'twas all right then! Georges meant to return; while awaiting his coming he'd make himself at home."

And Paillet entered. Little curious by nature, it never occurred to him to notice the room or to remark a faint odour of patchouli that ought to have revealed to him the recent presence of a woman. Similar odours were not unusual in hotel apartments, and he crossed to the book-case where a file of books stood boldly exhibiting their backs.

"Peste," murmured he, running over the titles, "Georges grows frivolous of late! Formerly upon his shelves one found but volumes of jurisprudence, economy and statistics; now behold but novels and poems—'Faded Roses,' 'Always United,' 'Holes in the Moon,' etc. His Parisian sojourn has decidedly affected him. N'importe! we'll read awhile; here goes for 'Faded Roses!'"

And Paillet threw off his top-coat, drew from his pocket the pipe always carried with him, and was just going to light it when he saw displayed upon the mantelpiece a superb cigar, a splendid Londrés. Always thoughtful, Georges had remembered his weakness for this special brand. He took it, lighted it, rolled upon his tongue its delicious flavour, stirred up the fire a little, and contentedly plunged into his enormous heap of "Faded Roses," finding them so well suited to his taste that he gave no further thought to the delay of his friend till, arriving at the opening of the closing ode, he found some difficulty in continuing his reading.

He raised his head. Night had fallen; darkness had invaded the room. He rose, stretched himself, and wondering more than ever at Georges' absence, fished his note from his pocket, and began—to be sure he was right—to re-read its terms: "Sunday, January 14th, 2 p.m., Room 39, Hotel de la Perle, Place de la Sorbonne."

"No," said he, "I have not lost my wits, though Georges is not here. Eh bien! he breaks his word, and—I will stay here no longer posing like a fool!"

And so saying, Paillet threw down his cigar stump, long since burnt out, pulled on his coat again, and promptly departed, considering for a moment the advisability of leaving a note behind him registering his rage. A note? That would be very formal; a message with the concierge would do as well. But arriving at the lodge, the concierge too was out, not a servant to be found. Grumbling and vexed Paillet passed to the street and to the postal station of the Faubourg of St. Germain, to launch thence forthwith a furious telegram to his negligent friend Vaquier.

II.

MEANWHILE, as this little drama unrolled itself thus under the lone eye of Providence, a young and charming woman impatiently awaited at the Gare de l'Este the arrival of her husband, M. Claude Lamberte, domiciled with her at the Hotel de la Perle, Place de la Sorbonne. A country merchant, Lamberte came every winter, partly for business, partly for pleasure, to pass with his wife a month in Paris. To-day he had gone to lunch at Villemouble with a college chum, and his wife had profited by his absence to carry out a plan formed for a long time.

An uncle and aunt of hers lived in Paris, Rue de la Grosse-Pinte, whom certain transfers of property, insisted upon by her husband through a bit of temper, had thrown into comparative poverty. She had heard of it briefly, began at once to put aside all the economies and trifles she was able to spare, determined at the first chance that offered itself to carry them personally to her dearest relatives. That chance had come. Therefore towards two o'clock, her simple lunch and toilet finished, she had left her room, the key in the lock for the maid to arrange it, tossed her bundle into a passing fiacre, and departed upon her errand of affection for the Rue Grosse-Pinte. Her aunt was not at home, but the concierge received the bundle, and Madame Lamberte, her mind at ease, turned her steps towards the Gare de l'Este to meet her husband at five o'clock.

In fact at five minutes past five precisely the train rolled into the station. Claude sprang to the platform, kissed his wife tenderly, helped her to the carriage again, and the return was begun.

"And you had a good time, dearest," began his wife presently, a detail or two exchanged between them.

"I should say so!" Claude responded, "and grew ten years younger talking over old times and pranks, my dear. And you, Mignonne, what did you do?"

"Oh, I," said she, with a little white lie, fearing to anger him, "I stayed at home till four o'clock, then came out to meet you. It was truly a long, long day, dearest, for a woman all alone, with no one she loved to speak to."

"Poor little darling," Claude murmured remorsefully, again embracing her fervently.

Indeed, so wrapped were they in the tenderness of this sweet reunion, that they arrived at their destination, passed into the hotel still affectionately arm-in-arm, and upstairs to room 39.

"Ah," sighed the merchant as they entered with a long relieved breath, "what a comfort to be out of that racket and hear ourselves speak once more! What say you to dining up here, Octavia, a regular bridal fête, like the lovers of other days, you know? Does the notion please you, little one?"

"Please me, Claude? How good you are!"

And Claude, under the inspiration of these tender memories and the pretty white throat of his wife, plainly visible through her half-opened corsage, felt himself seized with a renewal of love and admiration as ardent as in the first hours of the honeymoon.

Suddenly bustling about the room with his loverlike air, at once sentimental and rakish, he crossed, I know not under what impulse, towards the mantelpiece. A strong odour of tobacco smoke greeted his nostrils. He stopped, sniffed, wheeled round.

"Octavia," said he, "did you tell me that you were alone here all day long?"

"Absolutely alone."

"But someone has been smoking here?"

"Impossible."

"Smell for yourself, then: the odour is strong enough."

"True, I smell it, too. Where can it come from?" cried she wonderingly. "Perhaps——"

"Well, what else?"

"It was the bell-boy, perhaps."

"Isadore? He never smokes; he has often told me so when I have offered him cigarettes. Therefore——"

"Therefore, Claude," stammered Octavia, dazed by the mystery, "what do you mean by that? What do you want me to tell you?"

"You should know, Octavia," Claude answered sternly, assailed by cruel thoughts, and quick to pass from one extreme to another, "if, as you say, you have been here all day alone. Speak! speak!" he thundered, "where does that odour come from?"

"I will see, I will go at once and inquire, Claude——"

"No, not a step. You would still deceive me. You have received someone here; this odour could be neither chance nor fancy. The man—his name—who is he, I say?"

"No one—no one, Claude; on my soul, no one!"

"And I say, yes! Quick, answer me—his name, I tell you!"

And Octavia, in the terror that her husband's fury caused her, determined to cut the knot with a second lie.

"Please, please, Claude," cried she pleadingly, "don't be vexed with me. That odour—so little that I was sure that it would be gone by now—I did not mean to deceive you—that odour was through me. I—I disobeyed you, Claude. I smoked a cigarette to-day!"

"What? When I have positively forbidden you to?"

"Yes, Claude, but it was such a little one, and I did not think how wrong it was."

She clasped his hand and leant against him, and looked so pretty, so truly repentant for the sin she had committed, that Claude, in spite of himself, was vanquished by her gentleness.

"Well, all right, said he, "this once I pardon your levity and disregard of my wishes, but—do not do it again, Octavia!"

"Never, never," affirmed she, craftily offering herself to his kisses, and the trouble for the moment blew over by Octavia's returning to the cares of her toilet, a little delayed by this stormy episode. As for Claude, good soul, he already deplored his hasty suspicions. What had possessed him? His wife was the best, the most honest of women. How wrong he had been to wound her so. And really, after all, what harm had there been in her tasting a little of forbidden fruit?

Pacing back and forth while he awaited her dressing, reflecting thus, his foot struck something on the floor that rolled. He stooped, picked it up. Impossible! Could he believe his own eyes? That which he had in his hand—the corps du délit, the clinching proof of his wife's brazen treachery—was the stump of a cigar. He had not been wrong, then. She had deceived him! He was betrayed like other husbands.

"Eh bien, dearest," murmured just then a soft voice behind him, "hast thou no more to say, then, to thy little Octavia?"

The spell that bound him relaxed with the sound of that siren voice. No more to say to her, with every nerve of his body tense with fury? One leap took him beside her.

"See it—see it!" he cried. "Behold the 'cigarette'; such a little one, too, that made that smoke a while ago!"

Octavia stared, uncomprehending.

"See it—see it!" repeated he, shaking it and brandishing it before her eyes, "the stump of a cigar, hardly cold, here on my floor! Wretch! Answer, I say. Who—has—been—here—since I've been gone?"

"No one—no one, Claude. Ask the concierge."

"Concierges are easily corrupted."

"You believe me a liar, then, Claude?"

"I know that you are one!" and he caught her by the shoulder and crushed her to her knees, the better, perhaps, to realise her crime. She struggled, writhed in his grasp; his clutch was iron. Octavia decided it was wise to retract.

"Claude," said she solemnly, with appealing eyes, "listen one moment, and I will tell you the truth."

"You have not told the truth, then?"

"No."

"How, then, can I believe what you say?"

His wife lifted her arms upward.

"As Heaven is my witness," said she, "it is the truth I tell you now, I was not here this afternoon——"

This was too much. Claude raised his hand, and Octavia dodged, wrenched herself free, and fled from the room.

III.

SAFE in the corridor, without thought of refuge, she began to descend the stairs. The gloom and silence of the house in that mid-hour of struggle between twilight and night somewhat calmed and brought her to her senses. Where was she going when she reached the bottom, or what pretext to give the concierge or servants for her bonnetless head, half-buttoned corsage, and face pale with worry? Go back? Never! Go on? How could she? Even now someone was coming, a step near at hand, and the door beside her, opening on the landing immediately beneath her own, brusquely flew back, and a head, curious, interested, peered into the passage.

A young and handsome head, too, that of a gentleman, like herself, recently arrived in Paris, whose name she did not know, but with whom she and her husband had several times exchanged a word or two as they met on the stairs. Always respectful and courteous, she had begun to look upon him almost as an old acquaintance. He stared, started, recognised the pretty lady and neighbour, whose name he did not know either, and advanced to meet her.

"You are looking for a servant, madame?" said he.

The cue was given; Octavia seized it.

"Yes, monsieur, a servant, and was debating whether to go up or down. I desired some matches, you know."

"Ah, I can aid you, then; my box is full and at your service, madame. But step inside, please, the hall is so cold," and Vaquier—for Vaquier it was—drew back to allow her to pass. Octavia, confused, moved forward a step or two and began to explain:

"Her husband the merchant—monsieur remembered him—had gone for the day with a friend to Villemouble. She was alone, her room dull and dark, and"—she smiled enchantingly—"monsieur would understand, she had always been so afraid of the dark."

"And I, though not afraid, madame," Vaquier politely answered, "was dull and lonely also; a friend that I expected did not arrive. It was he that I thought I heard, when—luckily for me—I came to the door," and Vaquier's eyes completed the sentence that his lips dared not frame.

"You are alone, then, monsieur?" Octavia questioned timidly, embarrassed for a response and feeling it safer to confine herself to a rôle of catechising.

"Alas, yes, madame, and puzzled I am by it, too."

Vaquier assented again. "Alcides Paillet is usually the most punctual of men. But, as to-day, madame, like your husband, he plays the truant, and since Providence has thrown us together, and both of us are so dull and lonely, perhaps you will deign to pass the evening in my company? Count upon me for every service, madame, and"—Vaquier boldly burnt his ships behind him—"what restaurant would you prefer?"

Poor little Octavia, swamped in a sea from which there seemed no issue!

"Monsieur, monsieur," stammered she, "you go too fast. I would not dare to leave the hotel."

"You will dine here, then, in my modest chamber?" demanded Vaquier, more and more pluming himself upon the alms Heaven had vouchsafed his loneliness.

A rap at the door saved Octavia a reply.

"Your friend, or maybe my husband, monsieur!" she cried, in consternation.

Before Vaquier could answer, two more imperative strokes drew him from his indecision and he opened—to a telegraph boy, presenting the blue envelope of an electric message. He ran his eye over it, then, wonderingly, read it aloud:

"What the dickens, Georges, my friend," it said, "do you mean by breaking the appointment given me to-day? I came at two promptly, found the key in the door, and, believing you only a moment absent, entered, smoked a cigar, devoured an entire volume of verse, and then, as night had come, though you had not, departed furious, and await an explanation.—Indignantly, PAILLET."

Aictavo graspn wofradr tiwh a tillte ryc.

"Monsieur, allow me. I'll return it immediately."

And she was gone, the telegram with her, leaving the dumstruck journalist staring. To await a friend three hours, then be taxed with discourtesy; to receive a lady and a tacit promise of some hours more of her agreeable society and see her suddenly disappear—it was enough to make even a journalist stare.

IV.

MEANWHILE, just above him, Octavia, proof in hand, was telling her husband everything, from the secret trip to the Rue Grosse-Pinte to the filching of the telegram. The cigar stump mystery was a mystery no longer; the painter had simply gone a floor too high and taken the merchant's room for the room of the journalist. Claude's brow shaded a little as he heard the details, but he, too, had his lesson, and he decided to be generous.

"My dear," said he, "since you wish it so much, see your people whenever you like, and it's high time, I take it, to restore the message to its rightful owner. That gentleman is the cause of our reconciliation; we'll have him up here to share our little dinner."

Which accounts for the exchange of characters that fifteen minutes later made Vaquier the guest instead of the host, and also for the absence of his contemplated dessert—from the rosy lips that smiled at him now across a steaming dish of Chateaubriand's fillets.

THE ELOPEMENT.

A WOMAN sat on a stool before the fire, shielding her face from the heat with a theatre programme, and glancing up inquiringly at a man who leant with his elbow on the mantelpiece. The latter looked as though he were dreamily considering such fantastic pictures as might have been foreshadowed by the calculations of the future, in which he appeared to be engrossed. Both were in evening dress, and a cold supper was on the table.

The room, which had the characteristic aspect of a sample show-room, obviously formed one of an ordinary suite in a large metropolitan hotel. It led directly into a bedroom beyond which was a small dressing-room. It was, as such apartments invariably are, extremely handsome and uncomfortable, recalling no domestic association to any but royal personages, who habitually exist in the frigid and candid exposure that seems to pervade the most private recesses of palaces, whether of princes or licensed for public entertainment.

The occupants of the room presented all the symptoms of having just returned from a problem play. Their faces wore an expression of such profound gloom and anxiety as could only have been induced by the hopeless entanglement of ideas in which contemporary genius delights to involve the perceptions of inferior minds.

Presently the woman took her eyes from the man's face, and, dropping her extemporised fan, stared earnestly into the fire, which was dancing such a measure as alternately left her in a black shadow, and then played brightly on her white neck and shoulders, until, on reaching her eyes, it sank back as though dismayed at the prospect of any conflict with their fierce lustre and sparkling vehemence. She was quite young, of dark, almost southern complexion, and her hair, which was of rich dusky brown, flashed here and there with changing tints of gold.

He, too, was a pleasing figure, with light curly hair and close-clipped beard, sharply-cut features, and eyes of that deep transparent blue very frequently accompanying a spiritual sensibility to nervous influences and suggesting by their liquid eloquence that their possessor through their cerulean medium can see farther into the mysteries of the invisible than those favoured with more ordinary, if equally serviceable optical provision.

The woman suddenly said without looking up:

"Have you got it?"

"Got what?"

"The thing—the pistol?"

"Yes, it's in the bag, but we shan't want it."

"Why not?"

"Because if your love for me is not great enough to make you wish to live, it is not worth the sacrifice of two lives."

"Why two?"

"You don't suppose I could live without you afterwards, do you?"

"Why not? You don't hold the same views of social life and its obligations as I do. I wish to belong to you because I love you more than life, and feel that it would be worthy any sacrifice; but I also have a conscience—however artificial you say its injunctions are—and it tells me that I may be wrong to give up all else for you, yet my sin can be compounded for, like everything else in this world, at a price. I have told you what that price is, and I think it cheap. Can you fancy me and scandal in company together, even with you to stand between us and blind me with the garlands of a lover's springtime? You know I could not bear it. What a coward you are! Why did you agree to my conditions if you had made up your mind to draw back at the last moment?"

"I don't think I am a coward, but I didn't quite understand your meaning. I thought you only wanted the revolver as a protection against him."

"Him! Why the pitiful scoundrel isn't worth good honest powder and lead. He's fit only to be drowned in a butt of brandy, or flogged with the stick he keeps to ill-use his wife with! Do you know that he had hit me—beaten me like a dog?"

"I'm not surprised—what for?"

"Because—I can't tell you why, but it's true."

The man shrugged his shoulders as though it didn't matter much, and then said, rather wearily, as he glanced at a small bag which lay among some rugs upon the sofa.

"Anyhow, we shan't want it. I am not such an infamous blackguard as to become a woman's lover and murderer on the same night!"

"But I don't expect you to do it," she persisted; "you can go away somewhere and need never come back. You know I understand all kinds of shooting things. Why I can hit bottles twenty yards away! How could I miss my heart when it shall have grown so big with love? Come, Harold!" she added, going close up to him and laying her hand on his shoulder, "you're not going to play me false, are you? You swore that if what I wished could be done by human hands, you would do it. Has your love been all a pretence, incapable of any sacrifice? Can't you realise that I love you much more than I value life, and that, as death must come some day, I wish to die to-morrow with your kisses warm upon my lips. Come! Be my lover now and forget to-morrow!"

She twined her arms about him, and kissed his mouth and neck with passionate tenderness. Like a man in a dream he held her to his breast, closer and closer.

She broke from him with a low, soft laugh of triumph and taking a bottle of champagne from the table, knocked off its head with a knife and poured out two foaming glasses. She gave one to her companion, who seemed too dazed to move, and then, holding up the other, cried:

"Come! let us drink to the union of life's two unconquerable forces, love and death! Good luck to them both!"

When they had drained their glasses, she flung hers down upon the tiled hearth, where it broke into a hundred fragments; his dropped from his hand on the carpet and remained unbroken.

The woman went quickly towards the adjoining room, the man stood for a moment or two motionless, then he started, and, going quietly to the little bag, drew out a revolver and slipped it into the pocket of his overcoat, which, with his hat, he next put on; also adjusting a silk scarf round his neck with a nice precision as to the arrangement of its folds. He picked up the programme from the floor and wrote upon it in pencil: "I find I can't do it after all. Good-bye. Don't bother, I'll make it all right downstairs. Send my things to club to-morrow and then go home."

He stuck the paper in the glass over the fireplace, and, snatching a long, black glove from the table, noiselessly left the room.

It was barely 11.30 o'clock, and as the office of the hotel was still open he stopped and paid his bill, telling the clerk to include the cost of a broken wine-glass and next morning's breakfast, for which he ordered a devilled sole. Then he lit a cigar and sauntered across Trafalgar Square.

He went into a club in Pall Mall, of which he was a member, and sat moodily in the smoking-room. Even men who knew him well, after looking in his face, passed him without a word; there was that in his eyes which froze the commonplace greetings on their lips, and which long afterwards they recalled and talked of.

At about three o'clock he went out again, and walked slowly and thoughtfully in a northerly direction. The streets were now quiet and deserted, and as he passed by, several policemen eyed him queerly, and one asked him, respectfully, whether he was all right. He nodded and went on.

Though it was still dark there were signs in the east of the approaching dawn as he emerged on the suburban heath to which he had been steadily advancing. He went straight to the trunk of a tree which lay where it had fallen in a great storm. For many years it had formed a seat beneath a noble elm, standing on the crown of a little grassy knoll that sloped down to one of the bye-roads of the common. In summertime it was a favourite retreat for simple lovers, and many hearts had beat faster and many lips had sealed their vows of truth from the encouragement of its grave repose.

Here he sat down and lit another cigar, the last, in his case. As he finished it the sun was just beginning to glimmer on the horizon; the grey twilight grew paler and more transparent, until the stars swung themselves into other hemispheres, and little birds, roosting over his head, fluttered their stiffened feathers and chirruped a sleepy welcome to their ascending providence.

He took the long, black glove from his pocket and examined it curiously. He tried to pull it on to his hand, but found it would only admit three fingers. It was the left, and on it he could trace the mark of a wedding ring. He kissed it in a sudden frenzy of passion, and, as he did so, caught the faint aroma of the delicate arm that had so lately worn it. For an instant the rush of emotion to his external senses completely unmanned him, as he covered his face in his hands, and his whole frame shook in an agonising endeavour to control himself.

He was soon quite calm again, and, after kissing the glove once more, he carefully hid it under the roots of the tree behind him. Then he sat down again and shot himself through the heart.

THE MORTAL "TACWIN"

[The Mohammedan religion teaches that there is a race of demi-spirits, winged females of beautiful forms, who watch over and defend mortals from all harm. These marvellous beings are called "Tacwins," or Fates, and one is assigned to guide, counsel, comfort and direct every human being.]

EDWARD MANCHESTER and I were boys together. We fished in the same desk at school, and climbed the old Devonshire hills in company. The current of our youthful lives ran in the same channel, until when, standing at the portals of early manhood, our paths widely diverged. Following the guidance of his ambition, he became a printer's apprentice, drifted into editorial work, and finally went to Glasgow. It was then that I lost all trace of him. I entered a commercial groove and became an agent for a firm of engine builders.

So it happened that after fifteen years' separation we met again at Cape Town whither I had been ordered on duty. Of course our boyhood's friendship was renewed. He was now the editor and publisher of a prosperous journal, and the same hale and hearty good fellow of my early association. To his hospitable home I was invited, and it was the happiest, cheeriest fireside at which I was ever privileged to sit.

His wife, who was at least ten years his junior, was a woman of rare mental qualifications, and her assistance to him in his profession, and likeness of spirit, had brought the pair into a perfect harmony which was most pleasing to observe. Sitting in his library one evening, our conversation turned upon the subject of dreams. I doubted whether they were in any degree prophetic, and maintained with ardour the opinion that dreams were simply due to a disordered nervous system, citing many learned psychologists in support of my theory.

"You may not believe me," said my friend, "but, nevertheless, I know that dreams are sometimes forecasts of things to occur. I say I know this to be true, because the most important event of my life was brought to pass through the influence of a dream. It is perhaps true that coarse natures do not 'entertain angels unawares' when sleep hovers over them and enchains their senses, but there are fine organisations possessed of a sixth sense, and that extraordinary attribute is only awakened when all the others are in repose."

"That is a novel idea," I replied, "and I do not care to accept it as true without definite and convincing proof. However, what was your dream? After I have heard it related and am informed what came of it, perhaps I may become a convert to your new philosophy."

Knocking the ashes from his cigar and settling himself comfortably in his easy-chair, my friend proceeded to relate the following extraordinary incident:

"Some years ago I was employed on the reporting staff of a Yorkshire newspaper. It was uphill work, and my salary was not munificent. In fact, there were frequently times when the ends utterly and positively refused to meet. One night I repaired to my room a good deal out of humour with myself and the world. Like most other newspaper men, I had grown cynical, so plainly were the shams and deceits of humanity held up to my view in the course of my daily tasks. It was in November, and a chill wind blew. I stirred the fire, and sat down to commune with myself. The blaze dispersed a radiant heat; a sense of warmth and comfort stole over my heart and brain, and after a little I fell fast asleep. I say fast asleep, and yet I hardly believe that was my actual condition, for in all my slumber it seemed to me that I was possessed of every faculty.

"I was transported to Arabia. The sun was sinking behind a typical Eastern city, and its fading glories lighted up the domes and minarets of many an imposing mosque. I was in trouble as to the course I should pursue. The people were all strange and forbidding in appearance, and uttered not a word as they strode on, with staves in their hands, towards the city, while, in the opposite direction to that in which my course seemed to lie, reposed the apparently unending, drifted sands of the desert. From the city a perfume as of sweet spices was wafted, while from the desert a hot and withering blast assailed me with its scorching breath.

"Suddenly a woman stood beside me. I could not tell from what quarter she had approached. She was clad in the garb of an Arabian maiden, her face artfully concealed beneath a turban, from which depended a heavy veil. She spoke to me—I have never heard but one other voice so sweet and musical—and addressed me in my native tongue.

"'Whither dost thou go, mortal?' she inquired.

"'In truth I do not know,' was my response. 'Duty seems to demand that I should cross the desert waste before me, but my way is not plain, neither do I believe I shall survive the trials and fatigue of the journey.s Inclination impels me towards the city, where all i repose, and where the most luscious fruit tempts my eyes, and the perfume of rare exotics is grateful to my senses.'

"'Touch them not. The fruit is the apple of Sodom, and is as ashes upon the tongue. The odours which seem so delicious and entrancing are deadly poisons; whoever breathes them is condemned to for ever wear a heart of stone. Follow me, and I will lead you to a haven of safety, for has not Allah intrusted you to my care? Doubt not my sincerity, for if you do so you will fall and faint by the way.'

"'And who are you, good lady? How can you resist the deadly perils of the trackless desert? If I trust you, what assurance have I that you will not lead me forth to die and be for ever lost in the shifting sands?'

"'Ask your own heart and be mindful of its dictates. I cannot deceive you if I would, for Allah has created me to keep watch and guard over you.'

"I was convinced that the maiden spoke truly. Turning to my veiled companion, after one last glance towards the city, I said:

"'Lead on. I will follow you without reserve. I put my trust in you, though the way appears difficult, and the end is as closely veiled in obscurity and doubt as are your features hidden from my sight.'

"She turned and walked fleetly across the desert, and soon the blissful city was lost from view below the horizon, and all around us lay the silent, merciless sands. Day after day, night after night we plodded on. Sometimes an awful sense of weariness oppressed me; my feet sank to the ankles in the remorseless, yielding sands; the intense heat shrivelled my skin and parched my lips. But my companion was never weary and paused not. If I turned laggard, she prompted me to greater exertion with the words:

"'Even the desert has an end. Yonder lies your way. The troubles you now endure are but blessings in disguise. At the end there is eternal peace and a laurel wreath for your brow. Would you fail now, after you have suffered so much?'

"At each sound of her voice my faith was renewed as if by magic, and my strength came back to me. It seemed to me that months had been consumed in our journey when at last we attained the banks of a limpid stream. Beyond it was a stretch of palms and cedars, intermingled with luxurious plants and the most exquisite of flowers.

"'You have attained the reward of your sufferings,' said my guide. 'Here at last is rest and peace. All your journeyings are at an end and now comes your reward. Henceforth you will never know a want, but pass your remaining days on earth in doing good to your fellows. Our paths lie a little apart from this time, but I will watch over you. A sense of my presence will always be vouchsafed to you, and in paradise we shall be reunited.'

"'But,' I implored, 'why must you leave me? You have been my good angel, my guide, my saviour in all the trials which have beset my path. Remain ever at my side, for I may fail yet without your aid.'

"'I would that it might be so; but I fear it cannot. Be patient. In another state of existence we cannot be parted.'

"'Then let me see your face once before we part. Your voice has sustained me—to look upon your features would be far greater bliss.'

"'Know you not that the face of an Arab maiden is ever veiled? Even so it is with the angels when in human company. If you should but look into my eyes I should become human like yourself; then our companionship could never end.'

"'And that is my chief desire,' was my response, and seizing her veil I tore it from her face. It was not a countenance of rare beauty, as the world ordinarily judges the blandishments of women, but it was pure, and sweet, and true. It touched my heart as never had woman's face appealed to it before. The great, soulful eyes looked steadfastly into my own.

"'You have found me after years of vain searching, and released me from my bondage. Henceforth I am with you to the end of my life. For you was I created, and faithful to you will I remain until death, and even the grave shall not hide us from each other.'

"I awoke. The fire had died away to embers, and the room was growing cold. Long I marvelled what such a dream could portend. Weeks rolled by and the face of the Arabian maiden was ever before me. The months passed into years, and still every lineament of those angelic features, and the expression of the deep, soulful eyes remained implanted in my memory. Half unconsciously I scanned the faces of thousands in the busy streets, but among all the hurrying throng that face was never encountered. Still I was impressed that one day I should find it. I persevered in my profession, and, when downcast by adverse fortunes, that silent face strengthened me, as it had in my dream of the journey across the desert."

I had become intensely interested, for my friend was an excellent story-teller. At this point he paused. "Well," said I inquiringly, "what came of it?"

"Two years ago," he continued, "I came again to Cape Town. One day, shortly after my arrival, I was standing at a street corner, waiting for a tram, and in the meantime turned and carelessly glanced at a case of photographs displayed at the foot of a flight of stairs leading to an artist's studio. I gave a start as my gaze rested upon one face. The deep, dark eyes looking into mine; the regular features, the very folds of the hair, caught up gracefully over the high, intellectual forehead, were those of the maiden of my dream.

"I lost all interest in the tram, and hastened up the stairway to the studio. The photographer evidently considered me an escaped lunatic.

"'You have a picture in your case below—whose is it?' I inquired nervously.

"'A picture. Why, there are two hundred. How should I know which one you mean?'

"'Very true, I did not think of that. But, pardon me, sir, one of those photographs reminds me most forcibly of an absent friend whom I greatly desire to find. Will you be kind enough to lend me your aid in the matter?'

"'Certainly sir. Your manner, when you first came in, led me to doubt your sanity. However, I am now reassured, and shall be most happy to serve you.' His kindness availed little. The photographer could not tell to whom the picture belonged. He concluded that it must be the order of a transient visitor to the city, the negative had been destroyed, and so I departed in a more disturbed condition of mind than before. I had intended to pursue my profession in South Africa as close attention to work had produced a pulmonary complaint, from which in this mild climate I hoped to obtain relief, but all my energies were now directed towards finding the original of the haunting, evasive photograph. I secured an engagement upon the staff of a daily newspaper. Wherever I went—in church, theatre, or through the streets—my whole soul was absorbed in searching for what a majority of persons would call an illusion.

"Pardon me, but we have met before."

"In the fulfilment of my duties I was sent to Pretoria, to the house of a wealthy mine-owner for the purpose of an interview. This gentleman kindly invited me to remain the night in his house. During the evening several friends strolled in and among them was a young woman, who, in some mysterious way, did not impress me as a stranger. As she turned her face towards mine, our eyes met.

"I started back in astonishment. I had met the lady of my dream.

"'Pardon me, but we have met before, I believe,' I said, half apologetically, as soon as I could collect my scattered senses.

"'I do not know, sir, there is certainly a familiar tone in your voice.' She spoke in the same sweet and bewitching tones so deeply fixed in my memory. In my confusion, I quickly added:

"'It must have been in Arabia.'

"The eyebrows were arched in surprise. 'I think not, sir—I have never travelled in the East.'

"Well, to cut my story short, a lasting friendship was formed then and there. You have met Mrs. Manchester. She has proved all that my dream foretold. It is true that she has no recollection of having been my companion in the desert sands of Arabia, but I am none the less convinced that she is the 'Taowin' from whose lovely face I snatched the veil."

CHICHI.

CHICHI was unhappy—a most unprecedented thing, for Chichi ordinarily was but a synonym for sunshine. Her red lips drooped mournfully, and two great tears fell from the velvet depths of her dark eyes, as she swayed gently to and fro in her hammock, swung beneath the pepper trees.

What cared she that the Mexican sky, blue and cloudless, stretched over her like a benediction? What cared she that the hot sun, glinting between the feathery branches, fell on her uncovered head, bringing out the golden strands of her dark hair? That the birds called to her merrily? That down in the city all was gay with flags, and it was the first day of La Fiesta? Others might go to join the festivities and view the procession; but she? No! For the first time in her short, happy life Chichi was tasting the bitter cup of sorrow. And why? Any one of her companions could have told you. All because of the "White Señorita."

She was beautiful as an angel that Chichi admitted—in her white gown, her hair shining like gold, and her eyes blue as the sky. But could she dance the fandango, or throw the golden ball with that inimitable grace which never failed to win for Chichi enthusiastic bravas? Haughty and dignified as a queen was the "White Señorita." But could she stand as steadily as Chichi in the little car drawn by the milk-white horses, and smile coquettishly as the people deluged her with the carnival roses?

Yet they had made her queen of the fiesta, and Chichi, who had held that honour for four years, had gracefully yielded, for the "White Señorita" was a stranger among them, and a guest, and it was but courteous that this favour should be shown her. This was not the cause of her trouble; it was that José should forsake her—José, who had sung under her window in the soft moonlit nights; José, who had lain at her feet, through the hot Mexican noons, when even the birds were silent and the only sound was the rustling of the palm leaves, as some faint breeze stirred them to reluctant life, whispering to her willing ears his ardent words of love. That José, who had proclaimed her as his inamorata before them all at the last bull-fight, should forget her, and bow before the cold beauty of the "White Señorita."

She would let him go, the false one! There were plenty of cavalleros who would be glad of her favour. To-night would be the masked ball. She would not stay at home and weep; she would go and dance, the gayest of the gay. José should repent his perfidy—there were many who would die for her if need be. Someone should avenge her wrongs, and the "White Señorita," the stranger who had usurped her rights, should see whether it could be done with impunity! Her eyes blazed, and she smiled half savagely, then her pretty head drooped thoughtfully. She was plotting her revenge.

Down in the city, where all was gay, time flew on silver wings. To Maud Fairchild, the young English girl who had come to this summer land that her fast failing health might be benefited, all seemed like a dream. To the eyes of the dark-skinned Mexicans her fair loveliness seemed doubly beautiful, and from the first day of her arrival she had been called the "White Señorita."

They looked upon her with an admiration which was almost awe. When they had offered to make her queen of their festival she accepted the honour, as it was intended she should, as the highest compliment they could pay, and was enjoying the novel situation with a zest which brought the soft colour to her usually pale cheeks.

To José, who kept closely by her side, she looked like an angel, and yet in spite of the fact that she smiled half doubtfully in answer to his burning glances and impassioned words, which she only half understood, he was not as supremely happy as the occasion seemed to warrant.

He welcomed the evening which came at last, for it closed the festivities with a dance, at which the reproachful faces would be hidden behind masks, and his movements undetected. But instead of relief this brought him only a new reason for discomfort. Another cavallero kept persistently by his lady's side, and seemed determined to engross her attention.

Not a movement of the graceful figure did he lose, but watched him gloomily, until a familiar gesture or two suggested a solution of the mystery which closer observation confirmed. It was Gue, the brother of Chichi, who was seeking a quarrel in order to avenge this discourtesy shown his sister. José ground his teeth furiously. Should he be outwitted by a mere boy? Chafing under the various discomforts of the day, augmented by this last insult, he determined to show them that José de Ayala was not to be trifled with.

He stepped forward to where the couple were standing at one side of the room engaged in earnest conversation.

"If the señorita will permit me," he said, "I would remind her that she has chosen me for her cavallero."

The lady looked up a little bewildered, while her attendant drew her hand more closely within his arm and laughed scornfully.

"One does not need to keep a promise made to one so false as Don José," he answered. José's face grew livid behind his mask.

"Señor," he said huskily, "as a gentleman of Mexico, I demand satisfaction."

The other laughed again. "Take it," he answered, and stepping back a little, he struck him lightly on the face.

The next instant the dagger of José was buried in the heart of his assailant, who had not touched his own jewelled weapon, and who fell forward without a word.

Alarmed by the cries of Miss Fairchild, the merry-makers hurried to the spot, and in their gay dresses pressed around José, who had torn his mask from his face, and, kneeling on the ground, was supporting the lifeless figure of the young man, whose mask had also fallen. As the "White Señorita" knelt beside him, trying with frantic hands to staunch his life's blood he opened his eyes, and heedless of the crowd around or the little white hands that were pressed against his heart, he looked up into the eyes of José.

"It would have been kinder, querido," he said, smiling faintly, "had you done it first. Adios!"

José did not answer. Horrified and despairing, he was looking down into the white face, not of Gue, but—Chichi!

HIGH PLAY.

A COMEDY OFF THE STAGE.

By George Manville Fenn.

SUMMARY.

The story opens with an interview between Lady Braetoun and her son Roderick, in which she endeavours to induce him to give up "Baby" Lee, a chorus girl, and marry Olive, Isaac Emsworth's heiress. Emsworth takes Olive to consult Dr. Murray, who advises a voyage to South Africa in the Greyberg, in which he also is going. Roderick, who is friendly with Murray, comes for advice on the terribly bad condition of his health, and the Doctor recommends a trip in the same boat. "Baby" Lee, on being discarded, seeks means of revenging herself on Olive. Roderick, after his marriage, enters into an agreement with one Daines to pay ten thousand pounds if the latter will marry "Baby" Lee.

CHAPTER XII.

Dr. Murray's Suspicions.

As Murray entered Braetoun's box unheard by its occupant, his first glance was opposite to where Lucy was seated with her glass fixed upon Olive, evidently watching her every movement.

As Murray halted for a few moments in the doorway, he saw Lucy turn her head, as if to speak to someone nearly hidden behind her, and with whom she appeared to be carrying on an eager conversation, but only to turn and use her glass again upon Olive.

"The scoundrel," thought Murray. "How can a man act like that?"

Then all thought of Braetoun passed away, for Olive turned, saw him, held out her hand, and pointed to the chair by her side.

"I am so glad to see you," she cried. "I never thought that you could care for such frivolous amusements."

"I do not," he said; "but I came. Do you?"

"Oh yes, I like to see this once. Roderick wanted me to come. It is so bright and pretty, but I should not care to come often. I like the music though; it seems so merry and sparkling. Did you meet Roderick?"

"No."

"I almost wonder you did not. He said he would see you, and that he was going to have a cigarette."

Murray's brow clouded over a little. He was not surprised that he had not seen Braetoun, and he glanced involuntarily across the theatre again, to see that Lucy was talking with animation to someone invisible saving his white gloves and shirt front, for he kept well behind the curtain and the lady's chair.

"How pretty a theatre looks all lit up like this," continued Olive. "I wish my father had come; I tried so hard to persuade him."

"I can hardly realise his coming to such a place," said Murray, with a grave smile.

"But yet you came," she replied merrily. "I think it's quite right though. My father works far too hard, and I'm sure you do, Doctor. Always dealing with people's troubles. Oh, it's quite right for you to take a little amusement."

"But is this amusement?" he said drily.

"Oh, I suppose so. The people here seem to think it is."

"Then, you really do not think so?" he said earnestly.

"I've been laughing a great deal," she replied, "but I do begin to feel a little ashamed of it, and I don't think I shall come very often—unless Roderick wants me to. Do stop till he comes back, and I want you to look at him. It's our secret, mind: I shouldn't like him to think I said such a thing to you, but I am a little uneasy about him. He has been so unwell. I want you to notice how he is, and if you don't think he is as well as he should be, to make him come and see you."

"I will," said Murray, whose eyes were fixed upon Lucy.

"Ah, you are looking at that lady in the box opposite. She is so pretty, Doctor Murray; I looked at her through the glass. She is charming. Quite girl-like, and exquisitely dressed, but she is so rude. She has been staring at my diamonds all the evening."

"At your diamonds," said Murray thoughtfully; "but perhaps she thought you were rude for looking at her."

"Oh, that's cruel. I haven't been, indeed. I only just peeped at her twice, but she has been regularly watching me."

"Envious perhaps. Some ladies worship diamonds."

The dimly seen figure behind the chair.

"I don't. They fidget me. They are presents, and I am always so glad to have them off, so as to be sure that I have not lost any."

"Braetoun is coming back," said Murray. "The curtain will be up directly."

"Of course; he can't be long."

But though the conductor was back in his place, and watching for a hint from the prompter, there was no movement made in the opposite box, and as Murray furtively glanced there from time to time, he only made out that one of the white gloves was resting on the lady's chair.

"I asked Roderick if he knew who the lady opposite was, and he said he thought she was an actress, but she does not look like one—at least, I should not think she does."

"Jealous," thought Murray, without heeding the remark, for he was watching Lucy. "Could she have known that Braetoun had taken this box? Easily, I suppose. He ought to have taken his wife away at once. To go there is unpardonable. Poor girl!"

He was gazing hard now at the dimly seen figure behind the chair opposite to her when the drop scene began to rise for the second act, and he started from his seat and stared aghast at Braetoun, who had come silently into the box.

"No, no; sit down, old man, plenty of room. I'll take this chair behind little wifey," said Braetoun, as Murray vacated the place he had occupied.

"Yes, yes, do pray stay, Doctor," cried Olive eagerly, and her eyes seconded the words of her prayer.

"Want to talk to you after the next act. Will you sit down, or am I to make you? Hush! Silence! the people are looking."

Braetoun followed up his order with a push, and Murray subsided into his seat, after giving his old school-fellow a merry threatening look.

For he felt as if a great load had been taken off his breast, and there was a secret desire to reach back his right hand, grip Braetoun's hand and press it warmly by way of penance for the cruel, disloyal thoughts to which he had given way. For there was the dimly seen figure still behind Lucy Lee's chair, and she was turning her head to speak to whoever it was again.

It was to Murray as if a dark cloud had passed away from the front of the house, his breast was lightened, and in a few minutes he was laughing with his companions at the nonsense dressed up for their benefit, and seemed happier than he had felt for weeks. For there was something more than enjoyable in sitting there, turning from time to time to talk to the bright, happy woman at his side, whose girlish, innocent ways were so fresh and naïve, and who seemed happiest when those with her found most pleasure in the scene.

"Roddie," she whispered at last, "did you ever see anything so rude before? Do look at that lady opposite—but she can't be a lady, or she would not stare at me so."

"Silly little bird!" said Braetoun playfully from where he sat, well behind the curtain, and Murray listened intently. "Looking at you! Pooh! Nonsense! She's watching the noble-looking doctor. A little éprise. I say, Olive, isn't it shocking? You and I come here on the sly in reckless dissipation, and here we find the solemn, fashionable physician taking his relaxation too, and being ogled by one of the prettiest women in the house. You wouldn't have thought it of him, now, would you?"

"I shouldn't have thought it of him," said Olive, smiling ingenuously at their companion, "and I don't think it of him. I know better. She was watching me long before you came, Doctor Murray."

Murray smiled his thanks, and as soon as the drop scene fell he went back to his place, Braetoun at a look following him out.

Murray was half disposed to allude to Lucy's presence, and merely to suggest that his friend should take care and be well on his guard against any rencontre with the jealous-looking little body opposite; but he felt that he had already, in his solicitude for Olive's peace of mind, so gravely misjudged his friend that he merely shook hands and said:

"You don't look quite up to the mark, Roderick, my son. Give me a look in soon."

Five minutes later he was in his place again listening to the murmur of conversation in the box over his head, and now for the first time he noticed that Cyrus Daines had not returned to his place.

"Ha!" he muttered, "how prone one is to misjudge people. It must be he all the time. Poor Braetoun! How happy she seems."

He was looking up at Olive as he said these words, and saw that she was leaning back with her head half turned so as to gaze back at her husband, who had not changed his seat.

Caught up the bottle . . . and handed it to her.

"How beautiful she is," thought Murray as he gazed at the curve of the white throat and neck and the snowy bosom upon which the diamonds were sparkling, and then he started and frowned, for a low, angry little laugh came from the box overhead, and he knew in his heart that it was in derision of the picture visible in the opposite box.

CHAPTER XIII.

What a Spiteful Woman Will.

Allan Murray was quite correct in his surmise: the derisive spiteful laugh was directed at the little domestic scene taking place in the box opposite, and Lucy raised her opera glass, and looked on till Braetoun writhed in his impotent anger, and but for the fact that he was seated behind his wife, he would have been unable to hide his scowling countenance from her. As it was, she felt startled by the imperious way in which he told her to look at the stage, and the progress of the third act.

"I'll get her away early," he muttered, but he altered his mind directly, for he felt certain that as soon as Lucy saw them prepare to leave the box she would leave hers, and wait to encounter them, and perhaps make a scene.

"Why doesn't that little cad do something to stop her?" he muttered. "He's in the box with her still. I believe he's fighting with her instead of against."

He was quite right. Cyrus Daines was in the box which, out of compliment the lessee had sent to the little favourite who had so often brought good fortune to his house, and Lucy had gloried in the chance of confronting the man who had forsaken her, and having a long look at his wife. It was the opportunity for which she had been waiting, and she had worked herself up into a fit of desperation before she started for the theatre, and somehow the excitement she felt had lent a peculiar charm to her petite beauty, with the result that those who knew her well by sight declared that she had never looked so attractive before.

"Why, it's some acid—vitriol!"

Cyrus Daines had shared the opinion of the admirers, and with an unwonted feeling of excitement he sat through the first act, and then made his way to her box, but found the door closed, and as there was no answer to his light tap he waited till the box-keeper came round, and told him to open the door.

"Beg pardon, sir; Miss Lee said she would not see any visitors to-night," said the man.

"Exactly," said Daines, as he slipped something into the man's hand, "but she will see me."

Daines's face was familiar to the box-keeper as a friend of Lord Braetoun, and without making any further opposition, he unclosed the door, and Daines slipped in at once and closed it after him.

She turned sharply:

"Who's that? I said I would not see anyone."

There was an autocratic sound in her words, but she had reigned queen in that house for a whole year.

"It is only I, Lucy," he said softly.

"Yes, it is always only you," she cried pettishly. "Why have you come?"

"Because I wanted to be near you and talk to you."

"Then I don't want you, so please to go."

"I can't go, dear; pray let me stay," he whispered.

"Mr. Daines, if you ever dare to speak to me again like that, it is the last time you will ever have the opportunity of saying a word, here or anywhere else."

"I apologise humbly," he whispered. "It was only because I loved you. The word slipped out."

"Then please don't love me. There isn't such a thing as love—nothing but hatred."

"And malice," said Daines to himself.

"Look at that—look at your dear friend and that silly chit of a girl he calls his wife. Wait till she finds him out. Sitting there, turning to make eyes at him every moment, and before me. Oh, it's sickening!"

Daines was silent, feeling that it was the best policy if he wished to stay; and he stood behind her chair, waiting for her to speak again; but for a long space she was silent, spending her time in using her glass constantly to watch the opposite box, but rarely glancing at the stage.

"She'll begin talking after a time," thought Daines, and he stood watching Braetoun from the obscurity of the box, and thinking how he had better proceed so as to prevent there being a scene.

For from Lucy's manner he felt pretty well convinced that if the two parties met there would be an outburst of some kind; but he was not prepared to find so volcanic a nature as he was discovering in the little fragile-looking girl with her sweet innocent-looking features.

Daines was right; she leant back at last to talk to him, glad of the opportunity to speak out to one who knew all her trouble, and from that moment she began to show how she had been worked up to the present pitch, and how she was striving to keep her anger at white heat.

"Oh, it is unbearable," she said at last, in an angry whisper. "Is he parading that woman here on purpose to insult me?"

"Surely not. Braetoun would not be guilty of such an act of cruelty."

Lucy turned herself half round and looked at him mockingly.

"Roderick's friend speaking?" she said.

"No, I am not his friend. I consider that he has behaved too ill to you to be a friend of mine."

"How nice," she said, with a little laugh. "What a child you must think me, Mr. Daines."

"I was neither flattering nor trying to deceive you, Lucy," he said softly.

"No, you never did," she said with a flippant laugh.

"Yes, I have, often. Talked nonsense by the yard, but it was before I knew you for what you are."

"No, nor that tack won't do," she said shortly. "I'm sharp enough to read you, Mr. Cyrus Daines."

"No," he said quietly; "not yet, but you will understand me some day, I hope."

"Perhaps. I am at school yet, learning what men are."

"We are a bad lot, I'm afraid."

"Very," said Lucy drily. "Don't try to cheat me with any more of that kind of talk, Mr. Daines, because it is insulting me."

"God knows I would not insult you, Lucy," he said earnestly. "That's not like the little girl whom Braetoun introduced me to."

"And that's not like the sharp-tongued, chaffing Mr. Daines he introduced me to."

"Circumstances have altered me," he said.

"And so they have me," she said vindictively. "What woman could bear to see her sitting there like that, in her diamonds and dainty dress? Oh, I could kill her!"

"No, you could not."

"What! I could, without mercy, as I would any other thing that turned and stung me to get me out of her way."

"Be just to her," said Daines. "She is innocent and good enough."

"There you go," she cried, in a fierce whisper, and she flashed her eyes upon him. "Innocent and good enough—throw that in my teeth—I tried to be innocent and good to him. Why can't I be innocent and good? His wife—oh, it makes me mad!"

"I know you were innocent and good enough to him," whispered Daines, "and how good and loving you can be."

"Sitting there mocking me with his wife—his wife!"

"Well, why cannot you come here as someone's wife? Young, clever, beautiful."

"Ha! ha! Go on: flatter away. Who'd marry me?"

"I would; on my soul, I would," he whispered, as he sank in the chair behind her, and the house burst into a roar of laughter, succeeded by a thunder of applause—plaudits continued till the conductor lowered his bâton, and the leading lady came back to the front, to repeat the song and dance which had given so much satisfaction.

"You would?" she said softly, and she turned slowly round and looked him full in the eyes.

"Yes, to-morrow, as soon as the marriage could take place," he whispered passionately, "for I love you, Lucy, with all my heart."

"I shall end by believing that you are in earnest, Mr. Daines," she said lightly.

"You believe me now?" he continued.

"Isn't it a strange place to talk to me like that?"

"What is the place to me?" he said. "You are here, so close to me that I could touch you—if I dared."

"And you daren't," she said mockingly.

"I dare not. A few months ago I dared, and, but for a feeling that it wouldn't be square to Braetoun, I could have caught you in my arms and kissed you, because I did not love you. But now that I have found what a true, good little woman you are, I dare not do more than take your hand and kiss your fingers as respectfully as I would those of any lady in the land."

She uttered a little sigh, and her hand, as she sat half turned to him, was slowly pressed into his, and he bent down and softly held it to his lips.

"Thank you, Mr. Daines," she said, as she withdrew it. "I think I do believe, but it can never be. I'm not the girl I was, and you can't understand. I suppose I'm very wicked, but I never thought I was. I only feel one thing now, and that is, that I am Roderick Braetoun's wife, in spite of that woman sitting by him in her diamonds. He is my husband, and I can never even think of anyone again, wicked as I am. No, I'm not the girl you fancy, for he has worked up everything that was bad and evil in me, till he has made me what I feel I am to-night, ready to kill her, ready to do anything to wring his heart with agony, as he has wrung mine—I hate them."

"You will not do that; you will forgive him. You have nothing to forgive in her," whispered Daines, as she turned away from him now, and sat watching the opposite box.

"Never. Look at him with his friend there. A coward. He has kept him there so as to have an excuse for sneaking behind his wife. I saw through the whole manœuvre when the other wanted to go. I hate him, too. He sent Rod abroad for his health. Tore him away from me, and was the beginning of all this trouble. If it hadn't been for him Rod would never have seen that wretched girl, and thrown me over. Look at Rod now; I'm making him shrink so that he hardly dare stay in the house. There, you had better go and leave me; I'm not fit to have anyone near me now."

"Hush, hush! Be calm."

"Calm! with him sitting before me like that! Why, I feel as if I could get up and shout at them both; but if I did, the fools in the house who knew me would say I was acting again, and laugh. Ha, ha, ha! what a burlesque life is, Mr. Daines, isn't it?"

With the feeling growing stronger upon him that he must stay if he wished to prevent his companion from performing some mad act, Daines resisted all her efforts to get rid of him, and by degrees, towards the end of the piece, she seemed to grow calmer, saying no more about the occupants of the box opposite, but talking to him of the piece, and the various actresses whom she knew, praising and blaming their performance with a critical ability that pleased him more and more. But nearly all the time he noted that she kept on watching the box.

"There," she said at last; "it's nearly over, and I shall be glad to get back to auntie, and go to bed and forget all about it."

"That's wise," he said earnestly.

"Very well, then as you see I've grown wise," she said coldly, "please to say good-night and go."

"Let me see you home."

"No, thank you; it's only a couple of hundred yards, and I'll go by myself."

"I may come and see you to-morrow?"

"No. Please to go, Mr. Daines—if you have all the respect for me that you have tried to make me believe, you will do as I ask you and go at once."

"Yes," he said gravely, "you are right. I will go. Good-night."

He held out his gloved hand and she held out hers with a quick jerk, and a large square cut-glass bottle fell on the floor heavily.

"What's that?" he said sharply.

"Scent—scent," she cried. "The bottle. He gave it to me," she whispered excitedly. "Don't touch it. Is the stopper out?"

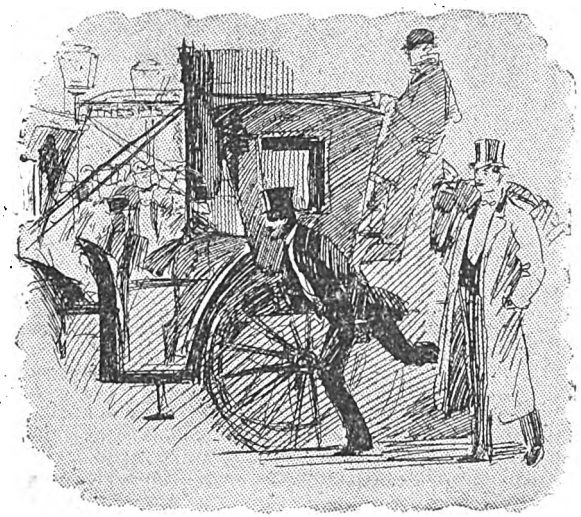
Her words were too late, for Daines had caught up the bottle, pressed the stopper back, and handed it to her.

"Very little spilt," he said.

"Oh," she said, with a stifled sob. "Quick! Go now. Good-night. No, don't shake hands."

He stood for a few moments, thinking how strange she was as she turned her back and sat gazing across the house. Then, with a sigh, he took his light overcoat and crush hat from a chair, and passed out, closing the door after him, while the music of the concluding scene of the burlesque suggested that the piece was nearly over.

"Yes," he said to himself, "I would marry her to-morrow if she would say 'Yes.' Poor little lassie! How much there is in her that is good and true! That was not her to-night.



Round to the main entrance.

The sight of him with his wife maddened her, but she has grown calmer now."

He went down to the thickly draped doorway leading into the stalls, and stood thoughtfully gazing at the finale of the piece. Braetoun and his wife were still in their box, standing. Murray had left them just before the curtain began to fall amidst a storm of plaudits.

He forced his way to her side.

Then, as the applause was thundered forth, he saw Braetoun hurry his wife out of the box.

"That's right," muttered Daines. "Wise of you to get away. She won't meet them now. Good thing I was with her; it did calm her down. Poor girl, what a crucial position! I don't wonder at her fit of jealous rage. She must be beginning to feel guided a little by what I say. What a burlesque life is, she said. Poor little lassie! it is sometimes."

And all the while there were calls for the company, the throwing of bouquets, and Daines tried to see whether Lucy threw hers on to the stage as a compliment to old friends.

A large one did fall from overhead which seemed to be hers; but he had thought so much of her when in that box that he had paid little heed to the flowers, or he would have known that it was not—in fact, Lucy had left her box before the Braetouns

"Author! Author!" rang out, amidst a tremendous burst of plaudits, and that gentleman in black came forward to make his bow, just as someone behind pressed Daines' arm.

"Let me pass," said a familiar voice; "I have left my overcoat in the stall."

"One moment," said Daines, "or Jerdyne will be off. Let's give him a help. By Jove, how my hands smart!"

He thrust the Gibus under his arm, and raised his hands to clap.

"What's the matter with your gloves?" said Murray in a sharp whisper.

"Eh, matter?—why, they're all black!"

"Black! They're burning, man! What have you been doing? Where have you been? Why, it's some acid—vitriol!"

Daines turned upon him with a look of horror on his ghastly face, as the people were crowding out into the lobby, then turned and tried to rush upstairs, with a strange singing in his ears.

Lucy's words of hate—her rage against those who had been seated before her—the bottle she had dropped, and which he had raised to replace the stopper—scent? There was no odour.

"And I left her half mad like that! She cheated me! Great heavens, if they meet! What is she going to do?"

As he strove to get up into the vestibule the answer came in a vision of horror, in which he saw Olive, Lady Braetoun, the bright, girlish young wife, in her diamonds, leaning proudly on her husband's arm, and Lucy, his cast-off mistress, waiting somewhere for him in the crowd at the top of the stairs—that crowd so rapidly increasing that he could hardly stir—and, half hysterical with horror, he felt as if he could shriek aloud.

"Steady, sir, please. It is of no use to crowd," said a gentleman sternly, as Daines strove to force his way along. "Ladies, sir, ladies! Stop: you shall not pass like that."

"For heaven's sake, let me go—I must—it is a case of life and death," panted Daines, and he was allowed to pass, but the difficulties increased, and as he strove to get to the principal entrance he was forced into the stream passing to one of the extra exits, opened only at the close of the performance. This would, he knew, take him into one of the side streets some distance from the front, but there was no help for it, and trembling with excitement, his head completely in a whirl, he had all he could do to get out. This achieved, he was in another crowd, and ran round to the main entrance, from which the principal stream of people was pouring out.

Everyone seemed to be fighting against him. The great staircase was blocked by those descending, and the sides thronged with servants on the watch for their people, many of whom were hanging back till their carriages were brought up, and the perspiration streamed down Daines' face as he strove to mount.

At the first broad landing the throng was so thick above him, that he felt certain that the people were gathered round the scene of a terrible catastrophe, and his heart nearly stood still.

At last he caught sight of her at the top of the staircase on his left. She was close against the wall, with a police officer by her side.

Cyrus Daines' brain was pretty active, though his body was approaching the state of utter exhaustion, as he mounted the last few stairs. He could see Lucy's face now, apparently with the features set in solid despair, and her eyes fixed and staring over his head down towards the door.

"Too late," he muttered, and without heeding the people about her, he forced his way to her side.

KEY TO JUMBLED STORY NO. 6.]

THE PERFECT LOVE OF A GOOD WOMAN.

"OUR love is perfect, if ever love was," the man of our story would say to the girl a hundred times. She would nestle closer to him, and he would take her in his arms, and the love would shine from her eyes. They had been very happy, these two, but now the Great Wheel of Fate had turned its ugly side towards them, and they must part. The man was to go away to the great land across the water, there to earn fame and wealth, and to make a home for his love. She was to stay behind and wait for him.

And now their last day together had come. They left their dingy lodgings early in the morning, and walking to the station, they took a train away from the Great Black City, down into the green country. It was a lovely day early in July; the sun was shining brightly down from a cloudless sky, as they left the little way-side station, and went to the fields. They walked on the newly-cut, sun-browned hay. They turned it over with their feet, and a sweet scent came up from the fresh, green grass beneath.

They did not say much; only the man's face was very pale, and every now and again the tears sprang into the girl's eyes. Occasionally their hands would seek each other in sympathy, and then the man would take the girl's soft fingers in his own great, strong ones and gently stroke and fondle them.

The world seemed very happy that day. The sun was shining so brightly, the birds sang so merrily, and whistled to each other in the trees, while the swallows flew about in graceful curves, twittering playfully. In the next field a carter was calling to his horses as they pulled at the rake, while the regular "click" of the machine, as the hay dropped down in bundles from it, came floating over the hedge.

Thus they wandered about the live-long morning in the sweet-scented meadows. Then, when they grew tired, they turned aside into a wooded, green-grassed glen, where the tall pines grew straight out from the soft soil, and where rocks were to be found, and where a gurgling stream went splashing down at the foot of the little valley. Here they found a shady resting place, and unstrapping the small luncheon basket that they had brought, they spread out their feast, and made a pretence of eating. They uncorked a small bottle of champagne, and with this they each pledged the health of the other, for joy, and happiness, and good luck.

Afterwards they washed the plates in the stream, and the girl packed up. The man stood above her, looking down on the worn-out little hat that he loved so well, on the shabby coat and the faded skirt, and on the little black shoes and stockings which tried so hard to look bright and new. The girl knew that his loving, earnest glance was resting upon her, and there was a flush on her cheeks, and tears in her eyes as she gazed up at the sad, handsome face above her.

When the packing was finished they sat down together again, and there, beneath the waving trees, by the splashing stream, they made their vows. They whispered sweet words to each other, and talked of the future. But these things are not for other ears.

So the man went away.

Five years later he wrote this letter:

"MY DARLING LITTLE GIRL,—All is ready, everything is prepared for you, come out to me at once. At last I shall meet you again. Every moment of the past five years I have yearned for this time. Sleeping and waking I have thought of nothing but you. And now the time has come. I only want you—I would to heaven that I could have written before. Three weeks ago I was starving—I had not a penny in the world. But this is a wonderful land, and my old luck came back to me, and then, as they say out here, 'I struck it rich.' So come out to me, at once, my darling, I will tell you all when I see you. I cannot write much now. Do you remember when we worked together in that dingy warehouse. How sad it all was, and yet, even then, we were very happy. But we shall be a thousand times happier now, after these five long years of weary waiting.—Your own Boy."

P.S.—Notes inclosed.

The girl was sitting alone in a little room at the top of a big tenement building when the postman brought her this letter. She opened it eagerly, and the notes fluttered down on the floor. Putting the letter on one side, she stooped hastily down to collect them. She counted them up, and then she kissed the thin pieces of paper, and, going to the door, called loudly for her landlady. She paid her bill, and, telling the good woman that she might keep the few belongings that she left behind her, she went hastily down the steps, and hailing a cab, drove rapidly away from the slums, and presently sprang out at the door of a fashionable costumiers. Here she ordered an extravagant outfit. After that she drove to an hotel, and it was not until she sank down in an easy chair, after having finished a sumptuous lunch, that she thought of her lover's letter. She read it through, and then put it lightly on one side.

"Hasty boy," she said, "how eager he his."

Looking up the steamers, she found that there was one which left for America the next day. She turned over the page, and settled to take a boat which went three days later.

"I must enjoy myself here, now that I have the chance," she said to herself.

Her lover on the other side of the Atlantic watched impatiently every liner that came in. One day, when he was at his post as usual, his eye was attracted by the magnificent dress which a woman, who was standing near, was wearing. Suddenly he started eagerly forward—how well he knew every line of that face and figure. It was absurd of him to have supposed that she would have come out in the little worn hat, and the shabby coat.

At that moment the girl turned round. Her eyes met his but she did not appear to notice him. The man restrained himself, and then the girl, in all her finery, swept past him. He followed slowly, with a strange sinking at his heart, and presently saw her enter a carriage.

He motioned the driver to stop, and then with renewed hope, and with a smile on his face, he sprang on the step and stood before her.

The girl looked at him for a moment, and then drew back, and called to the driver to proceed.

"It is something like him," she was saying to herself, "but it is not the same man. My boy was tall and clean shaven and straight as an arrow. Bah! I could never love a man like that. How rugged looking he was!"

MR. ASHTON'S - - - - SECOND SERMON.

Her bold, black eyes stared at him as he went by the open bar-room door. She stood on the threshold, and Mr. Ashton flushed at her smile as he passed. She had long since ceased to blush, others might do it for her, but she was in no wise ashamed of her appearance. Strangely out of place she looked in the garish light, laughing and joking with the rough men near her. Such a girlish embodiment of the vice he was seeking the young minister was not prepared to behold. The heavy-footed, coarse-faced men, smoking strong-smelling pipes and sickening cigars, the imitation dandies, with swaggering gait and flaring neckties, they seemed to belong to the vicious place. But the girl, with her handsome face, plump arms and shoulders, bare as if she were in a ballroom, and her scanty pink dress barely reaching to her knees, she was startlingly incongruous. So young, so pretty, so hardened, going down so swiftly to the gates of hell! Ah, it was pitiful.

The Rev. Edward Ashton sighed compassionately as he went into the hall adjoining the bar-room. A few lamps ranged along the walls shone dully through a blue haze of tobacco smoke. Long, wooden settees covered the floor, which was dirty and uncarpeted. It was Saturday night, and a larger number than usual of men and youths lounged upon the seats or gathered in groups about the hall, across the rear end of which extended a stage, with footlights and curtain. A low, dingy-white gallery, connecting with the stage and running half-way round the room, was divided into a dozen or more little stalls, called "wine-rooms." In them, certain moneyed and reckless patrons of the place could sit at their ease while drinking and viewing the stage and scene below, or they could, with curtains, screen themselves completely from the public gaze, as they preferred.

His first sermon, delivered the Sunday before, had made a profound impression. It had set all the better portion of the community to talking about this plague spot. The Mirror printed the sermon in full, with warm editorial indorsement. It applauded his earnest, fiery declaration that he would not, could not, discuss dogmas and creeds living or dead, till he had done his best to start a crusade against the pestilential sin at their very doors. Until this foul snare—which was set before their eyes openly, but into which even the boys from his Sunday-school were blindly walking—until this was destroyed, there was no higher or holier duty to perform, no more vital theme to dwell upon. It was a strong stirring blast from a mail-clad warrior, who did not seek in distant lands for the foe in his own house.

With the crusading spirit strong within him, Mr. Ashton, in the midst of his preparation of his second sermon, determined to slip out of his study quietly and see the monster of vice with his own eyes. Then, returning with its hideous visage still fresh in mind, he could vividly describe it on the morrow.

So, taking a seat well up to the stage, for he was rather near-sighted, he looked about him. It could scarcely be pharisaical, he thought, with a shudder of disgust, to thank the Lord that he was not as some other men were—such as those around him. What enjoyment could they get out of such repulsive places? The foul air was hot and nauseating. Already he felt slightly feverish, and his head was beginning to throb. There was none of the glitter and glare which he had expected to find. But, of course, it was early yet; he would wait as best he could for the curtain to rise.

The whining of a fiddle, followed by the clamour of a small orchestra, interrupted his thoughts, and presently up went the lights and the curtain. It was a variety performance, somewhat above the average. Mr. Ashton was forced to confess to himself that the stage performance was a deal more innocent than the surroundings. To be sure, some of the actresses appeared in tights, and all of them wore abbreviated skirts, but so, he knew, did actresses occasionally in theatres and opera-houses of the higher respectability. Stamp out the bar and wine-rooms, and there would be nothing so very debasing about the resort he decided. And after that he made no more mental memoranda. For upon the stage came one who instantly caught and held his serious, short-sighted eyes as none had done before. He leant forward breathlessly, his heart beating like a sledge-hammer, a scarlet line on either cheek. The voluptuous form, so freely displayed, did not affect him in the least, but the face—the face! he could see nothing else.

It thrilled him with a nameless ecstasy, the arch glance from the sparkling eyes, the pouting red lips, the curves of chin and cheek guiltless of paint, it was to him no gaudy dancer, but a living picture, suddenly advancing from out of a hidden nook of a half-forgotten time. Who—who was she? Of whom did she so vividly remind him? He caught up his flimsy programme: "Belle la Reine, the famous Queen of the variety stage." It was a lie. She was not a creature of that sort. Did she look at him then? Did she know him, though he could not recognise her? His hands grew moist as he twisted the programme round them nervously. She sang to him alone, of that he was positive, and if he could have seen himself as she saw him, his clear-cut intellectual face standing out in sharp contrast to the heavy features around him, he might not have wondered that she looked at him as she did.

Her dancing, though graceful, annoyed him; her songs he did not hear, except one that told of bygone love, that stirred him strangely. She seemed to talk to him with her eyes, and held him spellbound. But it could not last for ever. She vanished the way she had come, and with a choking gasp he realised that she was gone. For him the lights were out, the performance ended. He sat dazed for a few minutes, and then, grasping his hat, was about to leave his seat, having seen much more than he came to see, when a boy touched his elbow and handed him a slip of paper. Seeming intuitively to know what it meant, he unfolded the note and read at a glance:

"An old friend would like to see you. Follow the boy."

He was comparatively a stranger in the city, probably nobody in the hall knew him. But he did not stop to reason. Certainly he could not be blamed for following the boy to see an old friend. He had no thought of turning back even when his small guide led him into the low gallery, by way of the side-door near the stage. Before he fully realised where he was, he stood in one of the dimly-lit wine-rooms, alone with the queen of the variety stage. She sat with her back to the audience-room below, between which and her snowy shoulders was a dingy curtain. Still arrayed in her scanty dancing attire, her dainty, silvery shoes elevated to the edge of a round table upon which were bottles and glasses, she coolly surveyed him.

"You wished to see me?" he said hesitatingly, advancing a step.

"Certainly," she replied, taking her feet off the table and rising; "but I don't want to see you as white as a ghost. What is the matter?"

"It is the foul air below. I am not used to it, and I have had a few dizzy spells lately," he murmured unsteadily, leaning on the table as, for an instant, even she seemed blurred and far-away looking.

She came to him at once, took his hat from his nerveless hand, and ran her cool fingers soothingly over his aching forehead.

"Here, down with this and you'll feel better," she said, pouring out some liquor from one of the bottles. He recoiled with a shudder, put the glass from his lips, and stepped back.

"You mistake," he said gravely; "I am not a frequenter of this place—I am a clergyman."

"As if I didn't know you," she laughed gaily; "and to think you don't know me! Don't you really recognise me? Come, look at me, once, good and hard, and see if I am not an old friend."

She poised airily before him, and then, as he still seemed puzzled, she said softly:

"Ned!"

A flame of red shot across the Rev. Edward Ashton's pallid face.

"Olive! Olive Faveur! My God! is it you?" he whispered, and sank into a chair by the table, staring at her dumbly, she still smiling. The minister was a young man, but his heart had once been wrung by this same fair woman. No, not the same. That was years ago, and she was then not as she must be now. Equally enthralling she had been to him then, though! and most terribly had she disappointed both him and all her friends. She it was who had turned his life-course. In the bitterness of his sorrow over her mad conduct he had set his face heavenward. And he had not known her that night till then!

There is an excellent story by Mr. George Griffith just commenced in "Pearson's Weekly." It is entitled, "Briton or Boer?" and deals with the fight for supremacy in South Africa.

She saw that he was profoundly moved, but she did not know how fiercely he was trying to crush back the feeling which burnt in his eyes as he looked at her.

Perching on the table, she caught hold of his hand and began to talk to him of old times. But he did not listen to her. He was conscious of the squealing of the orchestra violins, the stamping of heavy feet, and the tomfoolery upon the stage. In the adjoining stall he heard a drunken man trying to sing a ribald song with a woman, who was laughing at the maudlin attempt. Presently, though soft fingers held his own and a fascinating face was close to his, though satiny shoulders were so near him—presently he would rise and put Satan from him.

But he could not do it instantly. She was so frankly joyous, so merrily bewitching, not a repellent line from her laughing eyes to the tiny shoes whose heels she was knocking together as she sat before him. With an inward wrench he shut his eyes, and was about to stand erect and forbidding, when he was shocked by a chuckling laugh behind him. Withdrawing his hand from hers, as if from the touch of fire, he turned his head with a guilty flush. A man in a flaxen wig and comedian's stage-garb, stood in the curtained doorway.

"I know that they're guilty; but oh, they're so sly!" laughed the intruder, repeating a line of a topical song he had just been singing on the stage, and bowing low, he disappeared.

Mr. Ashton reached for his hat, the flush dying out of his face and leaving it very pale. But she put out her hand restrainingly, a quick glitter of anger melting to tenderness in her marvellously expressive eyes.

"It's only Jack," she said hastily; "don't mind him nor his impertinence."

Digitized by Google

"Jack?" questioned Mr. Ashton hoarsely, wavering again under her glance.

"Yes," she said carelessly; "but he never troubles me. I do as I please in all things. You needn't think of retreating now, though. He has caught you, fairly or unfairly. If you went now he would be sure to have it in the morning papers, and make a few shillings out of the scandal, don't you see. But if you will bide a wee, and be sociable and sensible, I'll answer for it that not a whisper from him gets to the sensitive ears of your goody-goody friends."

Each word sank like burning acid deep into the young minister's heart. His face grew ghastly, and the little red-curtained stall swam round and round, the bright creature leaning towards him seemed to be receding in a luminous mist.

"Olive, Olive!" he gasped, reaching out wildly towards her.

"My poor old puritan Ned," she said softly, sinking on her knees before him; "let this and me cheer you. For once forget everything but that you and I are here; neither of us will ever be here again, and never again, perhaps, will be together. Drown care and enjoy yourself, Ned, dear old boy."

She lifted the glass he had once rejected to his lips. He, this time, clutched it, and, though it was not wine, but a far stronger liquor, he drank it to the last drops as if it were cooling water.

* * * * *

In the grey of the Sunday morning, while the town was still slumbering, a tall, black-coated priestly figure stole homeward like a belated night-thief. Snow had fallen during the darkness, and the wide street of the town was smooth and trackless, white and soft as wool beneath his hurrying feet. His footprints, showing a black trail behind him on the stones, seemed to his feverish eyes to mark the passage of a foul thing over the dazzling purity, each step defiling the spotless way. Reaching his residence, he let himself in with his latch-key, and, in another minute, noiseless as a burglar, he was hidden in his study.

Brazen bells clanged out in the crisp wintry air, calling to church the just and the unjust, earthly saints and human sinners. The broad streets, housetops, and fences gleamed in the sun, each evenly incrusted with frozen jewels by the gentle snowfall. The ringing laughter of boys snowballing one another by the kerb-stones, mingled with the music of the bells.

Ladies in furs and silks, gentlemen in overcoats and broadcloth, followed the soft-footed ushers up the richly-carpeted aisles to the luxurious pews. Flowers rare and costly were before the pulpit, and added to their fragrance were the delicate perfumes from numerous fairer roses in the shape of the city's most beautiful daughters. The pews were filled to the last one. It was a great congregation—the greatest the church had ever held. So the reporter decided, as he sharpened his pencils and noted the prominent men present, from the mayor down.

The fame of the young minister's eloquence had gathered together all of the city's leaders to listen to his second sermon. But he was late in appearing. Minute after minute went by, the organ ceased to sound and then began again. The official chief of the church's laymen grew uneasy. It would be a great pity to disappoint such a splendid assembly by an untimely sick-headache. He did not know that the young minister might even then be working at his sermon, with flaming eyes and trembling fingers, trying to make up for lost time. But he did know that the Rev. Mr. Ashton had not looked over strong. Finally, he slipped into his overcoat and went out in search of the tardy preacher. It was but a few steps to the pastor's residence.

"Mr. Ashton, I think, is still in his study," said the housekeeper; "I have not seen him this morning."

"But it is late," protested the churchman in soft indignation at such thoughtlessness. Eloquence was not punctuality, and there were the mayor and the highest people in the city kept waiting. He tapped sharply at the study-door, then he called and shook the knob. Then, finding the door locked, and being assured by the now alarmed housekeeper that the minister must be there, he, being a strong man, and by this time excited, burst the lock and flung open the door.

In the chilly study, darkened by the drawn curtains at the windows, nothing but cold ashes in the grate, the minister lay sleeping his last sleep. Drawn up to his writing-table upon a lounge was extended his black-coated form. The upturned face, though rigid in death, yet showed lingering upon the white lips a tender smile, as if in the solemn repose he had been visited by a pleasant dream. A bottle labelled "chloral" stood upon the table. The churchman groaned in horror:

"He must have felt nervous and taken an overdose! He has been dead for hours."

Beneath the bottle lay two scraps of paper, upon one was pencilled:

"An old friend would like to see you. Follow the boy."

Upon the other, a trembling scrawl, the pencil still beside it:

"Let him that thinketh he standeth, take heed lest he fall."

JUMBLED STORY. No. 9.]

INSIDE OF THE FARM.

To look at him and Miss Erskine, you would have settled down on him. He was no longer impatient, and instead of being the worst, had developed into the best conspirator.

Johnson blew a big cloud of tobacco smoke.

"I tell you, Arnold, you are making an ass of her. Miss Ralston is a fine girl, old fellow, but a hard party to a burglary, or hatching conspiracy against the development of a pet case.

"Sit down, old man," said the other; "I do believe it is clear that you showed your hand too soon. The success of the whole business will be in your chucking something like a groan, "but what can I do? If I only have no scruples about employing artifices, why should your cousin, Miss Erskine, promised to marry me yourself."

"You need not say any more about it," said Arnold, oblivious to the fact that there is a Miss Ralston in the hat.

"The girl doesn't want me, Johnson, that's clear."

"I do," said Johnson, wringing his hand with a vigour which his friend had suddenly and unexpectedly played tennis together, and were generally inseparable. It will be very easy to see from the way Miss Ralston said they were friends of very long standing. His scheme had told him that she had been told all about throwing away his half-smoked cigar and picking up his expression of his face.

On the evening of Miss Erskine's arrival, he dressed Johnson, in the drawing-room, showed no signs of that infernal reserve of yours to the dogs. You must with the keen eye of a doctor observing the details and conscious participation, though the proposer of the idea of a man proposing to a woman he has known only to serve as a tool in this way?" asked Arnold dubiously. of affairs."

"Oh, it is very simple," said Johnson; "and I shall know how the plot had progressed during his absence.

"There is no use," said Arnold wearily; "and, besides, that I have an idea. I'm going to do you a good turn. Leave it to me to find out for you what is the exact state that made the other wince; "and I hope she won't be into the spirit of the thing. But remember this, the triumph was increased, though it was dashed by just a night, but I can't, and that's the end of it. Why would we?"

All Arnold's old mopishness has flown away, too. I stay?"

"I know I am," said the individual addressed, with little remorse, as he saw Miss Ralston watching them leave it in my hands. You shall see how she will enter this afternoon."

With many misgivings, Arnold consented to be a party with a peculiar look in her eyes.

But the young girl who was sitting beside Mrs. Johnson felt that his plot was going to be a success, surprised, though she tried to hide it, when told that Arnold was the first person he saw as he descended from the situation and had given her promise of assistance.

"It is not clear that the girl does not want you, but you'll make a mess of it. What is your plan?"

But Mrs. Johnson said nothing.

"Splendidly," said Arnold; "you shall be the first to be as light as air, and go about with her as if quite angry with me for planning the deception we played on the train.

"But what will the other girl say? Will she consent to-day."

Finally, she asked him how long Arnold and Providence had cut him out for a diplomatist.

Among those who came in later was Miss Ralston. The hero and substituted heroine walked together, away?" said he, with a fine professional interest.

"We won't have to keep it up much longer," said Mr. State.

He knew that there was something wrong from the place."

Early next week he had to go up to town. At the end Miss Erskine had known each other. She seemed developed.

Mr. Johnson gave her an opportunity of talking to himself with special care and went up to the house. He was prepared to be very ill at ease with his fellow-girl in the world, and would do anything for me. Just serves her right to get this lesson."

During the next week the comedy progressed gaily. The consciousness of coming success seemed to have them passing the place where the lady sat for whose bow stiffly.

"Well how have things been going while I was to the deception. He felt as if he were a prospective company in the world.

Every sign given by the person deceived he watched when he saw Arnold take no more notice of her than to not make a mess of it. I shall supply her with a rival.

He wondered a little at the gift for realistic acting takes it how you really stand in her eyes. Since women is coming down to stay with us. She is the dearest one to manage."

Johnson one day told his wife that he believed him, but she made no allusion to the other couple for a three days!"

"Oh, I'll make that square. My cousin, Miss Erskine, had the courage I would clear out of Brighton this very long time.

"Miss Ralston!" said Arnold; "why, my dear boy, of three days he came back. He was quite curious to congratulate me, old man. It was all settled Johnson; "that is gloriously well acted."

"She does care for him," he said to himself; "but it they had met for the first time that day.

One evening on the pier, Mr. and Mrs. Johnson was benefit the play was arranged.

THE YOUNG RECRUIT.

From the Russian of W. Korolenko.

It was Easter Eve, 187—.

For some hours it had been dark. Still warm from the heat of the day, caressed by a faint breeze, the earth exhaled the sunlight it had absorbed in a light mist through which the rays of myriads of stars shone fitfully.

All was quiet in the little town pending the hour of the Easter dawn which the bells of the Cathedral would announce. But, hushed as the town was, it did not sleep, and, in spite of the darkness which reigned everywhere, and of the deserted streets, one became conscious of a feeling of expectancy, of some impending event for which all were waiting. From time to time a workman, who had been detained to finish some preparation for the morrow's festival, would pass on his homeward way, then all would be still again.

The moon had not yet risen and the little town was lying in the shadow of a hill crowned by a large and gloomy building, from each angle of which there rose a tower, its pointed roof standing out dimly against the sky.

Presently, from the cathedral belfry, a single bell rang out upon the night air. And, in a moment, every church took up the signal, warning the inhabitants of the near approach of the hour all were awaiting.

* * * * *

On the hill the gloomy door of the prison opened, and a half-company of soldiers marched out to relieve the sentries.

They made the circle of the walls, stopping here and there. The group halted at each post, and a single form detached itself from the black mass, its place being taken by another shape which advanced towards the relief out of the blackness of the night. Then the soldiers resumed their march.

On the western face a young recruit took up his post. His movements, still clumsy and undecided, proclaimed the newly-conscripted rustic, and his face bore an expression of strained attention which betrayed his inexperience.

He turned his face to the wall and grounded his rifle, then with a half-turn brought himself shoulder to shoulder with the man he was relieving. The latter repeated his orders.

"From one angle to the other—be on your guard," he murmured hurriedly.

The recruit listened with attention; over his face there flitted a shade of melancholy.

"Understand?" asked the corporal of the guard.

"Yes."

"Well, keep your eyes open. It's nothing to be nervous about, Fadéiff," he added, "goodness! man, you're not a woman!"

The relief resumed its march and disappeared behind the angle of the tower. The new sentry, rifle on shoulder, slowly paced the length of his beat.

* * * * *

As the last sound of the bell died away the stir of life began to show itself inside the prison. The doors of the cells were opened and the prisoners, each clad in his khalate, the fatal club-shaped piece of coloured cloth, corresponding to the English broad-arrow, sewn on to the middle of his back, came out one by one, forming long processions in the corridors. Two by two they passed into the prison church and, turning right and left, filled two inclosures guarded by strong and high palisades. Save the cells in the four corner towers the prison proper was now empty, excepting that in one of the common rooms a sick man was left lying on his plank-bed. The warder, warned of his sudden illness, came to examine him.

"Ivanoff! do you hear me, Ivanoff?" he called.

The prisoner did not stir. He murmured some unintelligible words in a muffled voice, moving his swollen, parched lips with effort.

"To the infirmary to-morrow," the warder ordered.

He left the room, leaving the watchman he had brought with him at the door. The latter scrutinised the invalid closely. "Ah!" he muttered, nodding slowly. "Prison life is nearly over for you, I fancy."

Decidedly there was nothing to be done, no object to be gained by remaining. He went to the door of the church, leaving the prisoner alone, and followed the service attentively, crossing himself and bowing every moment.

The wanderings of the delirious convict alone broke the silence of the deserted room. He was a man of middle age, strong and muscular. Fate had treated him unkindly; he had escaped from imprisonment in Siberia, braving a thousand dangers in crossing the Steppes, impelled by one motive, an incurable home-sickness. To see his native village, his own people once more, were it only for a month, a day, an hour—then, come what might.

But within a hundred versts of home, having accomplished so much of his perilous journey, he was re-captured and thrown into the prison where he now lay, apparently dying. He ceased to wander, his eyes opened, and his breathing became normal. Presently he sat up, staring straight in front of him, and a gleam of reason flashed across his face. He saw before him—this convict imprisoned for life—an open door!

With a single bound he was in the corridor. Some one left the church, holding the door ajar for a moment, and the sound of chanting, softened by the distance, fell upon his ear. He thought of the church in his native village, overshadowed by the rustling branches of the great pines, filled with old friends of his youth; how often at this season he had heard the same chant there!

* * * * *

The young recruit, armed with his rifle, paced his beat. Before him, as far as the eye could reach, stretched the vast plain, as yet hardly clear of the winter's snow. A soft breeze blew, the long grass of last year bending and rustling under it.

The sentry halted, his back to the wall, and letting the butt of his rifle slip to the ground, he placed his hands on the muzzle, resting his head on them. He no longer asked himself why he was there this Easter Eve, gazing out over the deserted plain. In all respects he was still a simple peasant, not grasping many things familiar enough to soldiers as a rule. It was so short a time since he was free, master of his own welfare, his own fields, his own labour. And now some instinctive fear, inexplicable, motiveless, pursued his every step, breaking in his simple nature by sheer force of stern discipline.

He, too, saw his village; the same soft breeze blew there, the church was lighted up, and above it, also, rose the great, rustling pine trees.

Just above where he was standing, a black patch appeared over the crest of the wall; it was a man's head. The fugitive scanned the plain and the dim outline of the shadowy forest which lay on the horizon. He drew a long breath of fresh night air, and, hanging by his hands, let himself drop to the ground.

* * * * *

The joyous clanging of the church bells rang out upon the air. In the prison the door of the church swung open and the long procession of convicts defiled into the courtyard. The soldier drew himself to his full height and, baring his head, prepared to cross himself. His hand raised to his forehead, he stood petrified with astonishment. The escaping prisoner had just reached the ground.

"Halt! halt!" the sentry cried, raising his rifle.

The hidden fear which had previously weighed upon him like a nightmare took form and fled. "Duty." "Responsibility." The words passed like lightning through his brain. He raised his rifle to his shoulder and covered the fugitive, but before firing he closed his eyes.

In the town now, the joyous carillons were pealing, and the prison bells still filled all the air with melody, while from the church, in waves of glorious sound came the triumphal song "Christ is risen."

On the other side of the wall, above all the music of bells and organ there rang out the sharp report of a rifle. A stifled cry, a groan, answered it immediately, and then all was silence, broken only by the echoes of the rifle's report, and the dying vibrations of the bells.

Barely Saved.

All London was flocking to the exhibition. Among all the busy pleasure-seeking crowd one person seemed to find no interest or amusement in his surroundings.

Seated on a chair in the gardens, his legs outstretched before him, his crush hat tilted over his eyes, Guy Merivale presented a picture of despair. His smart evening dress, his polished boots and fastidiously correct tie, seemed to mark him as a member of society unlikely to be troubled by lack of money. But, as a matter of fact, Guy was at this moment fingering in the recesses of his pocket the last few sovereigns he owned in the world.

A clerk in the Foreign Office, he had never found the service of his country either pleasant or profitable; and now the sudden death of an uncle had deprived him not only of a liberal allowance in the present, but also of that provision for his future which an unsigned will had contemplated.

An unusual knowledge of languages and much acquaintance with foreign countries might have served him well in his career; but he had little interest in high circles to advance his claims. The only vacant appointment offered him was that of a minor consulship on the Gold Coast of Africa.

"The Gold Coast it must be, then," sighed Guy to himself.

He had been warned that his acceptance of even this offer must be immediate.

A shilling exhibition was a cheap amusement, and he thought that among its sights and sounds he could find time for solitary reflection if not for relief from his own thought.

A girl with blue eyes and fair wavy hair was moving through the crowd in front of him, leaning on the arm of a tall, soldierly looking man, evidently her father. Her nervous glances and shrinking attitude suggested that the situation was either novel or alarming to her.

"Why, Mabel," her companion whispered to her, "you are surely not afraid of a little crush like this? It is not so bad as the carnival crowd at Florence."

"Oh, don't talk of Florence, father," she replied. "I, can never think of Italy without remembering that terrible trial, when I had to give evidence against Ferari, who stabbed our butler."

"A contemptible wretch!" said her father. "Do not think of him. Ferari was sentenced to the galleys for life; he won't trouble you any more."

The girl sighed.

"That's just what I can't help doing," she said. "I can never forget how he swore to be revenged on me wherever I went. As he was leaving the dock he turned to the crowd of villainous looking Italians who had come to give evidence for him, and cried out:

"'Ostia, remember your brother, Giulo, and remember also this white-faced, chattering English girl.'"

"Pooh! empty threats, child."

"It terrified me, though, when they muttered among themselves, and a black-bearded Italian held up his hand, and as he fixed his dark eyes on me, cried:

"'Giulo, I will remember; she shall not escape.'"

"Come, come, Mabel," said her father; "in England you need not fear an Italian Mafia. I may as well tell you that the man you thought was my secretary the other day is a detective, and is following us now. It was quite unnecessary, but it may give you an extra feeling of security."

"How dreadful, father!" exclaimed the girl, shuddering. "I always thought he was your new secretary."

"Not quite," laughed her father. "I've not been able to find one yet. The young Foreign Office gentlemen were all cuffs, collars, and red tape. I want to find some one with more character and backbone—someone I can depend on in an emergency."

Guy Merivale, who had been watching the girl with some interest, though pretty faces were no novelty to him, caught the word "dinner" as they passed. He was getting hungry himself, so he rose, and sauntering to a restaurant at the top of the garden chose a table in a retired corner. Hardly had he done so when the girl and her father entered and sat down at the next table, taking their seats with their backs towards him. As they did so the father made a signal, and a man who had been following them at a few paces distant stepped up to him.

"You can leave us for half-an-hour, Davis," he said. "You had better get some dinner for yourself."

The restaurant was almost deserted. But late as it was, Merivale did not feel inclined to move in search of other amusement. Not even the champagne could raise his spirits. He paid his bill, and, as his waiter cleared the table and disappeared, leant his head on his hands and gave himself up to his own gloomy thoughts. Had he been less abstracted he might have noticed the waiter at the next table regarding him intently.

"Basta!" he muttered to himself; "the great, drunken English pig sleeps."

At this moment Mabel's father called for his bill, and having paid it, remarked that he wanted to get a good cigar outside.

"And then," he added, "we'll go and listen to the band."

As her father left the room Mabel leant back in her chair, and through the open window near her watched the crowd as they moved in the lamplit gardens below. Humming over to herself the refrain of the music, she fell into a reverie, while queer fancies wandered through her mind, born of the spirit of the hour.

Suddenly the voice of the waiter broke in upon her meditations. Leaning over her, with his right hand on the back of her chair, he was offering her a glass of green Chartreuse upon a plate, held rather clumsily in his left hand.

"Will madame take a liqueur?" he was saying, in the soft tone peculiar to Italians.

"No, thank you," she replied shortly, impatient at being disturbed.

He bent his head rather close to hers, and there was an instant change in his voice.

"Madame will drink," he whispered; "she will also not scream nor move, else will I stab her to the heart." And through her dress she felt the sharp point of a stiletto pressed against her back.

"Has she forgotten Firenze?" he continued in a rapid concentrated whisper. "Behold Ostia Ferari!"

Another girl might have instantly screamed or fainted. Mabel felt turned to stone, as the blood ebbed cold from her heart.

There was a mist before her eyes, and a buzzing in her ears; and yet she could still hear the band playing a waltz, and she found herself thinking of the ball she was to have gone to that very night.

Slowly moving her head, she looked at the Italian with staring eyes, while her face turned white to the lips. Though his beard was gone, and his cheeks shaved clean and blue, she recognised the fierce black eyes she had seen in the court at Florence. And in those eyes she read—death.

"It is poisoned," she whispered in a faltering voice, as she gazed shrinkingly at the green, transparent liquid.

"And if it is," he answered mockingly, "it will not hurt. I would save the signora's white skin from an ugly mark—and my own neck. Quick, drink before the signor returns," he muttered, "or I will use the knife!" And she started as the sharp point of his dagger pierced her flesh.

Anything for a moment's time. Like a dove fascinated by the gaze of a serpent, she took the glass, and with her eyes fixed on his moved it to her lips.

As the rim touched them she saw a sudden spasm cross the Italian's face; a strong hand was pressing his neck, and in a moment he was hurled backwards.

Not an instant too soon. Guy Merivale at the next table had lost all thought of his pretty neighbour; but still the tune she was unconsciously humming caught his ears. Suddenly it had stopped, and the low whispers arrested his attention.

Looking up he saw the white, panic-stricken face of the girl over the waiter's shoulder; and beneath the napkin that covered his right hand as it rested on her chair he saw a bright knob, which, his Italian travels had taught him, was the hilt of a stiletto.

It was a moment for action rather than thought. Without a sound he moved his chair, till his long arm could reach the dagger, and then he threw himself on the Italian.

There was a crash of glass as the liqueur fell on the girl's dress—a hoarse maledicto as the Italian felt the stiletto torn from his grasp, and all was over.

Almost instantly her father entered the room, followed by the detective; and as the former bent over the girl with trembling lips, the latter seized the Italian.

"Neatly done, sir," he whispered to Merivale. "I will take good care of him. I know him now; the Italian police want him for a worse job than this. I will see that they get him."

The Italian was instantly hurried out of a side door by the manager and detective before the few occupants of the almost empty room had time to ask what was the matter.

"Your name, sir?" said the elder gentleman, turning to the younger man.

"Guy Merivale," he replied.

"Mr. Merivale, I owe you a thousand thanks;" and then he added tremblingly, "God bless you, sir; she is my only daughter."

Then, as he grasped his hand, he said:

"You will know my name, though we have never met. I think an application from you was handed to me on my return to the Foreign Office to-day. I am more than glad to owe this service to your father's son."

Drawing the young man aside, he continued:

"I see you have been appointed to the Gold Coast. I presume that you have no particular preference for that climate?"

"I can't say that I have," said Merivale, smiling; "but my letter will have explained. I have no choice."

"Then, Mr. Merivale, I will give you one. I heard to-night of your gifts as a linguist, and I have learned your coolness and courage. I have just been appointed Minister to one of the Balkan States. If you will accept the post of attaché to the legation and the duties of my private secretary, you will confer a personal favour on me. Come, no thanks, it is a bargain," he added, as Guy tried to express his gratitude; "and now let my daughter try and thank you."

Turning to the girl as she rose from her chair with swimming eyes and quivering lips, he said:

"Mabel, let me introduce to you Mr. Guy Merivale. I have found in him the son of an old friend—a gallant gentleman—and my new secretary."

PAUPER BLUE BLOOD

BY WINIFRED GRAHAM.

Author of "When the Birds Begin to Sing," "Through the Valley," "Six First-class Passengers," etc., etc.

CHARACTERS.

SEFTON RAVENSCROFT.—Son of the late Sir Reginald Ravenscroft and a pauper, owing to his father's failure.

GEORGINA PLUFF.—A governess in the family until Sir Reginald's death, when she intimidates Sefton into marrying her.

JOHN PLUFF.—A wealthy retired grocer, and cousin to Georgina Pluff (Lady Ravenscroft). In return for attendance at his dinners and At Homes, he supplies her with money.

MRS. RATHBONE.—A widow of whom John Pluff is rather fond, to the disgust of Georgina, who anticipates becoming his sole heiress.

LADY NORAH CANNINGTON.—In love with Sefton but who is compelled by her father to break off the engagement, owing to the former's poverty, and marry the Duke of Malvern.

CHAPTER XVIII.

THE ILLNESS OF MR. PLUFF.

THE pool was deep, but a moment later an apparition past recognition struck out for the bank, while Mr. Pluff followed bewildered.

Mrs. Rathbone on finding her feet, pointed pleadingly to something that was floating down the stream.

"Oh! save it! save it!" she implored.

"What?" asked Mr. Pluff, wading towards her in his dripping flannels, his eyes too full of water to notice the pseudo widow's short grey curls.

"My wig. For mercy's sake get it back. Oh! you foolish old man!" as John gaped stupidly.

Then the embarrassing situation gradually crept over his shocked senses. Mrs. Rathbone was false to the very locks that had first fascinated him. Georgina was right, and that little red speck now almost out of sight—— But his train of thought suddenly took more practical form, as he saw the dejected woman sink in weeping anguish upon a mossy boulder.

Seizing a canoe paddle which had drifted ashore, he ran along the bank till he reached the tree beneath which they had moored. The wig caught in a low bough, and lay within easy reach of the paddle.

A moment later, Mr. Pluff retraced his steps sadly, bearing the last remnant of his shattered illusion.

Mr. Pluff retraced his steps sadly.

How poor a thing it seemed now, that bedraggled mass of wet, damp hair.

Mrs. Rathbone rose to meet him, her face strangely altered by the washing away of delicate pink powder, the revelation of wrinkles hitherto concealed.

She snatched the wig almost angrily from him, without a word of thanks for its rescue, and forced it in a sodden, unbecoming mass upon her head.

Her dress hung in limp ungainly folds about her figure, she was shivering and frightened, unnerved by the alarming possibility of having to return without her Titian headgear.

"We'd better get home and shift as fast as we can," said Mr. Pluff; "the canoe can't drift farther than the stepping stones, and I'll pay the lad for the damage."

He offered Mrs. Rathbone his arm mechanically, but she refused it, and marched ahead with her nose tilted in the air, and the drops from her dishevelled curls trickling down her collar.

Mr. Pluff paused to shake the sand out of his shoes, but save an occasional grumble for the discomfort he had been caused by his own clumsiness, their conversation was nil.

He walked with Mrs. Rathbone to her door, advised her to take "an 'ot bath," offering her his damp hand in parting.

She refused it however with set lips.

"Ain't you going to say good-bye? Let us part friends, eh, Mrs. R.?"

"I shall not forget or forgive your cruel words to me to-day, unless you will retract them, Mr. Pluff."

"I say what I mean, and I stick to it," he answered.

"I shall leave early to-morrow," replied Mrs. Rathbone. "But I cannot refrain from remarking that I am bitterly disappointed in you, my once friend!"

"You are disappointed! Well, that's funny! I thought the complaining would be all on my side. I'm the one that's been 'umbugged, remember!"

"You have shaken my faith in mankind, Mr. Pluff," she said, as a parting shaft as she turned away.

"And I'll be blessed if I ever believe in a woman again," he muttered to himself, walking back in a very different mood to the one in which he had started out.

Georgina met him in the garden. She flung up her hands, and rushed towards him.

"Oh! John, what has happened?"

"Well, it speaks for itself!" he replied, shaking his wet coat. "We've had a regular upset this afternoon all round. Georgina, my dear, kiss me!"

The tone in which he demanded this embrace chilled Lady Ravenscroft.

The worst had come, and she must congratulate him.

She obeyed half-heartedly. He did not look a prepossessing figure to caress.

"I'm well out of it, Georgie, my girl," he muttered wiping away the moisture round his eyes.

"Yes, you might have been drowned. I suppose you saved Mrs. Rathbone's life, and that is how it came to a climax."

"Lor, no! Mrs. R. swam like a fish. But oh, it was a climax!"

"And—and—you—are—going—to—marry—her?"

Georgina gasped the question faintly. Her head reeled.

"Marry Mrs. Rathbone?"

His voice vibrated with rage.

"No, my eyes have been opened, and we've parted for ever."

Lady Ravenscroft flung her arms about John Pluff's stout shoulders, and hugged him in regular earnest. Her feelings were too great for words.

"Yes," he continued, "you were right from the first, you are always correct, Georgina, and I ought to have known, and been guided by your clever diagnosis of character. I'll stick to you, my lass, for the future, and not stray after false goddesses! The fact is, dearie, you're the only one I can trust, and, thank God, there are exceptions to every rule, but for the majority I say women are a dashed set of impostors, and I've done with them!"

"You dear old darling!" she cried joyfully; "I can't tell you how relieved I am that you are saved from Mrs. Rathbone. I always knew her to be untrustworthy — a sheep in wolf's clothing. Why, her very hair advertised the fact. But do tell me what she has done!"

"No, no, Georgie, I draw the line at that. What I have learned of her was told me in confidence, and not all the cajoling in Christendom would squeeze it out of me. I shall wipe her from my life!"

He seemed to have forgotten his wet clothing, and September evenings are treacherous.

Georgina reminded him.

"You will catch your death of cold," she exclaimed. "Do go in and change."

"These things have pretty well dried on me," retorted Mr. Pluff; "but there, I'm altogether bowled over, and too darned upset to take heed of anything. Not that I'm a very pretty spectacle, should any of your fine friends come driving up to the front door. At my age I ought to 'ave known better than to go canoodling off. Pity I did not take your advice again. It's wonderful 'ow everything you say comes true."

"Oh! don't stand talking, dear Cousin John," as his teeth commenced unconsciously to chatter, "or we shall have you laid up with one of those dreadful snuffling colds in the head that are so difficult to cure. Will you put your feet in mustard and water?"

Mr. Pluff grinned.

"I don't knock up easily," he declared in his boastful tone. "There's not a haler, heartier man drawing breath, what's never took an ailment since measles in infancy and mumps at school. Maybe I'll ask you for a drink of hot grog, but blow the mustard!"

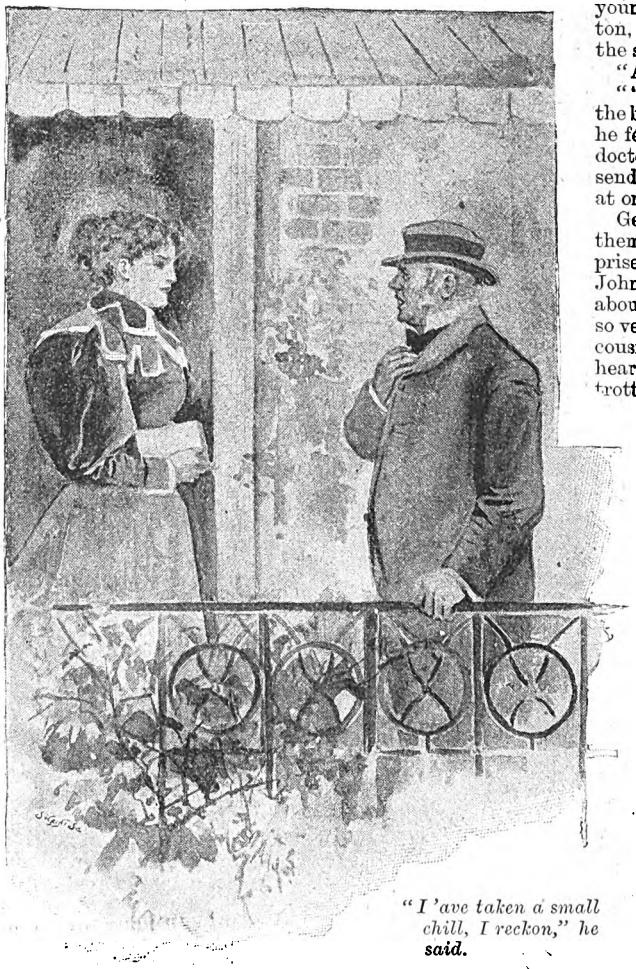
So saying he stumped away, while Georgina murmured a prayer of thanksgiving for the downfall of Mrs. Rathbone.

An hour or so later Georgina found John Pluff pacing the verandah in dry clothes, as if to keep warm through movement.

"I 'ave taken a small chill, I reckon," he said. "Suppose it was standing about jawing in them damp things. I've just been talking to your young man," indicating Sefton, who was walking towards the stables.

"And what did he say?"

"'Go to bed, Pluff, that's the best place for you.' Then he felt my pulse just like a doctor, and said he should send off for his medical man at once."



"I 'ave taken a small chill, I reckon," he said.

Georgina's eyebrows raised themselves in expressive surprise. Sefton must think John bad to trouble his head about him—Sefton who was so very slack, and disliked her cousin into the bargain. She heard the hoofs of a horse trotting down the drive, and saw that her husband was the rider.

"How do you feel?"

"Queer and skeery like. First 'ot and then cold. Think I'll take your lad's advice, and get between the sheets. Don't you worry yourself, Georgie dear. I shan't be on the sick list long."

So he went off with an effort at whistling, which soon failed.

Lady Ravenscroft noticed he helped himself upstairs by the aid of the broad banisters.

She waited for Sefton's return uneasily. She did not appreciate the bother of an illness in the house. As he reappeared on his polo pony, she noticed the doctor's dog-cart following.

"Do you really think Cousin John is ill?" she said a trifle sharply. "You seem to be making a great bother about nothing. He has gone to bed, and will be all right in the morning. John has such a wonderful constitution."

But for once Lady Ravenscroft was mistaken. The doctor seemed disinclined to make light of the matter, and called early again on the following day.

The slight chill turned into acute pneumonia, and two hospital nurses were summoned from town.

Mr. Pluff was very placid and quiet. He spoke seldom, and then it was only to murmur "thank you," for some service rendered. His helpless condition aroused Georgina's pity. She watched by the bedside, quarrelled constantly with the nurses, and really shed genuine tears of sympathy when Mr. Pluff appeared in pain.

Sefton also frequently crept into the invalid's room.

and sat at the opposite side of the bed, watching Georgina.

This action of his irritated her. It seemed as if he planted himself there for a purpose. Once she caught his eyes fixed with keen scrutiny upon her hand, as she moistened John's lips from a glass of water. The look was one of suspicion—she read its meaning only too well. Sefton esteemed her so little, that he actually thought it necessary to remain on guard beside the old man he so genuinely despised.

She flew at him in a frenzy and shook his shoulders.

"What were you thinking of in there—by the bed?" she asked fiercely, when they were alone.

Sefton did not answer.

She flew at him in a frenzy and shook his shoulders.

"You didn't think—you couldn't—that—that—I should be such a fiend? Oh! husband, for the love of Heaven, swear you never doubted me! I may be bad, but God knows I would never be guilty of robbing a human life!"

"I would not trust you," he answered calmly, and but for the look in his eyes she would never have forgiven the words.

"He does not know what he is saying," she told herself. "The doctor must see him next."

CHAPTER XIX.

Georgina Becomes Wealthy.

"I WANT to make a will," said Mr. Pluff.

The words came very feebly. "Doctor," he continued, "I think I am going to die."

There was a pathetic ring of resignation in John's tone.

Georgina was standing at the foot of the bed, with her hands on the rails; she made no sign that she had heard, only her eyes wandered instinctively to the writing table.

The nurse fetched pen and paper at her patient's request. His hand was weak and he wrote with difficulty, then motioned to the doctor and nurse to sign their names. "Put it in an envelope and seal it down," he murmured, closing his eyes.

Georgina's heart beat furiously, she staggered to her customary seat beside him, and held his hand.

"If you should see Mrs. Rathbone," he said at last, after a long pause, "tell her I forgave everything. It's not worth while bearing a grudge into the other world, eh, Georgie?"

She bowed her head.

"And Nesta Pyne," he rambled on faintly, "she's married you know. I—I would not give her a present, because she laughed, but that don't matter now, do it dear? When I'm gone, send her my gold inkstand, with—with John Pluff's compliments. You'll find a card in the ivory case."

A hot tear dropped on the sheet. It fell from Georgina's eye.

"Ravenscroft Park will be a different place," muttered the failing voice. "I've left everything to you. When little John grows up, you'll tell him about his god-pa won't you, old girl?"

"Yes, yes," whispered Georgina, her eyes suddenly scintillating, and her breath coming and going in more laboured gasps than that of the dying man. Then silence again.

She watched the calm face on the pillow reverently, yet at the same time thinking of all that the passing away of Mr. Pluff meant to the Ravenscroft family. No longer paupered blue blood, and the fortune hers, not Sefton's.

The dream was to come true—at last—at last!

An hour or two elapsed, when Mr. Pluff took a decided turn for the worse.

His mind began to wander and he complained fitfully of the wet clothes in which he said he was made to stand, and frequently re-acted his hunt after Mrs. Rathbone's wig.

"Give me the paddle, Georgina," he cried. "It's there, by the tree. Can't you see it—all wet and red? Bah! there are weeds and slime in that pool; and I'm cold, Georgie, darned cold!"

Lady Ravenscroft laid her hand on his burning forehead.

Occasionally his mind travelled back to old days, and he would talk of the shop and the customers, mentioning many names Georgina had never heard.

But finally he sank into oblivion, resting peacefully like a child asleep, his breathing growing fainter and fainter, till, with his hand still clasping Georgina's, John Pluff drifted to the Unknown.

She watched the coming of Death's Angel in silent awe, her throat parched and her fingers damp with the sweat of dread as they touched that thing of clay, now white and cold, upon the quilt. Poor limp hand! with the large diamond ring she had so often protested against, flashing below the lifeless knuckle.

A hot tear dropped on the sheet.

Both the nurses were in the room, and one led Georgina to the door.

"You shall come back presently, Lady Ravenscroft."

"It's all over," said his wife, taking his arm and drawing him indoors.

Walking slowly downstairs, she went in search of her husband. Already the servants were drawing down the blinds, and the hush of the still sleeper fell upon the house.

Sefton was crossing the lawn and thought that the sun was being shut out in this the hottest hour of the day. He did not guess that Cousin John was dead.

"It's all over," said his wife, taking his arm and drawing him indoors.

"Oh!" murmured Sir Sefton, shuddering slightly. "Is it?"

And that was all this strange couple said, but what they felt or thought no one but themselves knew. Each had shut the other out of their life, each felt the keen pang of intense loneliness, yet cherished no wish for union.

Georgina went to the nursery, and gathering her son in her arms bore him away to her own room. Here she walked to and fro, rocking the infant softly and talking to him in low excited words.

"John—Reginald," she whispered, "my own little Reggie—to-day has altered your whole future. You are the heir to a fortune now as well as a title, my precious, my sweet! Do you know what mother is saying?" straining him tighter to her heart. "You will have a great and grand career, with your namesake's money, and your grandfather Reginald's great mind. Only a very brave man kills himself when he knows that to live is to shame his illustrious name. Why," gazing in sudden surprise at the shape of the baby's brow, "you are even a little like him now. I have thought of him so often, feasted my eyes nightly upon his noble countenance in wild unearthly visions, that you have caught the look—it was born on your tiny face—an exquisite miniature—a photograph of my thoughts."

Georgina's dreams wandered far from the dead man in the lonely wing, lying in death's solemn majesty, to a brilliant mental picture of Ravenscroft Park, transformed by wealth's magic hand. It flung her into exultant ecstasies.

If Sefton knew, he did not realise it yet. He would look on her with deep respect, for money could buy everything, even the goodwill of a cold and distant husband. She would have all the county people at her feet—those who had looked at her askance, snubbed, or avoided her. She could show them now that the proud Sir Sefton had not made such a bad matrimonial bargain after all. It was something to be on the top rail for once—and stick there!

The sudden change in the horizon, the brightening of Georgina's sky, in the midst of gloomy death clouds, seemed to fill her with the elasticity of early girlhood. She might have been sixteen again, as she rocked her baby in her arms, and banished the remembrance of John's cold hand.

But Sefton had crept to that silent chamber, compelled, it seemed, against his will—for the sight of a dead body always unnerved and upset him.

"Poor old Pluff!" he murmured, as he went back to his study, "there's not a single soul to mourn you; not one life made blank and empty by your absence. I despised you, did I? What a fool I was! You are as good as the best of us now; no caste or rank has any place where you have gone. How I envy you!"

Georgina smothered her cousin's coffin in the costliest flowers, adorned herself in the most exquisitely-fitting black, cried a good deal at the funeral, and went abroad for her health immediately afterwards.

"Dear Mrs. Humphery knows how dreadfully I feel my poor cousin's loss," she told Sefton, "and has begged me to join her and Mr. Humphery in their trip on the Continent. They are such nice, cheerful people, I am sure it will do me good. You can stay with some of your numerous friends. In the meanwhile I have ordered the house to be re-papered and painted."

The money was Georgina's, and she meant to let her husband know it. She treated him now like the very dirt beneath her feet, while he watched her airs and affectations with quiet sarcastic amusement—an attitude new to him.

"I should like to see the papers before they are pasted on my walls, because if I disapproved of them it would necessitate having the work done over again."

She snatched the papers away angrily.

She stared at him incredulously.

"I have to pay, so I should imagine the choice would be mine. But here are the patterns." She flung them across the table. "That is for the dining-room."

"I've no patience with your fusty old-fashioned notions, Sefton, and I want to make our home look stylish, for later on, when I am out of mourning, I mean to entertain on a very large scale. By about Xmas time we might begin our house parties and festivities."

Sefton's blood ran cold at the thought of his wife let loose

"Where did Sir Sefton offer you his hand and heart?"

"Vile taste!" he muttered. "Can't you see this sort of thing is not the least in keeping with old oak? Oh! and this for the hall," laughing outright in a peculiarly bitter strain, "really Georgina, if you want to deck up a house in such gaudy colours take a place of your own somewhere, and do not desecrate Ravenscroft Park."

She snatched the papers away angrily.

with a fortune. How she would brag and swagger! Why the very tone in which she mouthed the words 'our house parties' made him feel inclined to shake her. Besides which, gradually Sefton had grown to hate and abhor contact with his fellow men. Douglas Shirling, to whom he he was still devoted, noticed this painful shrinking and the eccentric ways of his friend; more than once he had begged Sefton to see a doctor, but the suggestion was always received resentfully.

Georgina determined now, under these new circumstances, to hold her own. Sefton she considered a weak, unstable fellow, one she could ride rough shod over at will.

His opinion on the papers did not in the least alter hers, and she flounced out of the room with no intention of counter-ordering anything.

The following day they parted, and Sefton, believing that during his absence Ravenscroft Park would be left unmolested, joined his mother and sister without any apprehension.

Georgina, however, had laid her plans deeply, She was determined to lose no time. Besides the doing up of the house, she required an entirely fresh staff of servants. These she engaged before leaving England, not forgetting to send Nesta the gold inkstand with Mr. Pluff's card as requested, and writing a short note to Mrs. Rathbone. In it she gave a brief sketch of her cousin's peaceful passing away, quoted his words of forgiveness, and wondered if the General's wife would realise how deeply Georgina was indebted to her for that day's canoeing.

Once out of England with her friends the Humpherys, Lady Ravenscroft cast off her gloom and enjoyed herself immensely. Mr. Humphery was a merry, chatty little man, full of go, with a keen sense of humour, and a passion for caricaturing people on his cuffs. His wife existed merely for the vanities of this world, made a perfect science of the adornment of the human form divine, could prattle in rather a pretty voice for hours upon chiffons and bonnets, and took unlimited interest in the family affairs of her friends and acquaintances.

"So your husband is one of those dreadfully morose men that look on the black side of everything!" she said to Lady Ravenscroft, dropping her frivolous tone for one of genuine condolence.

"Yes, and the worst of it is I don't know how to wake him up!" sighed Georgina.

"Now take my advice, dear, for I have made a study of the masculine mind since the days of my teens: don't appear to try and rouse him, but fill your house with guests, mirth loving, light-hearted folk, who will make the old walls ring with their laughter. Surround him with all the luxury that your wealth can give, and gradually the depressed and gloomy individual will expand his wings like the newly released butterfly, so that you will forget he was ever a chrysalis!"

"Not a bad plan to work on. I know he is not in a hurry to return to Ravenscroft Park, and when he does a perfect transformation scene shall greet his astonished eyes."

"You are having the house re-decorated now, are you not?" said Mrs. Humphery. "Give a large party as soon as possible, for, after all, Mr. Pluff was only a cousin, and nowadays so little is made of mourning—it is going quite out of fashion."

"Yes; and poor John would not have liked me to grieve. He was always so considerate."

"A charming character. Quite an example," murmured Mrs. Humphery, remembering Georgina's anxiety anent Mrs. Rathbone. "Do you know," suddenly changing the subject, "this is the hotel my dear little Jacoby proposed to me in six years ago. I was travelling with my parents, and he followed us after the London season. I shall never forget what a fool he made of himself!" laughing softly.

"Do tell me, Lady Ravenscroft, when and where did Sir Sefton offer you his hand and heart?"

Georgina paled. Then in a chaffing tone replied:

"Oh, I proposed to him!"

"That is what people always say when they do not want to answer!" replied Mrs. Humphery, gathering from Georgina's intonation that she was joking.

Post-Card Competition.—No. 9.

There is a sentence somewhere in this number of Short Stories, the letters of which are intermixed. A guinea is offered to the person within 100 miles of London who first correctly transcribes it, and another guinea to the reader living a greater distance away. Post-cards only, please. Other forms of communication disqualified.

RESULT OF POST-CARD COMPETITION.

No. 7.

The discrepancies which occurred between the illustrations and the text in Short Stories, dated August 15th, were six in number. The first post-card to hand containing one of the correct solutions, was that of Mr. F. Bonsier, of 18, Lyal Road, Bow, who points out that while the dog in "The Itinerary of Caliban" was described as a big, shaggy Russian terrier, he is portrayed in the illustration as rather small and smooth coated. The provincial guinea goes to Mr. W. W. Adams, 102, Cape Hill, Smethwick, Birmingham, who points out that the man in the sketch on page 199 should have been carrying a stick instead of an umbrella. Penknives have been sent to the following persons, each of whom were the first senders of the remaining four discrepancies: Mr. Arthur R. Exley, 101, Chestnut Avenue, Forest Gate; Mr. Thos. H. C. Barlow, 56, Iliffe Street, Newington, S.E.; Mr. Chas. J. Wright, 43, Warner Street, New Kent Road, S.E.; and Mr. J. F. Thorrold, Surveyor's Office, Redditch.

Result of Jumbled Story.

No. 6.

Only nine attempts in this competition were absolutely correct. To the £10 offered in prizes we have added 7s., and divided the whole among the following winners, each of whom therefore receives £1 3s.:

A. Stevenson, 26, Woodliffe Street, Harpurhey, Manchester.
A. Davis, 17, Eve Road, Leytonstone Road, E.
F. Mulvogue, 26, Woodliffe Street, Church Lane, Harpurhey, Manchester.

C. H. Thompson, 15, Holmby Street, Camberwell, S.E.
Mrs. Parsons, 58, Ridsdale Road, Anerley, S.E.
S. Small, 10, Rodney Street, Bute Terrace, Cardiff.

The other seven competitors whose names appear below failed in very minor details, and to each of them has been forwarded a penknife as a consolation prize:

Miss A. Starie, 6, Tyndale Terrace, Canonbury Square, N.
Miss M. E. Buttiscombe, "One Elm," Cowley Road, Leytonstone.
T. Mason, Hawkhead Terrace, 31, Seedhill Road, Paisley.

Edited by C. Arthur Pearson.

No. 401.] [One Penny.

For the Week ending Sept. 5th, 1896.

THE POSTSCRIPT.

A Parisian Comedy in a London Setting.

Handsome Clara Hastings saunters along the street with the tranquil and unconstrained step that comes of good health, good family, and a good figure. She left Brighton only this morning, and by to-morrow evening she will have finished her shopping and returned thither.

Clara strolls along without hurrying herself, as if she were alone in the street, with her two hands thrust into the pockets of her dark-blue dolman and her furled parasol thrust under her arm. It will be the fault of the passer-by if he does not notice the superb figure of the fair promenader and see her parasol in time to avoid an unpleasant collision.

Presently a man comes from the opposite direction, a good-looking fellow, Henry Wauburton by name, who puffs occasionally at his cigar as he stares all the women he meets out of countenance, the monster!

"By Jove," he says, "what a pretty little butterball! These girls manage to acquire an astonishing amount of style. And here comes Pansy, in her Gainsborough hat—hum, the familiarity of some of these persons is rather——"

He has run right into the parasol of Mrs. Hastings, who has been watching him for a full minute with much quiet amusement.

"Why, is it you, my dear Mrs. Hastings? What luck! And how strange—I was just thinking of you."

"And staring at the others? Do you know, Mr. Wauburton, you would have a pretty collection of plates if your eyes were photographic cameras? Do you especially admire Gainsborough hats?"

"Not at all. I have abominated them since I learnt of your dislike for them. Your dislikes are my dislikes, your preferences are my preferences, and my eyes, as well as my heart, contain only one portrait. But each time you appear to me again, I must take it again, for I always find you grown more beautiful."

Wauburton got off his compliment well, for he meant it. He loved Clara sincerely and seriously. And she knew that widowhood was like travelling for pleasure; it is a charming way of passing one's youth; but, one day or another, one must return to one home and set up one's tent, or, rather, change it for a more permanent residence.

For some time the fair traveller had been thinking of bringing to, in the harbour of a second marriage. But, like a prudent woman, she was tacking about, examining the land and sounding the coast, before laying up at its last moorings the vessel of her independence. She studied Henry Wauburton with minute care, but with a lively desire to find him worthy of her, a desire which she had not concealed from a mutual friend, who manœuvred the threads with the patience and dexterity of a wise and experienced matron.

"Where shall I take you now?" demanded Wauburton after having obtained his companion's permission to act as her escort.

"To my house, if you have the heart for it. It is a long distance, but I am as good a walker as you are an agreeable talker. I am dying of hunger."

"If you are dying of hunger, there is only one thing to do—you must come to dinner with me."

"Sir!" said the young woman, contracting her pretty brows in affected anger, "I think I must have misunderstood you. If I did not know who you are——"

"Yes, but you know who I am. You know how I love you. Would you not go to the end of the world with me?"

"To the end of the world, yes; but not to a London restaurant, where we would be seen by some imbecile who would talk——"

"A little sooner or a little later, I sincerely hope they will have something to talk about. Be kind, my dear—madam. I ask you for your entire life—surely you can give me two hours in the meantime. Come, what do you fear? Do you wish me to serve you like a queen, not sitting down to the same table with you, erect behind your chair—or, rather, before you, so that I can see your limpid eyes, your pearly teeth, and your rosebud lips?"

"Serpent-tongue, I accept! But do not flatter yourself. The fact is, I would be less complaisant if a good dinner were waiting for me at my house, instead of such a meal as my maid can produce—and she doesn't know how to boil an egg properly. So, sir, you may thank fortune that I am a bit of a gourmet and will deign to permit you to eat also."

The difficulty was to decide upon a restaurant. It must be in a good neighbourhood, but not too prominent for fear of meeting someone they knew. After conning over the list, Clara, who had the City at her finger's ends, decided upon the Café Verrey.

"But they don't know me there," objected Wauburton, who was a man of fixed habits.

"So much the better. That will spare me the pleasure of hearing the waiters whispering: 'Never twice in succession with the same one.'"

"Ungrateful woman, you know well that I am entirely reformed. If my reformation should be to no purpose, it will lie heavy on your conscience."

Mrs. Hastings replied with a slightly reassuring glance. She was, at that moment, rather well disposed towards her Amphitryon. Perhaps her appetite had something to do with it.

Wauburton walked upon air. He poured out declaration on declaration, madrigal on madrigal.

"How beautiful you are this evening," he said.

"Truly?—this evening? Poor me! How sad I shall be to-morrow, when I have to go back to my accustomed hideousness," and she smiled happily, as if she were not uneasy at the prospect.

Wauburton made the regulation offer to unhook for her any star she might choose.

"No, sir," said she; "you need not do that yet. For the present I shall content myself with a rose to pin in my corsage. I could not enjoy a good dinner without flowers."

They were just passing a florist's. They entered and Wauburton selected a handful of gloire de Dijon roses and tendered half a sovereign in payment. The charge came to three shillings and sixpence; the florist had not the change, and neither had Wauburton. In vain the man rummaged about in his till; he could raise only six shillings; and had to go out to get change from a neighbour. Clara waited, a little surprised to see her companion haggle so about sixpence. Finally, the change was brought, and they proceeded on their way.

From that instant, Wauburton was no longer the same. He had lost his elation and seemed constrained.

"Is it possible," thought Mrs. Hastings, "that he is angry with me because I made him get me a few roses?"

But at the restaurant this man of fashion evinced a surprising parsimony. Under the pretext that he did not care for oysters, he ordered them only for his companion. He had a medium priced wine served, and offered champagne frappé with such evident reluctance that Clara refused it. The menu, while comprehensive enough, to be sure, was studied out in such fashion that it came well within reasonable limits. She had rather expected pompano for fish, but the waiter brought smelt.

And worse than that, Wauburton showed himself as saving of his wit and jollity as of culinary prodigalities. He was preoccupied, morose, extinguished. Mrs. Hastings, in accepting this tête-à-tête dinner, had committed, if not an imprudence—she knew she was with a man of many gallantries—at least a slight eccentricity. But, after this exhibition of his temperament, she felt as calm as if she had shared the repast with a schoolmaster or a gouty sexagenarian.

The dinner was carried through expeditiously; indeed, one would have said that Mr. Wauburton awaited the end of it with some impatience. He swallowed his coffee at a gulp, took no liqueurs, and when the bill, which he asked for immediately, was brought, his brows contracted as if at sight of a deputy-sheriff distraining on all his worldly goods.

Clara could not get over these niggardly ways, which would have shocked her in a man to whom she had been married for ten years. There was no doubt about it; Henry Wauburton was a miser! Shakespere forgot to add avarice to the three things which, according to him, woman detests most in the other sex. Mrs. Hastings experienced a complete disenchantment, and this ill-fated dinner left her with a heavy heart.

"However," thought she, "it is lucky that chance opened my eyes. I the wife of a man who cuts his pennies in two! Rather marry a spendthrift. But, who knows?—perhaps the poor fellow has been losing a lot of money lately."

To learn how matters stood, she brought the conversation round to hard times, bad investments, and tenants who would not pay.

"The fact is," replied Wauburton, "that residence property is a pure luxury, and I wonder every now and then where I would be if my father had not years ago put the half of his fortune into good real-estate."

"Let us go!" said Clara, rising; "order a cab and let us separate. I must be going home, for I wrote to my uncle to come out and keep me company this evening."

Wauburton wished to detain her, but she felt no desire to stay. The charm was broken. She had expected an amusing adventure, a sort of respectable lark, a cavalier, respectful but gallant, caring for her, petting her, as he might have cared for and petted one of the others, not a thrifty companion who would simplify the menu and verify the bill. All Wauburton's insistence was in vain: she would not even allow him to accompany her. She entered her own house in a very spiteful humour, and, with a smile full of irony, paid the cabman who deposited her at her door. "It will be just so much less that he has spent for me," she thought.

The next morning when she awoke, she was as sad as if something in her life were changed. For deep down in her heart she had begun to accustom herself to the idea that she would one day be Wauburton's wife.

* * * * *

The day after her return to Brighton, Clara paid a visit to the head-dragon of society. It was a very unpleasant duty for her, for it amounted to nothing less than announcing to her old friend the resolution she had taken, and the news would undoubtedly be a sad blow to Wauburton's aunt.

"Come here, my beauty," cried the old lady, from the depths of her easy-chair, "and confess your sins. Ah, you little sinner, you indulge in pretty goings-on when you go up to town. Just look at the little innocent who gads about in restaurants! Well I hope you are not going to keep us waiting any longer. The entire town is talking of your escapade. Happily, someone is ready to make thorough reparation."

Mrs. Hastings was well used to the amiable old lady's pleasantries.

"I do not wish any reparation."

"Truly! What a pretty quarrel! I have seen many such. In faith, I would not wish to swear that I have not played the same rôle in my day. Come, my dear, what has he done to offend you? Speak, that I may box the ears of this naughty boy."

"Mr. Wauburton has not done anything to offend me. He is a very honourable man, very proper, and very respectful."

"Lord help us, we are lost! Poor Henry, I would rather she called you perjured villain. Do you know that my nephew will be crazed with chagrin?"

"It is a great honour you would do me, but——"

"He loves you so much! He used to vanish at the bare mention of marriage; now he is absolutely your slave. Well, now what is it? Do you not find him handsome enough, rich enough, young enough?"

"I did not say that. That is not the question. I am happy as I am, I do not wish to change—that is all. And it is my firm resolve."

"Unhappy boy, what a blow for him! And he expected it so little. For you must admit your last meeting was not of a kind to discourage him. Why, take that letter there on the table; I received it this morning. See how he speaks of you."

A woman never refuses to read prose when it is about herself. Clara took the letter, and was compelled to admit to herself that he wrote even better than he talked. What glowing admiration, what youthful enthusiasm, in these pages of which she was the sole topic! Her toilet, her least gestures, her most insignificant words,—all were repeated, ornamented, embellished. Never had she believed herself so witty and so charming; and she had no over-modest opinion of herself.

The poor aunt's eyes never quitted Mrs. Hastings, who softly folded up the letter with a shake of her pretty head. At bottom, she was not ill-disposed towards Wauburton for loving her as he did; she would have forgiven him many faults—all, save avarice.

"Oh," she said suddenly, "I did not see the postscript. May I read it?"

She hoped to find yet a few more phrases of admiration, a last supplement of praise. Women—and men, too—do so love to be praised! The postscript ran thus:

I forgot a detail that will make you laugh. You must know that I went out without my purse. Always thinking of nothing but her, you see. Imagine my distress—I was in a cold perspiration. Can you fancy me borrowing money of my fair guest to pay for her dinner? Well, I managed to live through it, thanks to strong nerves and two or three unhappy half-sovereigns that I happened to have in one of my pockets. Why, when we came out of the restaurant I had not enough to pay my tram fare, and it was a great load off my mind when I found I had enough to settle the bill.

Mrs. Hastings smiled strangely, without saying a word. The aunt, her poor heart torn with emotion, demanded:

"So you have decided? It is all at an end? Ah, poor boy, how shall I tell him this no?"

The worthy woman had no more heart for pleasantry her distress was a pitiful sight to see. And it was doubtless through pity that Clara slipped down to her knees on a cushion beside the old lady's chair, and whispered:

"Then, if the no is so hard to write—write the other."

Not comprehending a word of this, but grown fifteen years younger, the old lady half smothered her future niece, and cried, in a trembling voice:

"Write? Never! The post is not quick enough. I shall telegraph. But I cannot run downstairs. Do you, dear heart, run down and telegraph yourself."

And that is how, two hours later, Wauburton received this telegram which made him pale with joy:

"Yes.—Clara."

THE STOLEN SELF.

THE shades of twilight were deepening in the forests, as tired and footsore I paused in one of the valleys of the Las Animas. I had left the mission of San Fernando a few miles back to push on into this region, hoping to find here a stopping place for the night.

From descriptions of the spot fresh in my mind I knew I had reached that fortilage in the wilderness of Christian faith, the mission of Santa Clara de Los Angeles.

A wild, lonely, picturesque retreat it was, too, the half-dozen deserted adobe houses and monastery, with cross and belfry rising above the tree tops, bearing the mortgage of three centuries of sun and storm, adding to the solemnity of the isolated scene.

As dead as the mission of Santa Clara is now to the touch of life, it has, like all those temples in the wilderness erected by the pious followers of the Spanish conquerors, a remarkable history.

Here the priests in their sacerdotal robes had torn down the grotesque images of the New World's benighted race and reared the cross of Catholicism. And here, when preaching friars and monks had proved themselves more "human than divine," and followed scenes of bloodshed in which strife waxed warm.

But the holy brotherhood passed the borderland of their teachings three hundred years since, and their memory belongs to the dust and shadows of a forgotten past.

I had been told an old hermit named Warlock, living in an Indian hut, would give me shelter and good treatment.

There also lived at Santa Clara one called the Mad Monk of whom many startling stories had been told.

This strange couple comprised the present population of the old mission.

As I paused upon the edge of this opening in the wilderness, I saw the remains of the old huts standing in a semi-circle on the south side of the ruined monastery, which showed even then that it must have been an imposing edifice, ere sun and storm, executors of time, had foreclosed their mortgage on its walls. As my eye ran hastily over the forsaken scene, it rested at last upon a thin wreath of smoke, curling lazily above the thatched roof of flags and boughs covering a dwelling of stone, which stood apart from the collection of huts.

In a moment a tall, gaunt figure, clad in a long linen tunic, below which I could see the extremities of a pair of goatskin pantaloons, appeared in the doorway. A mass of shaggy iron-grey hair fell upon the man's broad shoulders, but his features were concealed by dense clouds of tobacco smoke, as he complacently sucked the leaves of the fragrant weed, rolled in corn shuck.

His tunic was the same I had seen the priests wearing at San Fernando, and I realised at once he was the mad monk I had been warned to avoid. Accordingly I made a hasty retreat, but he discovered my presence almost instantly, and called to me in a harsh, grating voice, to stop.

Feeling that "discretion was the better part of valour," I darted through the fringe of bushes skirting the clearing, and quickly out-distanced my pursuer.

I had not gone far, however, when I almost ran into the arms of a man ascending from the bank of a small stream, with a bucket of water in one hand.

He uttered a low cry at my abrupt appearance, and came near dropping the vessel, while I started back with alarm. He recovered to ask:

"Whither so fast, stranger, and at that unseemly gait?"

"The mad monk!" I exclaimed. "He——"

"Ha—ha—ho—ho! been on the old fellow's premises, have you? Better keep off if you don't care to have his fingers round your neck. They say they hurt—for a little while—ha—ha! ho—ho!"

"I wanted to find a stopping place for the night, and——"

"You applied to him. Very rash act, young man. Now you have escaped him you can't do better than to share my shakedown. I don't claim it is the best you ever saw, but it is the best about here. At any rate you are welcome."

The man's tone was not unpleasant, and, though his personal appearance was far from prepossessing, I concluded he was honest, and accepted his offer.

His abode proved to be merely a hut of adobe, but while it was as humble as the mad monk's it had a cleanliness about it that made it agreeable.

"You are called Warlock, are you not?" I asked as we entered his primitive home, and he motioned me to a bench on one side of the room.

He nodded, and, as he busied himself about the evening meal, I had time to study him, soon satisfied to my mind that he had seen good circumstances some time. In fact I had been told he had been driven into the wilderness from a comfortable home by disappointment in love. His language showed he had been well educated, and there was an ease and polish about his every movement which years of isolation and estrangement from society had failed to eradicate. In the midst of my speculations, however, he invited me to partake of the simple repast he had prepared.

"Doesn't your neighbour ever trouble you?" I asked.

"Very seldom now. He and I had a little difference once, but I overcame him, and since then he has avoided me. Poor fellow! I pity him!"

"You know his history, then?"

"Like an open book. And when we have finished our supper I will tell it to you, if you care to listen. I can never eat and talk at the same time."

When the meal was over, and my host had lighted his rolled leaves of tobacco, he said:

"Now, young man, for the story of the mad monk. But first I must enjoin secrecy upon your part, for if he knew we were making gossip of his life history, he would not allow you to leave the valley alive.

"Years ago, no matter how many, Fray Augustin, then a young man full of zeal and God-like ambition, was sent by the church to take charge of the parish in the wilderness, Santa Clara de Los Angeles. The newly-fledged friar's heart expanded with the anticipations of the great and good work before him in harvesting the vast field of human souls ripe for his sickle.

"So assiduously did he set himself to work that soon the little monastery was filled with the dusky brotherhood, as into the shadowed hearts of the benighted race penetrated the light of Christ.

"Fray Augustin had good reason to be elated over what he deemed his success; but I am sure his joy was greatest when he looked upon his flock to behold the fair daughter of the chief of his unsophisticated worshippers, the lovely Iona, kneeling nearest to him.

"She was indeed a picture to stir the heart of the most devout follower of the Cross, and it is little wonder if Fray Augustin lost his.

"A little above medium height, she had a form as straight as an arrow, with the symmetry of a Venus. Her hair was of a glossy black, and of the texture of silk; her eyes! who can describe them? Now of a deep hazel, they seemed to melt into a liquid blue when she laughed, sparkling and glowing with a mesmeric light. Her skin of a velvety softness was dark, but it had none of the Indian's reddish or brownish hue.

"In her presence Fray Augustin forgot his vows to the good fathers, his duties to the church. Aye, he stole himself from God to lay body and soul on the altar of Love."

A low exclamation caught my attention at that moment, and arrested the speaker in his narrative. Looking up we saw framed in one of the small apertures that answered for the cabin windows the haggard visage of him of whom my companion was speaking.

I saw him beckon to me with a long, bony finger, and I drew nearer to my host.

"He is jealous because you are with me," whispered my companion. "But be not alarmed; he cannot enter here."

In a short time the wild-looking countenance disappeared, and we could hear the sound of retreating footsteps, which finally died out in the distance. With a look of relief, my companion went on with his absorbing story.

"One day the padre found Iona playing a simple game of chance.

"She started up in affright at sight of him, and would have fled had he not restrained her. He bade her resume her playing and watched her with eager interest. Somehow the plum seeds in her shapely hands seemed not such objects of evil as he had always denominated them, and as she shook them in the box before turning them on the smooth ground, the rattling was such music to his ears that he fairly forgot his dignity.

"'Away with such child's play!' he cried. 'It may do for Indians, but I'll show you a game worthy of the bishop's skill."

"In his excitement the padre shook from his flowing sleeve a pack of cards, with which he had whiled away many a lonely hour playing solitaire.

"Iona proved an apt scholar, and it wasn't long before the twain were intensely occupied in the game of Mexican monte. And this was the beginning of the end. Fray Augustin played solitaire no more.

"Finally there came a rude awakening from this idyllic dream. A messenger appeared at Santa Clara with the information that the bishop had left the head of the church at Santa Fé, to make a tour of the different missions, noting their conditions and catechising and baptising converts. Especially did the bishop wish to be remembered to good Fray Augustin, whose reports over many others had been most flattering of his success. No doubt the faithful padre would receive the promotion due to such fruitful labours.

"Here was a dilemma. Fray Augustin paced the cloisters of Santa Clara with clouded brow and heavy heart. Little hope was there for him to hold his present position, saying nothing of a promotion, should Father Aceno behold the emptiness of his church. In his despair the padre sought Iona to confide his misery to her. She listened very attentively to what he had to say, offering several suggestions which he could not carry out.

"The next day, however, she came to him with a radiant countenance, saying she had devised a way for him to fill the church.

"Fray Augustin kissed her tenderly when she had concluded, and rained blessings on her head. Already in imagination he saw the church filled to overflowing and himself receiving the bishop's praise for his good work.

"Iona's plan was to appeal to the vanity and love of contingence inherent in the Indian's breast rather than to spiritual desires. In other words to teach the catechism by a series of object lessons never before sanctioned within the sacred precincts. Forthwith the padre gave out word that he had a new game to teach his children, and lo! the monastery was crowded. What an interest was awakened!

"So carefully did Fray Augustin—hark! I hear him outside now! But he will go away in a minute. Well, he arranged his questions so that they could be answered by means of the figures on the cards, and then trained the minds of his dusky listeners to remember the reply belonging to each device This was the more easily done with the Spanish cards used by the Mexicans, which had designs of cups, swords, cudgels and gold pieces instead of clubs, spades, hearts and diamonds.

"The interest Fray Augustin had aroused in this uncommon method of teaching the catechism was, thanks to his careful judgment, at its height when the bishop with his accompanying padres reached Santa Clara. With what pride he looked upon his well-filled house and with what amazement the bishop listened to the prompt recital of the catechism, you may imagine.

"'A good work, a great work,' the bishop repeated, rubbing his chubby hands with delight, unconscious of the rigid machine system to the whole programme, for the padre had found that his pupils would so persist in relying on the object lessons he had been obliged to secrete Iona behind the confessional to prompt them at each question by showing the suggestive card.

"But everything was working well and Fray Augustin's success was almost complete, when Iona, with womanly curiosity, peered out from her concealment to get a peep at the bishop and his associates. Her glance was made at a most inopportune time and—Fray Augustin read a moment later in the bishop's changed countenance that his little scheme was betrayed. He stood dumb with terror.

"When the scene which followed was over he sought the place where he had passed so many happy hours with Iona, to seek her sympathy in his downfall. Even her solace was denied the unhappy man. When the angry bishop and his followers departed from Santa Clara, the fickle maid went with them happy in a new-found love.

"It was many years ago that Fray Augustin fell from grace, but no one was ever sent to fill his place. For some unaccountable reason he still lingers round the old scene, growing more morose each year. Every Sabbath morning he has held mimic exercises in the old monastery, going through in the most minute particulars the ceremony of catechism and worship. He isn't just right here," and the narrator tapped his forehead significantly.

When he had finished his story my host became silent and he sat with his head bowed as if in deep meditation, until at last he threw himself upon a pile of dried grass in a corner of the room and I knew by his heavy breathing he was soon asleep. I lay down on the opposite side of the room, but it was some time before I fell into a fitful slumber, broken at length by the deep mutterings of the strange man as he talked in his sleep.

"The cups represent the theological virtue Faith, the gold pieces Charity, the swords Justice, and the clubs Fortitude. Ah, Iona, it is a beautiful game. We—por Dios! he sees! he reads it all!" and the dreamer started half to his feet to sink back with a groan.

I never hailed the appearance of daylight with so much joy, and I was looking for an avenue of escape when he arose to his feet, donned a priest's garb, and swiftly crossing the apartment, disappeared through an opening in the wall, which had been concealed by skins.

Curiosity taking the place of fear, I followed him, to find that the hut connected with the old monastery.

It instantly occurred to me that it was the Sabbath morning, and while I stood a spellbound spectator the strange man went through the exercises of the morning worship with an invisible audience. When he had finished, with an eager look upon his countenance, he addressed one seen only by him, saying:

"Ah, Father Aceno, did they not recite the catechism perfectly? Have I not done my work well?"

A voice so strange and far-brought that I could not realise it came from the mad, answered:

"You have done a good, a great work, Fray Augustin, and your promotion is assured. May God bless you."

Then, while the sound of the voice seemed to linger over the solemn scene, the faithful priest sank at the foot of the altar, and with the murmured word "Iona" on his lips they ceased to move. The Unseen Hand had borne his soul upward to that promotion beyond the dispute of mortal bishops.

I'm one of the pleasantest benches in the park; that's about what I am, and I take pride in it.

It was rather a sunny, glaring sort of a place when I first planted my legs here, but that is quite altered now.

The shadow of a great tree falls over me, and other trees lie beyond; and between the road, with its rolling carriages, and my blessed little path are ever so many bushes green and fresh, through which one can just catch glimpses of the ladies' dresses.

Farther on you go down some steps, and come to a little winding path, where there is a spring, and where one can lose oneself in the most charming natural manner, just as though one were in the country. Not that I ever lost myself there. But I heard folks say so.

The men often stalk by, paying no attention to me, but women generally stop and try me.

I have plenty of acquaintances, and some dear friends. There are the two girls, twins always dressed alike; the mother and her four children; the old lady who brings her knitting; a plump young woman who always eats bananas and sponge cake, and leaves the crumbs and skins on me in a paper.

And my married couple—my oldest friends. I used to wonder at first why they walked so slowly, and why that broad-shouldered fellow took that little woman's arm. Now I know. He is blind.

A stout lady and a stout gentleman sat down on me one bright summer evening, making me creak dreadfully, and the stout gentleman said to the stout lady:

"Gabriella is an idiot!"

"Gabriella is a girl," said the stout lady.

"It is all the same thing," said the gentleman.

"I was a girl once," said the lady reproachfully.

"Bless my soul! so you were," said the gentleman; "and I was a boy. Dear, dear! And precious fools we made of ourselves."

After that neither of them said much for a while.

"The Rev. Mr. Spinner is one of the best men that ever lived," said the old gentleman.

"But just a little older than Gabriella," said the old lady.

"A very young man yet; not eight-and-forty," said the old gentleman.

"And Gabriella is just eighteen," said the old lady, "and Charles is three-and-twenty, and so handsome!"

"Stuff and nonsense! What's handsome in a man?"

"I thought a good deal of it once," said the old lady.

"So did I; and look at us now," said the old gentleman.

"I tell you, Spinner is just the man for Gabriella; and I won't hear another word about Charles Baldwin."

Then the old lady got up and trotted away, and the old gentleman trotted after her. And half-an-hour went by, and just the loveliest girl I ever saw, with the handsomest young man by her side, stopped just before me.

"Sit down and rest, Gabriella," said the young man.

"Oh, if papa and mamma should be up here," said the girl.

"The last place where we need fear to meet them. Now tell me all, love!"

"There's not much to tell," said Gabriella. "Pa is determined that I shall accept Mr. Spinner, and I'm afraid the dear, good man will be brought to propose, and I know he doesn't love me one bit. All the congregation expect it, and aunt and uncle, and—oh, what shall I do?"

"You know what I have always urged you to do."

"And I have always said that, though I'll never marry anyone else, I can't marry even you clandestinely. Don't be cross with me, Charlie."

"If you loved me as I love you ——" began Charlie.

But just then Gabriella began to tremble.

"Somebody is coming," she said. "Oh, dear, it's ma and pa!"

And in a moment more the shadows of those stout parents fell upon me as they walked past arm in arm, the old gentleman talking emphatically, the old lady shaking her head, and neither of them looking towards my ve...

lovers. When they were gone, Charlie gave his arm to Gabriella, and away they went in the opposite direction.

Then I was left alone, and alone I remained for an hour. At the end of that time there came up the path a lady of forty, very prim, very plain, and very neat, who dusted me off with her handkerchief—not that that offended me—before she would sit down, and then shook her head and sighed.

"It seems so suitable," she said to herself. "Mr. Spinner is a good age for me. I respect and admire him; we have congenial tastes. I could make his parsonage all it ought to be. I was made for a minister's wife, and I should have been one if that flossy-haired little flirt Gabriella Thompson hadn't gone into the Bible class. Such a wife for a clergyman as she'd be! Oh, dear; I like him so! Well, it's my cross I suppose. I'll try not to think about it—but it's so absurd for him. Bless me! there are two men coming up the path. What will they think of me here all alone!" and off she hurried.

About moonrise, I saw coming up the path, a man. He had a thin face, with very small blue eyes, a very long nose, a very long chin, a very wide mouth, and no whiskers or moustache whatever; but a face with a mild, pleasant expression, for all that. As he sat down, he laid a book upon me, and I read upon its cover the name Spinner.

This then was the clergyman.

"I can't say that I see my way very clearly," he said. "It is plain that I am expected by the congregation to offer my hand to Thompson's daughter, Gabriella. Her father plainly desires it. They believe that I have been paying attention to her. I suppose I have. I mustn't do anything wrong. Especially I must not awaken hopes in an innocent young heart to crush them. I merely thought her a child. Still, since I have seemed to feel more, I must fulfil the promises of my actions. I fear I shall not make her happy, and she is not the woman I need. There is Miss Crump now. Ah, what a woman! Had I not unconsciously paid particular attention to poor, dear Gabriella, I should now be free to—but no matter. Duty first. Heigho." And the Rev. Mr. Spinner took up his book and departed.

"What fools people are!" I said to myself. I knew they'd all come back again, and so they did. One day Gabriella and Charles would talk, as lovers do, on me. Another, Gabriella and her mamma. Miss Crump came, too. Sometimes the minister came himself, and crossed his legs and consoled himself with the thought that he was doing his duty to Gabriella.

Once old Thompson came with him, and told him how, matters once arranged, he would buy the handsome house next the church for his daughter. And the Rev. Mr. Spinner inquired whether Gabriella was really happy in the prospective union; and Thompson—old sinner—said: "Very, only she was shy."

I tried my best to shake him off. I would have been willing to be smashed up, just to have him hurt a little.

At last I knew that the day was fixed. One evening Miss Crump came to sit on me and weep, and wandered away in the wrong direction in her agitation. And there followed her as far as my post, Spinner, who did not weep, but groaned. And the moon went up, and he sat there still with his forehead on his umbrella handle, when a shriek was heard, and there down the path, a lady, who cried:

"Oh, dear! what shall I do? What shall I do? I've lost my way, and it's night!"

And it was Miss Crump. And Mr. Spinner ran to her and said:

"Dear Miss Crump, don't be afraid," and Miss Crump sat down upon me and said:

"Oh, Mr. Spinner, I was so terrified! I couldn't find my way, and there was a drunken man in the arbour. It is dreadful to have no one to take care of you."

And he said, not meaning to speak so, but doing it involuntarily:

"If it were in my power you should never be without someone to take care of you again."

And she started to her feet, and he stood away from her. And she said:

"You are engaged to Miss Gabriella," and he said: "Forgive me. My heart spoke. I must crush it, and do my duty. Only you know my secret, now."

And Miss Crump burst into tears and said:

"We must both forget this. Poor Gabriella!" And just then two more figures came into the moonlight, and Gabriella's voice cried:

"It is Mr. Spinner."

And then she came up, leaning on Charlie's arm, and said: "Kind friend, forgive me." And he said: "For what, my child?" And she said: "I've promised to marry you, but I can't. I love you, but not that way. I wouldn't make you a good wife. Pa knows I feel so. And please let me off, Mr. Spinner. Charlie and I are going away with each other to-morrow. And before we go you will bless us and—and—marry us, Mr. Spinner, and tell pa. I know you are not in love with me, and I——" and then she looked at Miss Crump!

"This is all very wrong, I'm afraid," said Mr. Spinner. "A child should not deceive her parents. Go home, my dear."

"I will be Charlie's wife," said Gabriella, "and never part from him again. I have promised, Mr. Spinner, and I am of age to-night."

"Then it is clearly my duty to marry you," said Mr. Spinner. And next morning, Miss Crump playing the part of bridesmaid, he pronounced them man and wife.

Then Gabriella gave him a note for her parents, and they parted. And then Mr. Spinner took Miss Crump's hand.

"Dare I hope?" he said.

And she answered: "Oh, Mr. Spinner, I hardly know. This is so sudden—but——" and then—don't tell of it—Mr. Spinner kissed her and they went away together.

CHAPTER XIV.

BUT STILL A WOMAN.

"LUCY," whispered Daines, as to his horror he saw that one hand clutched the bottle which was partly hidden by the great China crape mantle thrown over her arm, and this was blackened by a broad stain.

She did not seem to hear him, and he laid his hand upon her wrist. Then only did she turn her eyes upon him with look of wonder, as if surprised to see him there.

"You?" she said; "I thought you had gone."

"Great Heavens!" he whispered. "You mad girl, what have you done?"

He glanced at the policeman behind her as he spoke, but the man stood stolidly watchful of all that was going on around him, and did not seem to heed them.

"What have I done?" she said, in a low tone, and with an hysterical quiver in her voice.

"Yes, that horrible stuff. Oh, you must have been mad."

"Yes," she said, nodding her head slowly. "I was mad against her—so mad. It was too much to bear. Take me away, please. It isn't so crowded now. It's all gone off, and I want to be shut up in the dark, where I can have a good cry. There's something burning in my head, and I shall be better then."

"Oh, my poor girl—my poor girl," he whispered, and he took her arm.

"No, no; don't touch me," she said. "I'm not fit for you to come near. I feel as if I'd murdered her, and I want to die. Please go."

"I can't leave you like this," he said.

"But you can't know what I was going to do," she said, with a quick look of surprise.

"Yes, I knew afterwards—too late. Look here. When I picked up the bottle——"

He held up one blackened glove, and she drew in a sobbing breath as if in pain.

"How horrible!" she said in a whisper. "I felt obliged to do it. I got rid of you, and then I hurried out before it was over, and came and stood here to wait for them. It has often been done before. I'm telling you so as to make you hate me and keep away. I've read of it in the papers—of how one woman will throw vitriol in another's face to spoil her beauty for ever. I said I'd spoil hers and make him hate her and come back to me. Look, I've got a bottle full here. It was full of scent when he gave it to me, and I suppose I was mad. I came and waited, feeling how easy it would be. No one would think it of me. I kept it under my mantle—Rod gave me this mantle."

Daines looked at her in horror as she talked on in a low, despondent, helpless way, searching the past and seeming totally irresponsible for her actions. There were plenty of people about, and the policeman was close behind them, but no one paid any heed to the couple apparently waiting for their carriage, and Lucy went on slowly in the same halting whisper, while Daines felt that she leant more and more heavily upon his arm.

"They were very nearly the first; and as soon as they came along there Roderick saw me standing here like this, and he gave a start and looked as if he would go back. But he didn't: he came on, with her on his right, and I had only to draw the bottle from under my mantle and throw the stuff all over her face and bosom. It was so easy."

Daines groaned, and she gazed up at him with a pitying look in her pretty eyes.

"Yes, it was very horrible, wasn't it?" she said, as she wrinkled up her brow. "I wonder now that I could ever have thought it, but I did. I was so jealous, and I hated her so. And there she came along, looking so young and happy and beautiful, and she turned her head to him as she walked, and laughed and chatted to him, while he looked as white as a ghost and as if he knew what I was going to do."

"Oh, Lucy, Lucy!" groaned Daines.

"Yes," she said softly; "but I don't think it was me then. I felt as if some devil was in me, making me hold the bottle tightly, ready to dash the stuff in her eyes and blind them for ever, so that she should never look love into his again."

"Mad!—mad!" groaned Daines pitifully.

"Yes, I was mad then, and I stood ready—it was such a little time—and she came closer and closer; and just as she came towards me she turned and saw me as I stood there, and I suppose it was because she was so young and happy—she looked just like what an angel must be—so pure and good—and she smiled at me, just as one sister might at another; and then—it was all like a dream, Mr. Daines—she was going on down the stairs, and I stood here, seeing her get into the carriage with him."

"Then you did not throw——" began Daines, hysterical as a woman now in his excitement, and she looked at him wonderingly.

"Throw it—at her?" she said simply. "Oh, no: she looked so young and beautiful and happy. I only wanted to be happy too. No; I felt that I could sooner have drunk the stuff as I stood here; but I'm such a coward, I want to live. Everything is so beautiful when you are young and happy, and someone loves you. No, I felt I could not die. Take me home, please, Mr. Daines. I feel as if I should break down if I tried to stir alone, and this stuff is burning my poor hand so much, but," she added, with a piteous smile, "it's better so."

"Lucy, Lucy, my poor girl," he whispered, as he drew her closer to his side, to hurry her down into the brightly lit street, and then into the first turning leading north, followed closely by a couple of men pestering to show them a cab.

With a quick motion Daines snatched the bottle from the trembling girl's hand, and dashed it far out into the roadway, where it shivered to atoms, sparkling in the light, and the two men, believing it to be a paper of coin as they heard the jingle, rushed after it together. Before they had recovered from their surprise Daines had hurried his companion into a cab, where she sank back with a sigh, quite insensible before they reached the house so short a distance away.

CHAPTER XV.

OLIVE'S FIRST TASTE OF MONEY MATTERS.

"ROD, dear," said Olive one morning at breakfast, "what am I to say to the Frasers?"

There was no reply. Braetoun sat at the other end of the table, tapping the cloth with a letter that he had refolded after reading, and looking now flushed now pale.

"Rod, dearest," said Olive, smiling at the absorbed look in her husband's face.

Still no answer, and he sat gazing straight before him, his chair wrenched on one side, and the lines deepening in his brow and about the corners of his lips.

Olive rose quietly, but he did not notice it, and with her eyes sparkling she crept round behind him, and with a girl's merry smile upon her lip, she leant forward with extended hands, and placing her left over his eyes, caught up the letter with her right.

He gave a violent start, throwing back his head and striking her sharply upon the mouth; but without heeding this, he leapt up and caught the letter from her hand.

"Oh, Rod, dearest!" she cried, as she clapped her hands to her mouth and the tears began to gush from her eyes as her face grew convulsed with suffering. "Rod, Rod, how could you?"

"How could you be such a fool?" he cried savagely. "How dare you do such a thing?"

"Rod, dear," she cried, amidst a burst of sobbing, as she applied her kerchief to her lips, which were bleeding freely, cut as they were against her white teeth, "how could you? Look!"

"How could I?" he cried fiercely as she held out the deeply-stained cambric. "How could you be such a silly hoyden, playing tomboy's tricks like that? Recollect who you are, who I am, madam. How dare you snatch one of my private letters like that?"

"I—I did it, dear, in play."

"In play!"

"I spoke twice, dear," she said piteously, "and you made no reply."

"In play! You, a married woman! How dare you?"

"I dared, dear," she said, flushing a little now, "because I was your wife, and I thought we had no secrets one from the other."

"Then, please think differently for the future."

"I did not mean to annoy you, dear," she said, looking at him reproachfully; and then the girl spoke again, her lips quivered, the tears showered down, and she held out her handkerchief. "Oh, Rod, what have I done that you should punish me like this?"

"I didn't punish you. It was an accident—entirely your own fault. How was I to know that you had crept behind my chair like some silly schoolgirl, instead of my wife?"

"I—I am—very sorry," she faltered, trying hard to master her emotion, but the rebuff was agonising, the pain in her cut lips nothing. He was keeping something back from her, holding her at a distance—so soon too. And now, instead of being tender and ready to comfort her, his words sounded brutal.

"If you had asked me, I would have shown you the letter. There, take it, and read it," he cried. "It isn't from a woman."

He threw the letter on the table, and walked to the window, to place his foot on a chair, and stand looking out.

"It isn't from a woman."

The words seemed to echo in her brain, and she stood gazing after him, wide eyed and wondering, but with the pain she suffered greater than ever. Not from a woman! Why should she think it was? How could she think it was? His words sounded like a reproach—they were such as he might have spoken if she had made some cruel, jealous accusation.

But she crushed down her agony, driving away the thoughts that came rushing through her, and remembering that he had seemed irritable and strange during the past two or three days, she smiled sadly, and without so much as glancing at the letter, she followed him to the window, and laid her hand deprecatingly upon his shoulder.

"Rod, dearest," she whispered; "only a few minutes ago and I was so happy. Please, please don't be angry with me, love. Here is the letter. I don't want to see it, if you do not wish."

"Oh, read it now," he cried without turning his head; and a spasm of pain convulsed and made piteous the sweet young face that looked so passionately towards him.

She made no reply, but stood holding out the folded letter, whose envelope, face downwards, was upon the table.

To give her time to read, Braetoun took out his cigarette case, lit up, and began to smoke, all without turning his head, making believe to be very much interested in what took place in the square.

"Well, have you read it?" he said, breaking the silence at last.

"No, Roderick," she said sadly. "I do not wish to read your letters."

He faced round, to find her standing pale and statuesque, holding out the missive, and with her nether lip beginning to look swollen and disfigured.

"But I told you to read it," he said sharply.

She darted a piteous look at him, full of appeal, for his anger, which had been calming down, seemed to increase, and, half blinded by the tears which filled her eyes, and quivering with the new emotion from which she suffered, she slowly obeyed, opening the folds, and began to read the very brief, curt note, which was as follows:

Eaton Place, Wednesday.

Dear Sir,—When you honoured me six months ago by marrying my child, I gave my solicitors the fullest instructions to make it plain to yours that the arrangements over the marriage settlements were final, and binding in every way. They secured an ample income for Lady Braetoun, in which you, as her husband, would, of course, share. I regret to say that in any case I should not consent to alterations being made, and that even had I felt disposed to be so weak, certain matters that have come to my ears of late would have fixed me in my original carefully thought-out intentions.

With regard to the other portion of your letter, I am obliged by habit to refuse. I make a point of never advancing money on interest to any friend.—Your obedient servant,

Isaac Emsworth.

The Right Hon. Lord Braetoun.

It took Olive some minutes to grasp the import of the letter, which she read twice, and then looked up wonderingly at Braetoun.

"You have been asking my father to alter something, Roderick, and to lend you some money."

"It says so, plainly enough, doesn't it?"

"Yes, dear," she said humbly; "but why?"

"Why?" he cried savagely. "Why? Bah! how can you be so childish! You know I want money."

"You said you did, dear, but I believed you were joking. I thought we had plenty."

"Ah!" he cried, with his irritability increasing. "You go on spending and never troubling yourself. Joking? Great Heavens! When I am pestered to death!"

"Oh, Rod, dearest," she cried, forgetting her own suffering as she read his in the sunken cheeks and careworn expression. "I am so, so sorry; and papa has refused to help you?"

"You see he does."

"But he can't have understood, any more than I did. I thought, indeed, that my money, I mean the money settled upon me, would help to make you rich."

"And all the time you are a perfect child over money matters. There, I can't explain these things to you. I am ill and worried—Olive, don't cling to me so. Can't you see I'm hot and worried, and that my nerves are all ajar?"

"Yes, dearest," she said tenderly. "Sit down, no, lie down on the couch a little while, and tell me, darling. You musn't be worried about money when you are ill. I know I'm very stupid about it, but I have never learned anything. Papa always said that women had nothing to do with cash accounts: that was men's work. There, you'll be more comfortable now," she continued, as he threw himself on the breakfast-room couch; "now tell me how to help you, dear. It is absurd for you to be worried. How much do you want?"

"Oh—there, I told your father, and he sends me back that cold, brutal letter."

"No, no; don't call it that, darling. Perhaps he was a little cross, and someone at the Cape had sent him a tiresome letter by this mail. He is very much bothered sometimes, and I know he loses a great deal of money, but he never would tell me anything about it. Now, be a good boy, and tell me at once," she said, as she bent down over him and pressed her lips upon his forehead, and then started as she saw the effect, and hurriedly and with a slight shudder made believe to hold her folded handkerchief to his brow, for she had left the mark of blood where she had kissed him.

"There, don't do that," he cried impatiently. "My head's hot enough as it is."

"Is it, dear? A poor darling head. Wait a moment."

She ran to the chimney-piece, took a scent bottle, and hurriedly saturated her kerchief with the pungent contents, bathed his brow, removing the last trace of her loving kiss.

"Now, Rod, dear," she said, as she furtively touched her own lips from time to time, "how much money do you want? I have—yes, over seven pounds."

"Seven devils!" he cried so furiously that she started away in alarm, but turned back with a loving smile, which looked terribly pathetic as she caressed him.

"Rod, my darling," she cooed over him; "don't, dear; you frighten me. I know you don't mean it."

"Then you shouldn't talk such idiotic nonsense. Can I pay seven thousand pounds with seven?"

"Seven thousand! That's a great deal, dear. Why, what have you been doing?"

"Never mind. I have it to pay at once, or I shall be sold up or something. Be quiet. Don't paw me about."

"Rod!"

"Well, there. I don't mean that, but I can't bear it now. Go and finish your breakfast, and let me think."

"No: I want to think for you, as your wife should. Why, I have plenty of money, Rod. I mean, we have. What is mine is yours, and you shall have all you want, dear."

"How?"

"Why, I'll give it to my own dearest husband, of course; anything to make him happy."

She choked a little as she said this, and the tears would come, in spite of her efforts to hide them.

Her convulsed face moved him a little, and he spoke more gently.

"You mean well," he said, "but you are a perfect infant still over these matters. Your marriage settlements tie up your money so that I can't touch it, and you can't either."

"Then what's the good of it, dear?" she cried wonderingly.

"Ah, what indeed!" he cried. "I was a fool ever to consent to it all. I didn't know it would be so tight as it is."

"I remember now," she said; "I have read about money being tight in the City."

"In the City!" he growled, "it's tight everywhere. Hang him! he was too clever for me."

"Do you mean the man you owe the money to, Rod?"

"No, I don't. I mean your old grab-all of a father."

"Rod, dearest, don't, don't, please. You hurt me. Dear papa would not do anything that was not for my—for our good."

"For your good, as he calls it, yes; but he has made a confounded mistake this time, and so he'll find out."

"Has he, dear? Oh, I am sorry."

She rose and rang the bell, making Braetoun start up on his elbow.

"Here, what are you doing? Don't do that. Olive! What are you about?"

"Trying to do something for you, dear. You seem so ill."

"No, I won't have it. You're going to send for that confounded, croaking raven, Murray. I don't want him here. He does me more harm than good."

"No, no, no, dearest."

"He does, I tell you, and he comes here a cursed deal too often. I won't have him hanging about and talking to you in his smooth way."

"I'm sure he is very, very kind and patient and nice."

"Oh, is he?" cried Braetoun angrily. "I won't have him fetched."

"Did you ring, my lady?"

"No," cried Braetoun fiercely.

"Yes," cried Olive firmly. "Tell them to send the brougham round as quickly as possible. Go at once."

"Yes, my lady."

"What are you going to do?" cried Braetoun, with his face looking drawn and strange. "I won't have you go to fetch him."

"I am not going to fetch him, Rod, dear," said Olive firmly. "I think you want a different doctor."

"I don't want any doctor," he snarled—"Yes, I do."

"It is your anxiety about money makes you ill, and I am going to papa at once."

"What! You are going to your father!" cried Braetoun excitedly. "What for?"

"To tell him he must untie some of my money," she said quietly, "because you want it and are in great trouble. There, don't fret and trouble any more, dearest. He does not know how ill you are, and how worried. I won't be long. He will do anything I ask him. There, look up at me as you always do, dear. I—I—I can't bear you to speak to me as you did just now. I know, darling. Don't say anything. It's all past now; but don't, pray, speak to me again like that. You don't know, dearest, how you hurt me. There, it was because you were so ill and worried."

"Yes, yes," he said hastily, as he drew her down and kissed her, "that was it—worry and illness. I was not myself."

"But you are now," she cried, clinging to him lovingly, and sobbing over him for a few moments. "There, the sun has come out again," she said merrily, "and I am going to fetch you a big bag of money to pay the horrible ogre who has been troubling you. And now, dear, you are not to leave that couch till I come back."

"Oh, I don't know. Hadn't I better come with you to face the old man?"

"No, sir, certainly not. Papa would do anything for me, and perhaps he wouldn't for you. He has known me longer, sir. There, lie still, and try to go to sleep."

She hurried out of the room, looked in five minutes later to nod to him playfully, and then with cruelly aching heart drew her veil tightly over her face, and went to the door just as the brougham drew up.

"Poor wench!" muttered Braetoun, as he turned his head to the wall. "Curse it! how bad I do feel. But I'm not going to have Murray here so much. I believe he'd poison me if he dared. Comes here a deal too often. But she is a little angel of a girl, after all, and I behave awful bad to her. But it's all fate—hard fate too, for I do try my best to run square."

He lay thinking for a few minutes, and then winced at a keen throb of pain which shot through his head, one which influenced the tide of his thoughts.

"He'd better mind what he's about. Why, I'd shoot him as soon as look at him, that I would."

He tried to divert his thoughts to another channel, and lay musing.

"Ought I to have gone with her after all?" he thought. "No: she's right. I should have been like a red rag to the old bull. He'll do it for her, like an old fool. Wish I'd told her it was twice as much. Regularly sold me over those settlements. Who would have believed that everything could have been tied up so tightly? Why, I'm a regular cypher. Rigdon regularly laughed at me. Said they were useless as securities for any advance. He's a cursed old fool, but he must have known something beforehand. Made some inquiries, I suppose. Talked to Murray. Thick as thieves. Ah! what a stroke of fate—what a cruel position—to be regularly under the thumb of a man like that, regularly at his mercy. I believe I'm the most unfortunate beggar that was ever born."

CHAPTER XVI.

EMSWORTH MAKES A CONFIDANT.

BRAETOUN would not have lain there in Chester Square if he could have known all that took place.

Murray's brougham drew up at the door in Eaton Place, and, on alighting, the Doctor was shown at once into the dining-room, where Emsworth was seated at breakfast, evidently making a hearty meal; and Murray's face showed a slight trace of annoyance as the door closed.

"Ah, my dear Murray!" said Emsworth, holding out his hands and wincing as he moved. "Very good of you to come. Had breakfast?"

"No: I came on as soon as I received your message."

"Bless you, my lad! Don't look very bad, do I? Touch the bell, will you?"

Murray rang, and then said gravely:

"What is it, Mr. Emsworth? I am pressed for time."

"Yes, I know. Lot of poor beggars forming queue at your door: but they must wait a bit. You must eat or you can't work. Hot plate for Dr. Murray."

This to the butler.

"Now sit down and talk to me."

"Yes. What is wrong—not"—with a gasp—"Lady Braetoun?"

"No, no, no, my dear boy. She's well enough. I'm the sick man, I tell you."

The Doctor drew in a breath as if relieved, and Emsworth looked at him searchingly.

"Thank you for that, Doctor. I like it. I'm glad to see that my darling has someone beside me who loves her."

"Lady Braetoun won my esteem from the day I first met her, Mr. Emsworth."

"I know she did, sir, I know it; and before I begin to groan over my troubles I'm going to tell you something. Murray, I've been making a fresh will."

"Indeed!" said Murray coldly; "then I hope you have not remembered me in it."

"But I have, sir," said Emsworth with a chuckle. "Not in the regular way, though. Short a time as I've known you, it has been long enough to make up my mind what to do. Of course, Olive inherits the bulk of my savings and winnings, but she'll want protecting."

"Who should protect her but her husband, sir?" said Murray frowning.

"My friend, sir, the man I trust, the man who will act to her as a brother. You."

"Mr. Emsworth!"

"Hush!—Set the things down, and mind I am not interrupted."

The butler, who had entered with a tray, quickly laid a fresh cover and left the room.

"Now eat your breakfast."

"No, not now," said the Doctor excitedly. "You must alter that will, Mr. Emsworth. I cannot consent to undertake this duty."

"Yes, you can," said Emsworth sternly, "and you will, for her sake."

"No, sir. I cannot put myself in so false a position."

"You can, and you will, sir," said Emsworth, stretching across the table and seizing the Doctor's wrist, to grip it tightly and hold on, drawing his breath heavily, and unable to repress a groan.

"My leg—my leg!" he muttered.

"Yes: what is it? A touch of gout?"

"Oh, some cursed thing of the kind. Forced to have two men to give me my bath—oh, I had it hot; don't look horrified—and to dress me. Then hang me if they weren't obliged to get this arm chair and curry me down like a blooming Guy Fawkes on the Fifth of November. Here I am, and I can't stir. But I can eat, and I want to see you eat too."

"I dare say I can soon relieve you."

"Yes: of course you can; but wait a bit. I want to relieve my mind first. You'll do what I have said. You'll be my sole executor?"

"It is impossible, sir."

"It is not impossible, and you must do it. I've devoted my life to making a fortune for that girl, and when I'm gone she must have someone to watch over her interests."

"Yes, sir; but I am not the man."

'But I say you are. I know you like her so well that you'd do anything sooner than see her suffer."

"I would, sir," said Murray, in a deep voice.

"Then why do you hesitate?"

"I hesitate for her sake."

"Then you are wrong. Look here: it's of no use to beat about the bush. I've had several little hints lately that I'm growing old. This is one of them. I've to die some day like a man, and I want to go to my long sleep in peace, feeling that I have left everything as right as I can for my darling child."

"You have a fortune to leave her, sir," said Murray coldly, "and you have chosen a husband for her to protect her."

"Yes, and a pretty devil of a mess I've made of it," cried the old man, flushing. "I thought I was very clever. I thought it all out, and I wouldn't have listened to anyone who had tried to dissuade me."

"No, I am sure of that, sir."

"Don't taunt me about it. But there," continued the old man, with a groan: "it's of no use to cry over spilt milk. It's done, and I've got to make the best of it. But, Murray, why didn't you tell me what a scoundrel he was?"

"How could I, sir?" cried the Doctor passionately.

"And that he was in such a state of health?"

"Mr. Emsworth, you cannot deny that you knew almost as much as I did about Braetoun, and that you have believed his sweet young wife would entirely redeem him. I believed this too."

"Yes. I suppose I knew all this," groaned Emsworth; "but I wouldn't quite know it. I was carried away by my vanity and pride, and the way in which that old hen harpy of a mother worked me round her finger. There, it's of no use to hide anything from one's medical man. I was dazzled by the title, birth, and position. It was too much for me, and every objection which rose before me I knocked down with the idea that Olive would redeem her husband from all the past. One moment—I am in a good deal of pain. Tell me what it is—not something worse coming on? I can't afford to die yet, Doctor, but speak out the truth."

He dabbed his wet brow with his handkerchief, and sank back in his chair, Murray immediately devoting himself to his fresh patient for the next few minutes.

"Well," said Emsworth at last, rather piteously; "what does it mean—short obituary notice in the Times about one of Samuel Smiles's self-help men, and a quiet substantial funeral?"

"Not for many years to come, I hope, sir," said Murray quietly. "It is a form of gout undoubtedly, and it must not be trifled with. You have been doing too much lately, and suffering a great deal of mental anxiety."

"More than I ever did before in my life, my lad. Things have been very bad at the Cape, and I fought the trouble through and won; but then down upon me came the trouble about Olive's husband. Murray, my lad, you've relieved my mind partly about myself, for I don't want to die yet; I'm not tired enough of life to wish for the long sleep, and I want to make a long fight yet to redeem my child's position. When I go promise me that you will take my place as my executor."

"It is impossible, Mr. Emsworth."

"It is not impossible, man. Look here; I've sent for you to do me good. Don't begin by doing me harm. I've got worry enough upon my mind as it is. For a couple of months past, one on the top of another, little and big, the worries have been piling themselves up, about that scoundrel, Braetoun. He left off for a time, but he has drifted back to his old games. The turf has greater attractions than his wife; he has been making ducks and drakes of a lot more money, and got himself deeply involved, and now——"

"Does Lady Braetoun know all this?"

"Not yet, man," whispered Emsworth, inserting a crooked finger in the Doctor's buttonhole, "and she don't know that the miserable hound has gone back to some wretched woman—some actress he used to know at Brompton. Confound him! I should like to shoot him for the scoundrel he is."

Murray sat gazing straight before him, with his brow knit, his teeth set, and his hands grasping the edge of the table.

"You knew what a scoundrel he was," said Emsworth, in a deep voice. "You ought to have told me. You ought to have fought against me, and insisted that I had made a wrong choice. You ought to have done all this."

"And if I had, Mr. Emsworth, you would have called me a meddlesome slanderer, and have persisted in spite of all."

"Yes," said the father with a groan, "I should, my lad, I should. Oh, Doctor, Doctor, what miserable fools we clever men are!"

"Yes," said Murray bitterly, "even the most able."

"There, I can't take her away. I should be making worse of it. Why, she has all her stupid old father's weaknesses. If I were to go and tell my poor darling that he was the scoundrel he is, she'd turn upon me fiercely, and defend him to the last. She's as stubborn as I am. Believe ill of him? Not she. It would take something very strong indeed to make her think he was anything but the husband she swore to love."

"She may win him to the true course yet," said the Doctor hoarsely.

"Never. Can't you kill him out of the way next time he's ill? Such men are of no use whatever. I know you hold him together, and that he has you to thank for such health as he has. What do you think is the last thing?"

Murray made a gesture with one hand as he gazed despondently before him.

"I told you he has got through all the ready money I supplied them with to start them—all gone, and since then he has been setting some scoundrel of a solicitor and money-lender to work to turn her settlements into cash."

"But you will not allow that?" cried Murray excitedly.

Emsworth's hand came down heavily upon his arm.

"Got you!" he cried.

The Doctor stared.

"Now look me in the face, Murray, after that, and tell me you will not be my executor, and watch over my child's interests when I am gone!"

"But you have the money properly tied up?"

"I've done all I can, but who knows what dodges and tricks may not be tried in dealing with a weak woman who is ready to believe and can be cajoled. Tell me now that you refuse."

Murray was silent for a few moments' bitter struggle, as he thought of the position he occupied, and the dangers and temptations that might come. Then he said quietly:

"I cannot refuse, Mr. Emsworth. There is my hand."

"No, I am right this time, my lad. Thank you. That has done me more good than any medicine. Look here," he continued, taking his pocket-book from his breast. "You did not know it was so bad. It has come to this. Read that."

Murray read the letter, and l anded it back.

"What have you said to him, sir?"

"I have told him in the plainest words I could write, that he will not get a penny from me, and I'm waiting to see what card he will play next."

There was a tap at the door.

"Who's there."

"Beg pardon, sir," said the butler; "I wouldn't have interrupted, but my young lady is here."

THE WAGER WON.

THE Empress had just ended her game of chess one evening at the Winter Palace, Petersburg.

"It is enough," she exclaimed, turning to her lady-in-waiting whose duty it was to supply her with a fresh pair of gloves at the beginning of every game: "I shall not play any more. I will have my revenge to-morrow, M. le Marquis."

"Your Imperial Majesty has had it already," replied the Marquis Strogonoff, who was the popular and accomplished French Ambassador. "If you could but see the deep contrition of my heart for having had the presumption to defeat you, you would find yourself amply revenged."

The young Empress smiled graciously and rejoined: "Very well, but I prefer deeds to words. That is what I try to impress upon my people. Apropos, you know how we Russians pride ourselves on the strictness and alertness of our detectives, and how nothing escapes their keen vigilance. As you seem to doubt the watchfulness of my subjects, I requested that the very next case of detected smuggling be at once made known to me."

"To doubt would be treasonable, your Majesty," said the Marquis, with a smile. "Do let us hear the details."

"Count Lazareff has just been arrested and detained on the frontier for smuggling all kinds of contraband articles from Paris, which were most ingeniously hidden in the linings and roof of the carriage; and the Emperor, to encourage the detectives, has distributed among them the heavy fine of 800 roubles which the Count had to pay. What do you say to that, Marquis?"

"I can but say, your Majesty," he answered with a shrug of his shoulders, "I can but say how clumsy the man must have been to fail in such a simple thing."

"Simple thing!" repeated the Empress with a slight look of surprise. "I do not think you would find it so easy to deceive our inspectors."

"Will your Majesty give me leave to try?" the Marquis quietly asked.

"Oh, no," she answered, with a smile. "It would be of no use. You know that your person and property as Ambassador are sacred, and therefore you would not be a fair test. I would wager, however, this diamond ring that were you to pass our frontier as a private individual you would not succeed in smuggling in the veriest trifle without being detected."

"I accept the challenge," replied the Marquis, with a graceful bow, "and as I am shortly going to France on urgent private business, I shall avail myself of your gracious permission, return to Russia as a private individual, and subject myself and property to the most rigorous search of the custom-house."

"You have accepted my challenge," the Empress rejoined. "Remember, Marquis, we shall have no pity on you."

* * * * *

Great excitement prevailed at the small frontier station on the road from Königsburg to Petersburg. The officers of the custom-house were on the alert, for they had received orders from headquarters that when the travelling carriage of the French Ambassador should pass through that day it was to be most carefully searched and examined, and even the person of the Marquis was not to be spared. Such were the Emperor's orders, and, unusual as they were, they must be obeyed.

It was a bitterly cold day, the snow lay deep on the ground, and the custom-house officers, who had been doubled in number, were congregated around the stove, warming their sheepskin-lined kaftans, and speculating on the rich prize which would undoubtedly fall into their hands.

"Count Lazareff's roubles were nothing to it! By St. Alexander, the Emperor is a kind father to us," and the men stroked their long beards and gulped down bowls of hot tea. But hark! There is a faint tinkle of bells and the swift sound of horses on the crisp snow.

"Here he comes!" cried one of the men, jumping from his warm seat. The rest quickly followed, and as the Ambassador's covered sledge with its four horses drew in sight it was surrounded by the band of officers.

Respectfully touching his cap, the head man accosted the Marquis and apologised for the intrusion, but he had received orders to examine carefully the carriage effects of his Excellency, and must trouble him to alight while the search was being instituted.

The Marquis, who was luxuriously reclining in the warm folds of a magnificent black-fox cloak, roused himself at the words, and replied that there was no occasion to apologise.

"Alphonse," he cried, as his valet came to the door of the sledge, "take care of Fidele, and see that the poor little thing does not catch cold coming out into this frosty air."

The Marquis then stepped out and hastened into the custom-house, followed by Alphonse, who had carefully wrapped a rug around the French poodle. The poor beast, who had been snugly seated on a pile of warm furs, evidently disliked being disturbed, for it gave vent to its displeasure in a short bark.

Like eager birds of prey over a rich prize, the examiners gathered around the sledge, and began their search in the most systematic manner, ransacking every possible place of concealment. Even the cushions and linings were not spared, to the indignation of the coachman and valet, who looked on with sullen eyes not daring to interfere, but muttering at the folly of their master in permitting such an outrage.

As yet they had not discovered a single contraband article, and more eager became the search, until at last the baffled men had to abandon it.

The Marquis meanwhile was warming himself at the stove, with stoical indifference, sipping hot tea and stroking Fidele's curly head. Nor was his equanimity disturbed when they approached him and intimated that he and his two servants must submit to being searched. "Very well," said he. "Only I warn you your trouble will be in vain, for you will find nothing. But fulfil your orders by all means."

Disappointed by previous failure, the men made the personal search as strict as possible, but it was without result. One of the inspectors even approached Fidele, and insisted on examining the rug with which the dog was covered, as it might contain something hidden in its folds. Fidele gave a low growl at being thus disturbed, and its master took it up gently, and said: "Poor Fidele is not accustomed to be treated roughly. Well, you have found nothing. I told you so. And now, I suppose, we may proceed on our journey."

The chief examiner, bowing low, assured his Excellency that he would not be further detained, and he was soon in his sledge once more, carrying his pet dog in his arms. The horses pawed impatiently, and the merry bells began to tinkle a chime of departure. In a moment the swift sledge was out of sight, leaving the disappointed custom's officers bewailing their ill luck.

* * * * *

It was again a brilliant evening scene at the Winter Palace. The young Empress was surrounded by her court circle, and when the Ambassador approached, not a little curiosity was aroused as to the result of the wager. It had become a lively topic of speculation since his departure, and bets had been high on both sides. Even the Emperor who generally kept aloof from such trifles, was amused at the incident, and was curious to know how the Marquis would explain the affair as the baffled search at the frontier had been promptly communicated to Petersburg. The Empress felt triumphant, and naturally concluded that the Ambassador, rather than run the risk of failure, had given up the idea altogether.

"Welcome back to Petersburg," she exclaimed, graciously extending her imperial hand, and smiling as he bent down over it. "What news from Paris? I fear you did not find anything there worth smuggling, if I may trust the report of the officers, who seem to have treated you most unmercifully, and searched every possible corner."

"Your Majesty certainly has no occasion to find fault with your faithful subjects, for I can bear witness to the keenness of their eyes and fingers," the Marquis replied, with a slightly amused smile at the eager looks of the circle of auditors. "But still, I did bring back a trifle, which perhaps you will allow me to show you. My valet is in the ante-room, as I could not well intrust it to other hands, and perhaps your Majesty will give permission to him to enter here."

With an incredulous look, which was reflected on the faces of her court, the Empress gave the required order; and as Alphonse entered with Fidele in his arms she could not suppress a laugh, in which her whole circle joined.

"What a pretty little dog!" she exclaimed. "But it scarcely comes under the head of contraband; and if this is the only thing you have brought from Paris I am afraid you have lost your wager, and my diamond ring is safe."

The Marquis did not look disconcerted, but taking Fidele from the arms of Alphonse, he placed it on the ground.

"Now, Fidele, good dog, make your bow to her Majesty," and in the most absurd way the dog kept nodding its head several times in succession.

"Now, Fidele, die," said the Marquis, putting his hand on the dog's curly head. Fidele wagged his tail, gave a hoarse bark, and in another moment, to the surprise and horror of the assemblage, its head rolled on the carpet.

There was an involuntary scream from the ladies, and even the Empress cried out: "Oh! what is that?" as the Marquis bending down over the headless body of Fidele, quietly drew forth from the opening at the neck a long, white roll of lace.

Unfolding it carefully, he held up to the astonished gaze of those present an exquisite dress of the far-famed Chantilly lace so finely wrought as to be almost priceless. A murmur of admiration was heard from all. Gracefully kneeling before the Empress, the Marquis presented the lace.

"Will your Majesty pardon my presumption, and kindly deign to accept this souvenir from Paris?"

"How very beautiful it is!" the Empress exclaimed, taking the delicate fabric in her hand. "It is truly a magnificent souvenir. Rise, M. le Marquise; you have indeed fulfilled your word and fairly won the wager. I herewith acknowledge myself defeated," she added playfully; and, taking the diamond ring from her finger, placed it in the Ambassador's hand.

"I will not part with it but with my life," was the gallant Frenchman's answer, as he rose to his feet and put the ring on his finger.

"That is indeed a wonderful dog," said the Empress, turning to Fidele. "I certainly never saw anything more true to life, and I must give you credit for the clever way in which you eluded the vigilance of my officers."

Fidele now became an object of great interest, and its head being replaced, it had to go through its various accomplishments of barking, nodding its head, and wagging its tail, all of which, owing to the ingenious mechanism concealed in its head, it performed to perfection. It was not surprising that it had escaped detection at the custom-house.

It is a black, stormy night. The trees are swaying and creaking, and their gigantic branches are tossing about in the fierce west wind like huge writhing arms stretched out in intersected confusion across the shadowy road which winds for a couple of miles through a thick forest of pines. A heavy rumbling is audible in the distance, speedily resolving into the sound of carriage-wheels; it comes nearer and nearer, and then suddenly ceases. The carriage stands still. The horses are tired, and need no staying hand as the coachman scrambles down and walks from side to side, peering into the dense blackness which envelopes them on every side.

"Pierre! what is the matter?" rang out an impatient though melodious voice. The window was let down with a jerk, and a woman's head looked out.

"Madame," answered the man, deprecatingly, touching his hat, "the horses are tired. There ought to be an inn near, but I fear I have passed it. It is so dark and stormy that the road seems unfamiliar and I cannot make out where we are."

"Drive on very slowly. I will look out, too, and the first house we come to, you can get down and seek information. If it be possible, we will stay there the night."

The coachman mounted and did as he was ordered. Presently there seemed a break in the density on one side of the road. There was a clearing in the forest and a glimmer of light a hundred yards away.

"Pierre!" came in sharp tones again, "go and see what that light is! The horses will stand still without you."

Pierre knew from experience that remonstrance was vain. His way was through thick underwood and long grass, and he dreaded some unknown danger with every fresh step. A long, wandering house of two storeys soon stood up in black relief against the murky sky. He struck on a gravel pathway, and followed it up till he came halfway round the house and found a way of entrance. It was a low, trellis porch, with a narrow door. After fumbling about, he discovered a long wire with a handle attached, which he pulled vigorously. A jangled tinkle sounded faintly in the interior of the house. In a moment footsteps were heard, a bolt was withdrawn, and the door slowly opened. An old man in shabby livery stood there.

"Monsieur," said Pierre, "my mistress is driving from Fehrenstadt to Aronsen, and, owing to the storm, we have been delayed, and I do not know where we are. Can you kindly tell me how far it is to the nearest inn?"

"Humph, du lieber Gott!" the old man said; "there's no inn, as I know of, within six miles of here, and it is a ticklish road in the dark. Wait a bit, I'll go and speak to the master."

He soon returned, carrying a lighted lantern. "The Herr Graf sends his compliments to the lady, and will be happy to receive her as his guest till the storm is over. I will come down with you."

The two men walked with rapid steps down the drive and appeared on the road some twenty yards ahead of the carriage. Whether it was the unexpected noise in the distance, or the sudden gleam of the lantern light, the horses started and plunged, then galloped with ringing hoofs straight along the country road.

"Mon Dieu! My poor mistress!" cried Pierre, and he flew, as if possessed, after the runaways.

The lady, fortunately, had alighted some moments before, as Pierre's absence made her restless, and now she stood speechless, as she saw first her carriage, then her servant, disappear from before her eyes.

The old man shook his head as he looked round and mumbled to himself; then swinging his lantern high, he caught sight of the tall, erect figure standing motionless by the roadside.

"That must be the lady herself," he muttered. "If you are the lady who owns that vehicle, you had better come straight along to the house with me," he continued, aloud; "the horses can't be stopped, and your man will soon find his way back."

"There seems nothing else to be done," she said decisively; "go on with your lantern and I will follow."

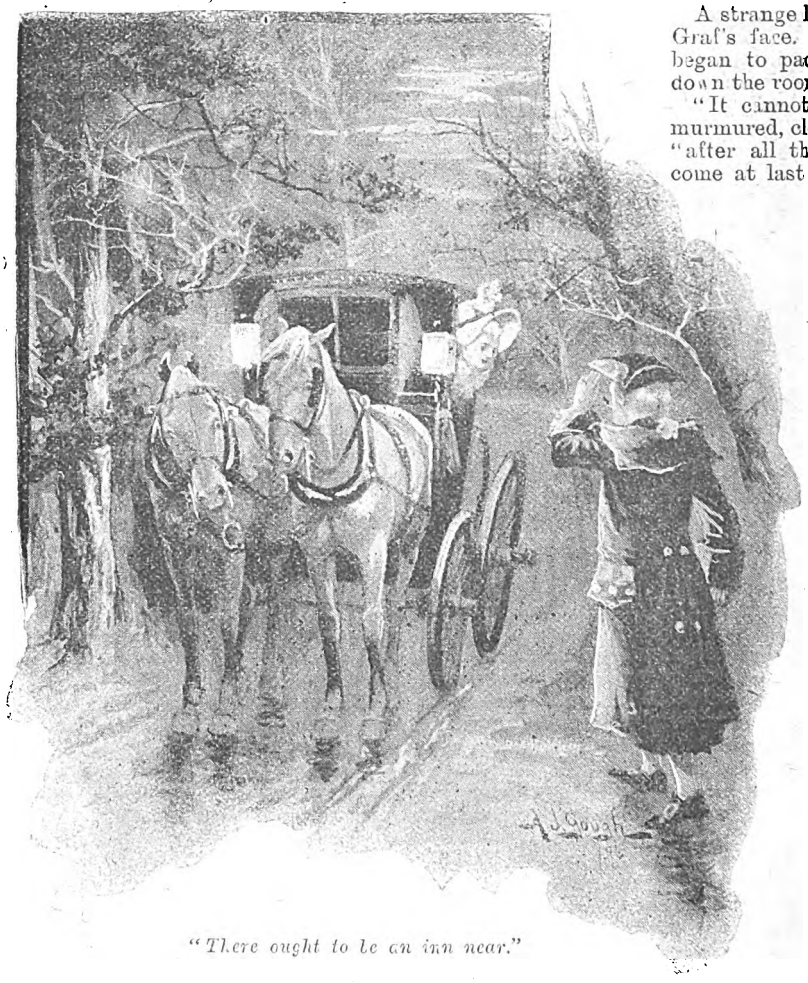
The man obeyed. They came to the house and stepped into a broad, low hall, with many doors leading from it.

"Where is your master, my man?" the stranger asked; "tell him that Baronin von Reichstein is the name of his guest, and she thanks him for his courtesy and would like to see him."

"Yes, gnädige," replied the old servant, "and will you please to take a seat in there, and I will send my wife, the housekeeper, to you." While speaking, he opened a door to the right, and the Baronin walked in with stately step. It was clearly but not brilliantly lighted, and was a comfortable room, with low lounges and deep chairs, covered with an old-fashioned chintz; polished floor, with a few skin rugs lying about. She shivered, however, as she walked down the room, and, after throwing aside her travelling cloak and bonnet, she sat down by the newly kindled log fire. She was a woman of fifty, at least, well preserved, and with a slender, even youthful figure. Her hair, though snow-white, was luxuriant and waved. Her features were delicately chiselled, and her skin, though somewhat wrinkled round the eyes and mouth, was like marble, and the reflection of the fire-light gave almost a youthful shimmer to the eyes, and a rosy tint to the cheeks.



"There ought to be an inn near."

She took off her gloves, and putting her elbow on the arm of the chair, she leant her head on a little white hand, sparkling with the gleam of costly rings. She must have been a very beautiful woman in her youthful days, and possessed that regular type of beauty which seldom changes its character, even in fading years. Heinrich, the man servant, forgot to close the door, and, after knocking and receiving answer, he entered a room on the opposite side of the hall. It was a small library, and seated at a writing-table was an elderly man, with iron-grey hair, straight features set with classical rigidity, and, though strictly handsome, cold, passionless, hard. He turned round and faced the servant, who delivered the stranger's message, supplemented by certain explanations of his own.

"What name did you say?" asked the master, in even tones.

"Von Reichstein, Herr Graf."

There was a slight pause.

"Ah, very well. Send Martha here, and I will give her orders about our guest."

Heinrich bowed himself out.

A strange look came into the Graf's face. He got up and began to pace slowly up and down the room.

"It cannot be possible!" he murmured, clenching his hand; "after all these years, has it come at last? There can only be one Baronin von Reichstein. I must see for myself—be convinced that the name is not a mere coincidence."

So saying, he opened his door noiselessly, and, making no sound with the soft slippers on his feet, he stealthily crossed the hall and gazed from the shadow right into the other room.

The Baronin, as though instinctively conscious of an unknown observation, changed her attitude, and her eyes moved uneasily from one object to another. Herr Graf withdrew further into the shadow, still watching her intently.

"It is she! Oh, Heavens, how little changed!"—his features softened and worked convulsively for some seconds, then set into the same unbending rigidity as before—"the same fair, false mask! How many more lies has it told since it lied my life's happiness away? She shall sleep in that very room to-night. It cannot be coincidence that makes to-day the anniversary of that memorable occasion."

With a cruel smile that might have curdled a brave heart, he went back to his old seat at the writing-table, his eyes glistening with excitement, and a dull red spot on each pallid cheek.

A shrivelled-up, little old woman, with a basket of keys, now entered and approached him timidly.

"Get some refreshments ready, Martha, and take them to our guest in the morning-room. Light a fire in the north bedroom; the Frau Baronin von Reichstein will sleep there to-night."

Martha started as the Graf spoke. "The north bedroom, did you say, sir? But——"

"The north bedroom," he replied emphatically; "mind there is no mistake about it. Uninvited guests must be content with what is given them."

The old woman still hesitated, but lacking courage to speak, she shuffled out of the room. "Well, I never!" she said half aloud, "the room that has not been used for years, and which folks vow is haunted. The master is a strange man, and no mistake."

* * * * *

The Baronin von Reichstein had retired to her room. In spite of the large log-fire burning briskly in the open grate, there was a chilly, damp atmosphere hanging about the walls and furniture, which was of a heavy, sombre character. The bed was one of those ancient canopied four-posters of early days, and presented a funereal appearance. The Baronin shivered the second time that night as she glanced round the room. There were two wax-candles lighted on the dressing-table, and their flickerings created uncanny shadows which lurk in every corner. She rang for more lights. When two more candles were brought by the old woman, who looked pale and frightened, she placed them on the high wooden mantelpiece above the fireplace.

"What can make me so uneasy to-night, I wonder?" she thought impatiently; "those stupid horses, and that idiotic coachman! How could I divine that I should be stranded in the middle of the forest, at the mercy of a man who seems either to have outlived the manners of ordinary society, or never to have had any at all. The last premise seems the most likely. That reminds me, I meant to have asked his fossilised old retainer the name of her master."

So communicating with herself, she moved about examining the furniture, and finally drew a low couch, which seemed to have got in there by accident, to the side of the fireplace. Then she loosened her hair, drew it into one thick plait, removed a wadded silk quilt from the bed, and then, throwing herself on the couch, she arranged the coverlet over her.

"It would be an impossibility to attempt sleep in that hearse," she thought, viewing the heavy bed; "I wish it were morning."

She tried to sleep, but everything conspired to keep her awake. The thought of her coachman and horses did not disquiet her, but the rain beating on the window panes, the curtains moving with the wind, the shaking of the door in the socket, the falling embers of wood—all these worked upon her imagination and took on a weird importance. She sat up, and, putting the coverlet round her shoulders, rested her feet on the fender and gazed into the fire. She hated to have time like this for thinking. She had lived through many strange and sad experiences which she never had wish or will to summon from the past.

By dint of leading a busy, restless life, full of variety, friends, and pleasure, wrapped up in her only surviving son, who was married and happily settled, and to whom she was hurrying, she never allowed regretful moments to take her unawares, and if threatened with a sleepless night, always took a sleeping-draught, which effectually wooed and won the fitful god. To-night she was powerless; her luggage somewhere out in the forest, sleep refused to be conjured at will. She tried to concentrate her mind on the bright home of her son, but all kinds of gloomy shadows and voices of a dead past rose to defy her in those silent hours of the night. With sheer force of will she drove them back into their secret lairs for a time, but presently out they crept again—the stealthy, ugly, shapeless phantoms—on they came like a phantom tide, crowding, mounting, accusing, overwhelming—an offspring begotten of remorse and shame, suppressed and concealed for more than a score of years.

She rose impatiently, shook herself, and began to walk about the room. She went to the alcoved window, drew aside the curtain, and looked out. The storm of rain was over, and through the swiftly-scurrying clouds were glimpses of stars and of the unfathomable firmament beyond. Just then the moon shone out clear and still. She was not a timid woman; an idea suddenly struck her, and she went and blew out the candles. Then she sank into a large chair by the window, with the curtain drawn half-way back.

A momentary lull, and back again came those relentless shadows, sad and terrible. She was gazing abstractedly into the darkness. Suddenly her brow contracted, and she pressed her hands tightly over her eyes.

"Am I demented?" she cried; "his face is the last I should ever expect to see in this world, and yet I seem to see it distinctly, stern and angry, as I saw it last. It was only an illusion!" and she gave a deep sigh, and looked out steadily again.

Nothing to be seen but the neglected shrubs and straggling grass, with a black background of lofty pines; a wild, weird scene enhanced in expression by the fitful moonshine and moaning wind. From one mood she dropped into another—the retrospective. Scenes came before her to which the former mood seemed but the prelude, and passed in shorter time than they take to describe.

The first is laid in an old garden, gay and trim, which has many winding walks and hedges of yew. There is a fountain, and close to its gleaming marble rim are two figures—a man, tall, stately, bearing erect, in velvet coat, lace ruffles, buckled shoes, and a young girl, in the picturesque costume of the Trianon period, satin petticoat, bunched paniers, and full sleeves of flowered silk, a soft muslin kerchief drawn loosely round the graceful shoulders, leaving the marble pillar of the soft neck bare and cool, little high-heeled shoes, and a coquettish fan. A large, drooping hat topped the dainty head, which was dressed high, with tiny curls straying over the rosebud ear and delicate neck. Her face is turned away.

The man is bare-headed, and the breeze lightly lifts his thick chestnut hair from a broad, noble forehead, beneath which burn two passionate eyes which are bent with yearning intensity on the slender figure of the girl as she seems to sway like a willow in the wind. He puts his arms out slowly; she does not draw away; then he draws her with a fierce rapture into a close embrace and devours the sweet, downcast face with hungry, burning kisses. "My Ermantrude! Mine now and for all eternity!"

A break in the vision.

The scene changes, and a second picture gradually forms on the inexorable camera of retrospection. Two people are walking down an avenue of linden trees. The girl we saw before in the garden. Her companion is not the same; he is more massive than the lover of the last scene; his expression less intense; hair darker, eyes smaller. He is pouring out avowals of love and devotion. The girl turns her head aside. By degrees he wins her attention; she allows him to kiss her and to put a sparkling ring on her finger. There is a narrow footway on one side of the avenue beyond the line of lindens, and an unsuspected observer has accompanied them step for step. It is the man with the chestnut hair and passionate eyes; he is breathing quickly with suppressed rage and excitement, and, as the final seal of the engagement ring is put to the compact, he rushes forward, with a muttered curse, and confronts the lovers with flashing eyes and face inflamed with jealousy. "Hypocrites!" he struggles out hoarsely.

It was a tragic, a dreadful scene. The girl gives a sharp cry, remains as if struck for a second, and then flinging her arms up and pressing her hands over her ears, she flies back the way she came as if for bare life. The two men were brothers. Rudolph, the first lover, was poor and proud; Carl, the younger, rich and powerful. Carl looked at his brother in amazement. "How dare you make love to my betrothed!" grasped out Rudolph. Now it was Carl's turn to burst out in frenzied indignation; and hot and strong, bitter and stinging, were the words they hurled at each other. The passion displayed was too deep for depiction. They parted.

The third picture is slowly unfolding.

The brothers meet again at early dawn in the depths of the forest, where no ear can detect the clashing of swords, and no arm of the law can intervene to avert the duel which is to prove of deadly result to one or the other. The survivor is to retain his bride. The seconds are officers from a neighbouring garrison, over-zealous in their temporary office, and unrighteous in the antipathy each bears to the opposing party. Carl is wounded to the death. Rudolph relents, and vows never to return to the beautiful Ermantrude who has proved false to both.

third scene. She never saw either lover again after the fatal encounter in the avenue, but heard of the duel and Carl's death. To this day she turns sick and faint at the smell of the linden trees. Even now, as she reclines in the low chair by the window, with tightly pressed lips and contracted brow, the sickly sweet odour seems to float before her sharpened senses after the lapse of thirty years' silence.

She shudders, and rises to leave her seat. She will try and sleep, now she has allowed these ghosts of a buried past to hold sway for a time; they will surely rest now. An indescribable something arrests her; she cannot move, not even raise her eyes. She sinks back. Still feeling that same eerie sensation of an invisible barrier, she looks up, and becomes conscious of a light in the room. Just at first she forgets the candles are extinguished, and then a chill of terror overtakes her. There is a cold, phosphorescent, bluish light, filling the room mistily, dimly, and brightest round the bed. She dares not breathe; a dreadful oppression weighs her down; she wonders if she is going mad, and a sickening horror seizes her. All at once, after one rapid glance all round, she gives an agonised gasp and loses consciousness.

This is what she saw: On the bed the clothes were disturbed, showing the outlines of a massive figure; on the pillow, with closed eyes, and a greenish pallor on the cheeks and forehead, was a rigid ghastly face. There were stains of blood on the linen coverings, and by the bedside stood a shadowy form in the act of pouring some fluid from a bottle into a glass—the lady at the window here opens her eyes, and with fascinated, horror-stuck, staring look, every nerve strung, every limb tense, she followed each detail of the ghostly scene. Phantom-like figures pass in and out of the room, noiselessly and rapidly.

Still that quiet figure on the bed sleeps on; still the shadowy figure by the bedside holds the glass in its hand. Now the figure of an aged man enters, misty and uncertain; profound grief is shown in his very attitude; he stands gazing on that quiet figure with a sorrow-striken face that would melt the stoniest heart. Now he stands erect, seems to be listening to someone speaking at his side; as he listens his countenance changes, his features become convulsed, an awful look enters his face. He lifts his hand high up, and, with eyes fixed into space, seems to pour forth torrents of words.

The figure on the bed moves, rises—"My God!" muttered the lady at the window—endeavours to clutch the old man's arm, opens his mouth to speak, but suddenly falls back on the pillow, and from his side, which now reveals surgical bandages, spreads a bright, crimson stain, which spreads and spreads, till the whole bed seems flooded with red, and a little red stream trickles to the floor and collects in a dark, ominous pool. The old man staggers, falls to the ground, and is borne swiftly by shadowy figures from the room. Confused forms pass to and fro; the light becomes indistinct, the shadows less frequent and more dimly seen; in another moment all has vanished, the gruesome vision is past, only the moon shines into the room, throwing long, silvery beams across the bed with its undisturbed linen and snow-white pillows.

But the door remains open, and a tall figure stands on the threshhold. It advances, like the figure of a relentless fate, sinister, strange, and seems to seek something. The Baronin's horror-struck eyes are still staring into space. Evidently they take in this fresh apparition as part of the awful pageant. She begins to speak:

"You, too, Rudolph? I expected you. Do not look at me so sternly! I did not mean it. How could I tell what would be the ending? I swear I never knew till to-night. I was so young then. A—a—h!" with a long convulsive shudder, "look at the blood," and she draws her skirt aside; it is only the red silk coverlet that has slipped from her shoulders. "Don't go till I tell you what my life has been—how I have been punished. I married, Rudolph! Yes—to try and forget. I have had six children, bonny boys and girls. Tony, the eldest, lived till he was six; then he was drowned in the lake. Pretty little Adèle was poisoned with berries gathered in the woods with a careless nurse. My handsome Eccard was killed by a fall from his horse. One of my babies fell down the well in the Reichstein Schloss, and was picked up dead. Two boys grew to be twenty; then one was killed in a railway accident, and now I have only my Ernst. He is married, Rudolph, the only one left. I am going to him to-morrow. Would to God I were with him now!" She sighed quietly. The words fell mechanically, as from the lips of an automaton.

"Your husband? Is he alive?" said the figure.

She did not think it strange that the phantom spoke. "He was killed in a storm ten years after we were married—twenty years ago. For one life, six have been taken from me. My sin was great, but my punishment greater, for I loved you, Rudolph, and lost you for ever!"

The tall, erect figure never swerved. It was Graf Rudolph von Wilding himself—no apparition. It was the white outline of his face that the Baronin had seen through the window and taken for an illusion. He drew back when he saw himself observed, and only appeared again to remain an intent, awful spectator of the ghostly phenomena that had just taken place.

"Baronin Ermantrude von Reichstein! The dreadful scene you have just witnessed repeats itself every anniversary night of the real tragedy that was enacted here thirty years ago. I knew this, and for that reason caused this room to be prepared for you to-night." He spoke in icy, stern tones; she put up her hand as if to ward off a blow, and bent her head with a faint moan.

"After our unnatural duel my unfortunate brother was carried in a dying state to the forester's house close by. My father was sent for, and learnt at the death-bed the cause of the fatal quarrel. Standing there, he cursed that false woman, cursed all who loved her, and all whom she should love." The bent head, and stretched-out arm at the window sank low, and seemed to press heavily on the arm of the chair. "He poured forth curses which roused the dying man to protest. His bandages burst! death was instantaneous. My father died the next morning. I bought this house, and here I have lived and shall live to the end of my days. No detail will escape my memory if I live a thousand years. This is the room to which he was carried, that the bed on which he lay, this the very night on which he died."

He paused. There was a solemn, ominous silence in the room. The moon still shone through the alcoved window. The Graf's dark form was deeper in the shadow than before. No sound came from the crouching, motionless mass leaning over the chair.

"And now, Baronin Ermantrude, are you satisfied?" he continued. "True, you have suffered, but that is just. Let me remind you that the result of those sins, which our own folly and blindness lead us into, remains our constant, our nearest companion, till death deliver us from the burden."

He turned to go. The Baronin never moved. Whether it was a faint touch of pity, a sudden stirring of remorse, or a vague misgiving which arrested his steps, he hesitated, came forward a few paces, hesitated again, his face working with conflicting emotions. She was but a woman after all, and had suffered much.

"Frau Baronin," he said gently. No word, no motion in answer to his call. "Ermantrude!" he whispered hoarsely. Silence still prevailed. He took one stride forward and bent over the drooping figure, lifted her up, and laid her head back on the cushions.

Just then a silver moonbeam struck right across the pale, chiselled features, revealing wide-opened eyes, agonised and appealing, already fixed with the appalling, terrible stillness of death itself. Ermantrude, the sinning, the suffering, was dead! Rudolph started violently. It was not possible! He seized her hands; they were icy cold to the touch. He bent his head in agony of suspense to listen for the faintest heart-beat. All was still, intensely still.

"A three-fold murderer!" he muttered; "my brother, my father, and now my—Ermantrude!" he suddenly shouted. He knelt on the floor by her side; he fondled the cold little hands, laid them against his cheek, and kissed them; he murmured broken, unmeaning words of love and endearment. Was it fancy, or did those fixed troubled eyes gradually soften into a quiet calm? Suddenly he came to himself again. He stood up, passed his hand over his eyes, looked long and fixedly on that pallid face, pressed a lingering kiss on the marble forehead, then swiftly left the room.

Listen! What was that? A shot, loud and piercing. It echoed clearly through the stillness of the early dawn which had risen fresh and calm, after the stormy night. The sound did not rouse the two old servants. A few hours later, the rays of the morning sun lightly touched the rose-sprays hanging over the library window, then shot downward through the window into the room, and hovered over a still, lifeless figure that lay stretched out on the floor, face upward, one hand clutching a pistol, the other thrown across the chest.

A still, lifeless figure that lay stretched out on the floor.

Heart disease, the doctors told Ernst von Reichstein was the cause of his mother's death. He adored his mother, and was almost broken-hearted when the terrible summons reached him. She had carefully concealed her weakness from him, but had known it herself for the last few years. No one could account for the second death in that house of terror that night. There were strange rumours about for months afterwards, and the heirs of the last Graf von Wilding would not enter the house. It was closed up, and allowed to fall into decay and ruin.

AN EYE FOR AN EYE.

I.

"HAVE you read about poor Detective Forrester?" asked my friend, John Hawthorne, late of Scotland Yard, as we sat chatting, after supper, in my rooms.

"Forrester?" I answered, "no; what has happened to him?"

"He was attacked and nearly murdered by some Marylebone roughs last week," replied Hawthorne: "we never thought he would recover, but his splendid constitution has pulled him through, though he'll never be the same man again, poor chap."

"What was the cause of his being so brutally injured?" I asked.

"His clever handling of the Slater Coining Case," replied the ex-detective, "you know how smartly he captured that fellow Slater, thereby breaking up one of the most expert counterfeiting gangs London has ever harboured. Well, the rest of the crew managed to make good their escape, but they determined to be revenged for the conviction of their chief, and, with that motive, the ruffians contrived to waylay Forrester in some lonely place and beat him savagely about the head with sticks and life-preservers until they all but killed him.

"Poor fellow," continued my friend, a tone of deep sorrow in his voice, "I wish to Heaven I had been at hand, for he saved my life two years ago, when, through just such a motive as that which almost caused his death, I literally hung within an inch of eternity."

"You never told me about such an occurrence," I said reproachfully.

"No, I did not," replied Hawthorne. "Months passed before I could recall its happening without a shudder. But you can have the story now, if you would care to hear it."

"Shall be delighted," said I, refilling my friend's glass, and pushing the cigars across to him.

Selecting a weed, Hawthorne said interrogatively:

"Remember the Alister murder case?"

"Quite well," I returned; "the owner of Mortimer Lodge, Colonel Alister, awoke one night hearing a strange noise proceeding from his study. He rose at once, and, donning a dressing-gown, went downstairs, entered the room, and found Mr. James Harman, burglar, endeavouring to force open a small safe in which the Colonel kept his valuables. Naturally, Alister resented Mr. Harman's intrusion and endeavoured to capture him, but the burglar, having once tasted the delights of penal servitude and not wishing for a repetition of them, shot the Colonel, and made good his escape.

"Alarmed by the report of firearms, the servants rushed into the room, and found their master lying mortally wounded upon the floor. Medical aid, prompt though it was to arrive, availed nothing, and the Colonel expired in a few minutes, after giving a brief description of his murderer.

"Doubtless Harman fancied himself safe, but, unfortunately for his security, the detective who took up the case was named John Hawthorne. As a natural result after a two months' chase upon the Continent James Harman stood in the dock at the Old Bailey and heard himself sentenced to death.

"There you are," I concluded airily. "Is not that the Alister murder case in a nutshell?"

"Rather a large nutshell," replied Hawthorne, laughing. "However, that has but little to do with my story, which commences on the night before Harman's execution.

"The month was November, and a dense fog hung over the river as I made my way along the Embankment to my home in Chelsea. Though wearing a thick overcoat the cold was so intense that I shivered; yet, despite the unpleasant nature of the weather, I felt exceedingly happy, for the capture of Harman meant my receiving the £100 reward offered by the Government, and also, in all probability, a speedy promotion for, as our chief phrased it, 'my devilish smart arresting of Harman.'

"As I neared Waterloo Bridge, a seemingly one-armed man stepped up to me, and holding out a box of matches implored me to purchase it, whining out a piteous tale of non-employment owing to an accident that had caused the loss of his right arm. He was an old man, grey-bearded and raggedly dressed, but, owing to the dense gloom, I could see no more of him or I should have probably acted very differently.

"As it was, I felt exceedingly sorry for the poor fellow, and, unbuttoning my overcoat, made a search for a few coppers that would provide him with a night's lodging. Muttering thanks and blessings, he came close up to me, looking pitiable with his bent shoulders, and the empty coat-sleeve fastened across the breast of his ragged coat.

"But just as I was about to hand him the money, his figure suddenly straightened, I saw a bare, muscular arm bent back above his head, and before I could move a step or raise my hands to defend myself, some weapon—a life-preserver, I think—descended with crushing force upon my head, hurling me backwards, almost insensible.

"I have a vague recollection of being lifted into a cart, of feeling myself bumped and jolted as I was driven away, then came a horrible sensation of falling, a sudden shock, and—oblivion.

II

"A DULL, throbbing pain at my head, a sense of horrible numbness in my limbs—these were my first impressions as consciousness returned to me.

"Wearily opening my eyes, I saw, a few feet above me, a ceiling, black with age, and crumbling to pieces in many places.

"Wondering as to my situation, I made an effort to rise, but sank back with a gasp, a sharp agony at wrists and ankles telling me that I was firmly bound with cords.

"Bound hand and foot! What did it mean? Where was I? I could not understand, but gradually as the pain at my head, caused by the heavy blow I had received, abated, I began to think more clearly, and in a few minutes had become fully aware of my position.

"I lay stretched upon an old horsehair couch, my arms firmly bound beneath my back, while my ankles were fastened together so tightly that the slightest movement of the limbs was impossible. I could move my head, however, and, wondering for what reason I had been secured in this way, proceeded to take stock of my present abiding-place.

"It was a small room, poorly furnished with a common deal table, a couple of rickety chairs, and the couch upon which I lay. One small window, destitute of blind or curtains, faced me, and beyond its six grimy panes of glass I could see the air was quite dark, indicating that the long November night had not yet given place to day. The only illumination of which the apartment could boast came from a paraffin lamp standing in the centre of the deal table before mentioned.

"After noting these details, and wondering again why I had been brought to this place, I began to grow impatient, for my position, with almost my entire weight resting upon my arms, was a most uncomfortable one.

"Finally my impatience culminated in an angry shout of 'Hullo!'

"Immediately I heard a door behind me open, and someone entered the room. I looked partly round, and by the light of the lamp saw a man of about sixty, tall, grey-bearded, and very powerfully built.

"I recognised him at once as the man who had waylaid me on the Embankment, but somehow I felt sure that I had seen his face some years ago.

'His features were regular, and even handsome in their formation, but they were now marred by a most sinister expression, and his eyes, as they gazed down upon me, bore a look of triumphant malice.

"'So you've woke up, guv'nor,' said he sneeringly. 'Hope you've passed a good night.'

"'What is the meaning of this?' I demanded angrily. 'How dare you entrap me!'

"'Ha, ha!' interposed the man, with a chuckle. 'Clever idea, that arm business, wasn't it? Took you in finely, guv'nor, didn't it, eh? Ha, ha!'

"'Confound you,' I shouted, for his taunts struck home, 'release me or it will be worse for you.'

"'Oh, will it?' he answered mockingly. 'Sorry I can't oblige you. Am afraid you'll have to stop as you are.

'"But come, guv'nor,' he continued, as I was about to speak, 'you don't seem to recognise me. Don't you recollect Dick Taggart?'

"I knew him then in a moment as a notorious 'fence,' or receiver of stolen goods, whom I had seen sentenced, some nine years back, to a long term of penal servitude. But why had he pounced upon me? I had not been connected with his arrest. I was mystified, but the man's next words contained a terrible explanation.

"'I see you remember me,' he went on, 'but Taggart's not my name. My real name's Harman, and——' here he came closer to me, and his voice sank to a hissing whisper—'Jim Harman is my son.'

"'Your son,' I repeated, in amazement, 'your son?'

"'Yes, my son,' he answered, his eyes glaring ferociously at me. 'My son, whom you've hunted down and brought to the gallows. Curse you. But you shall be avenged, Jim, you shall be avenged, I swear it.'

"My situation was revealed now as one of the greatest peril.

"Helpless in the power of this man, unable to stir hand or foot, I quickly realised in what frightful danger I was of having my life sacrificed to satisfy the revenge of Jim Harman's father.

"After a pause, during which I endeavoured to think of some plan for escape, Harman spoke again, and now his voice was broken with emotion.

"'Ah! you don't know how proud I was of my boy; how I loved him—scoundrel though I was—with all my heart; how I endeavoured to save him from following the evil path I chose; how I contrived to spare him the knowledge of what his father was, and how all my plans were thwarted by my arrest and imprisonment.

"'When I came back to freedom, three years ago, it was to find my boy the associate of thieves and already far down the road of crime. But what choice had he? He did not have the chances given to his father—a University education, a good position, a handsome salary, all thrown away through sheer folly—no, someone told my boy who and what his father was, and he drifted into the life I had led, his doings culminating with the shooting of Colonel Alister.

"'But,' here the old man's voice rose almost to a scream, 'he never meant to kill him; Jim only wanted to escape. It was you, bloodhound that you are, tracked him down and caused sentence of death to be pronounced upon him.

"'It's the last man-hunt you'll ever do, though,' continued Harman, more quietly, yet with a terrible menace in his voice. He took a watch from his pocket and glanced at it. 'Just half past seven,' said he; 'you have thirty minutes more to live.'

"With these words, the horror of which to me can be imagined, he was gone, closing the door behind him.

"I knew my fate now, but was determined not to die without a struggle. Half-an-hour hence—at eight o'clock, the very time fixed for Jim Harman's execution—I was to be murdered. Rendered desperate by this thought I strained with all my strength to free my hands. I felt the cords cutting into my wrists, yet still I wrenched and tugged at my bonds, until the blood was trickling over my hands. But I persevered, though the agony was terrible and at length succeeded in wrenching free my right hand. Then, though stiff from my captivity, I struggled into a sitting position and, with the cords still dangling from my left wrist, set to work to free my ankles. Oh, for a knife with which to cut the cords, but my pockets were empty, so I was compelled to use my fingers. The deadly peril of my situation lent me strength, but the knots were well tied, and for some minutes I strove in vain to undo them. With finger nails broken and wrists bleeding, I struggled hard, and was just feeling the first knot giving way, when the door suddenly opened, and Harman entered.

"He took in the situation at a glance, and, with a hoarse cry of rage, sprang towards me. As he reached the couch I turned and grappled with him, but in vain, however, did I attempt to overcome my terrible opponent. My ankles being still bound proved a great disadvantage to me, yet I struggled desperately, feeling that I was fighting for my life. With a violent effort, Harman suddenly dragged me off the couch and endeavoured to force me down, but as I fell I came upon my knees and still grappled with him.

"He seemed to have the strength of half-a-dozen men, and I was fast being overpowered, when, in a mad endeavour to throw me backward, he stumbled over one of the chairs and came down with a crash, breaking it into pieces beneath him. I still clung to his wrists, and dragged myself on to him before he could rise to his feet. In a moment I had seized him by the throat and must undoubtedly have won the desperate struggle, when his right hand came in contact with a leg of the broken chair. Using this as a club the ruffian, with a snarl of triumph, dealt me several heavy blows upon the head and shoulders.

"Instantly my hands relaxed their grip, and with a groan of agony, I fell backward upon the floor, insensible.

III.

"Slowly consciousness returned to me, and I opened my eyes to find myself standing upright, gazing into the malignant face of Harman, who, supporting me in his arms, stood beside me. My head was aching terribly, and in addition to being bound hand and foot, a towel had been tied tightly over my mouth so that I found it impossible to utter a sound.

"Upon seeing that I had recovered my senses, Harman released his grip upon my shoulders, saying with a taunting laugh:

"'Stand steady, guv'nor, and look around. See where you are?'

"Wonderingly I turned my head, but was stopped sharply by something tightening about my throat.

"Good Heavens! A rope was noosed around my neck.

"I looked back at Harman, and saw that a most horrible grin was distorting the old ruffian's face.

"'Don't you like a hempen collar?' he asked with a chuckle, then, his face changing suddenly to a look of diabolical rage, he hissed: 'Ten minutes more and you swing.' So saying, he disappeared out of my line of sight, and then I saw that I was standing upon a large table, while, looking upward, I could see that the end of the rope around my throat had been fastened to a beam that ran across the room, a few inches below the ceiling.

"An awful fear fell upon my heart. To be brutally murdered by strangulation! Great Heavens! What would become of my wife and children? At thought of them I made desperate endeavours to free myself but my efforts were useless.

"'Ha! ha!' came Harman's voice to my ears, 'you can wriggle, but you won't undo those ropes this time, so you may as well leave off trying.'

"His tauntingly spoken words were only too true, and I gave up attempting to free my hands. I was helpless, absolutely helpless, in the power of this man, who, maddened by his thirst for revenge, would, I knew, show me no mercy.

"Of my thoughts during the next few minutes I will not speak. I could hear Harman alternately chuckling and groaning, and knew the man to be mad, but the rope was fastened too tightly for me to turn and look at him, and as I gazed straight ahead, I could see through the open door into the room in which I first had found myself. I saw the old couch, the single rickety chair, and the fragments of its fellow lying upon the floor, but the deal table had been moved, and I guessed, instinctively, that I was now standing upon it! At the grimy window the faint light of a foggy morning was just visible, and I felt my blood turn to ice as I thought that this was to be my last day on earth!

"Just then Harman uttered a cry.

"'Three minutes more,' he shouted, 'three minutes more, and it'll be eight o'clock—eight o'clock! Ah!

"'And he—and he,' Harman went on, his voice rising to a scream, 'he'll die then. Curse you—curse you—you shall die with him. But think of the difference. Scientific apparatus will be used for him—he'll be dead instantly—no pain—nothing. But you—you shall die by inches, and I myself will witness your dying agonies, and gloat over them as I remember my revenge—my revenge. Ha! ha! ha!'

"His laugh was horrible to hear, but I had resigned myself to my fate now, for I felt that I was doomed. Doomed! For what? Because in the execution of my duty I had captured a dangerous ruffian who had committed a cowardly murder. Oh, my God. What an awful death would be mine!

"Suddenly Harman shrieked out: 'Listen, listen! Eight o'clock, eight o'clock!'

"It was so. From some church close by the sound of a clock striking the hour came with terrible distinctness to my ears. Presently Harman began to count: 'One, two, three, four, five, six, seven—Ah! Eight—eight!'

"A second's pause, then he broke out with: 'Jim—oh! Jim! My boy, my boy!'

"His voice died off in sobs, but suddenly, with a frightful oath, I heard him dash forward until he stood within my line of sight.

"Heavens! How ghastly he looked. With blood-shot eyes that glared ferociously at me, his nostrils dilated, his upper lip curled, showing his yellow teeth, his muscular hands working convulsively, Richard Harman looked horrible enough to terrify the bravest man.

"'Curse you—curse you,' he shrieked. 'Curse you a thousand times for your cowardly man-hunting. Blood-hound that you are—Die!'

"And, with a frenzied yell, he seized the table and dragged it away from beneath my feet.

"A sudden jolt and the rope tightened about my throat. I felt the blood rush to my head, a thousand twinkling lights danced before my eyes.

"Then came visions of green fields, of lovely flowers and trees. I was wandering in magnificent gardens, when, as from afar off, there sounded on my ears a piercing shriek, a flash of bright red flame blazed before my eyes—then all grew dark and I knew no more.

"'By Jove, what a narrow squeak, but he's coming round now, doctor,' I heard a well-known, hearty voice say, and opening my eyes I saw Forrester's handsome face bending over me. I felt very weak, and my body ached all over, but some brandy partially restored my energies, and in a husky voice I whispered:

"'Where am I? What are you doing here, Forrester?'

"'You're at No. 8, Princess Street, E.—one of Harman's charming abodes,' answered Forrester lightly, 'and I came to arrest the old ruffian, but he's passed beyond earthly justice.'

"'What do you mean?' I asked hoarsely.

"'He's dead,' replied my fellow detective, 'died of heart disease, the doctor here says.'

"'Heavens! what a shock it was to me when, on opening the door, I saw you hanging there, and Harman dancing about, chuckling and muttering to himself in a horrible manner. As we entered (I had brought two policeman with me, for I knew what a tough customer the fellow, old as he was, would prove) Harman uttered a wild yell and fell dead. I cut you down, and had a doctor summoned, but I was afraid we were too late. You are better now, though, aren't you?'

"'Oh, yes,' I returned, and with Forrester's help, contrived to sit up, a shudder passing over me as I saw a form lying prostrate upon the floor, and thought how nearly Harman's vengeance had been accomplished.

"And now," said Hawthorne, as he re-lit his cigar, "you can understand what my feelings were when I heard of my rescuer having been almost murdered. Ah! Poor young Forrester!"

"AND here am I," finished up the big man in the club's biggest chair, "left with this confounded slip of paper in my pocket—'I promise to pay, before the first of July, the sum of three thousand pounds,' while Sainter is travelling as hard as he can to the other end of the world. If I ever meet the fellow again I'll shoot him on sight."

"Better not," said the untidy little man with the scraggy hair, who wrote stories, "he might just be going to pay you. Let me see the paper, will you? 'I promise to pay, before the first of July—' Hallo, where's the date of the year? I declare he's forgotten to put it down. You believe me, old man, he will turn up one of these fine firsts, and pay you every penny. Sainter is a man of honour."

The lawyer opposite chuckled, and rubbed his hands

"It is a nice point," he exclaimed, "a very nice point."

"Isn't it?" said the writer. He was thoughtful for a moment, and then he left the room.

The next evening he came into the club with a jaunty step, and a roll of manuscript in his pocket. The men knew what that meant, and began talking hurriedly so as not to give him a chance.

"I wonder what old Sainter's doing," said the big man.

"I have been thinking," said the lawyer, who had thrown himself back in his chair and was looking at the ceiling, "about that point that was raised last night."

"So have I," said the writer, 'in fact I've written a little story about it."

He unfolded his manuscript, and without a blush, began reading it out.

There was a commotion in Scratch Gravel on the morning of June 23rd, 1875. Jack Langworthy, a local celebrity, had killed a tenderfoot, and there was naturally some curiosity, not to say excitement, over the affair. The circumstances of the case were this: Jack and the tenderfoot were having a little game of cards, when the former noticed a slight deception on the part of his adversary in the way of dealing himself from one to four cards too many and concealing them in his coat sleeve.

"Sich proceedings are entirely foreign to the customs of this yere camp," finally remarked Langworthy, and at the same time sent a pistol-shot into the tenderfoot. The ball passed diagonally through the head from the base of his left ear, and, ranging downwards, made a final entrance into the side of a whisky barrel, which stood in one corner of the room.

"You'll lose some of yer whisky if you don't regulate the hole I've just made in that 'ere barrel," quietly remarked Jack to the proprietor of the place, adding parenthetically, "and it's good liquor, too."

As for the tenderfoot—well, he was dead.

The rude law of Scratch Gravel took cognisance of the fact, and also of the manner of his death, and Jack was arrested. A few weeks later he was arraigned for the murder, and pleaded guilty. The Judge sentenced him to be hanged. Then Jack made a speech. Among other things, he said:

"I killed the man, I know, and perhaps it's fair enough that I should die too. Leastwise, I don't set up my judgment agin that of the Court. The laws of Scratch Gravel should be inforced, but just now I'm sort o' sorry the inforcement is necessary. The deal is a hard one, and the worst of it all is that the roughness is not agin me alone—oh, no, not agin me, but Sally and the twins. I don't care for myself—just as soon go as not—but when I think of the twins I think—I think, by mighty! I'll have to tell you I can't stand it. You see, the twins are boys—both boys—and they are a fine pair an' no mistake. I allers reckoned on the twins mounting to something in the world, but if their father is to be hanged—that settles it. What would the twins ever amount to then? Now, if I could go some other way it wouldn't look so bad—the twins might pull through—but to be strung up like a common thief, it would be a weight on them 'ere twins that 'ud keep 'em down for ever. So you see it ain't for myself that I care—not fer me and not fer Sally so much, either, although I do kinder like the old gal—but the twins. Well, it breaks me all up to think of leaving 'em, it does for a certain fact. Jedge, when will the performance take place?"

The unfortunate man was informed that the 10th of July was the date fixed for his execution, and that he should make preparations to be on hand at that time punctually, so as not to delay the proceedings.

"You see, Jack," said the Judge familiarly, "we ain't goin' to be mean enough to lock you up, not you—it wouldn't be right—not with an honourable man like you. It ain't fer any dislike fer you or bad feeling that we're going to hang you, Jack, but it's the law, you know, the law. So you'll make it a point of honour, Jack, to be on hand when the time comes."

For the next week Jack stayed at home nearly all the time. Occasionally some of his friends would drop in to ask about his health and the health of the twins. The slightest mention of the latter would set his tongue in motion, and somehow he seemed to think there were no other children in the world worth talking about.

"They'll pull way ahead of their old dad in a few years," he had often said. "Maybe one of 'em 'll be an auctioneer or a bank president, and the other a steam-boat captain—who knows? Them twins are smart."

It was the month of June. Wonderfully bright the sun shone, wonderfully sweet the birds sang, wonderfully grey and bare and cold were the distant mountains. It seemed to Jack that all creation was smiling over his misfortune and mocking him for a coward who was afraid to die.

One evening, just a week prior to the date fixed for his execution, he seated himself on a boulder near his cabin door and took the twins in his arms. The little fellows climbed all over him. One of them put his brown arm round the paternal neck and pulled the grizzly hair and beard with his chubby fingers. Then looking into the upturned face, he said sorrowfully:

"There's water in your eyes, daddy. What's the matter?"

Jack put the child down rather roughly, and remarking as he brushed his eyes, that the "'skeeters war mighty troublesome that evening," he walked into the house.

The 10th of July arrived. In the morning, quite early, Bill Drake, an old-time friend of Jack's, came to see him.

"Seems like thar ought to be some way to get out of this," remarked Bill.

"I'd just as soon go," said Jack, half apologetically, "ef it wasn't fer the twins. You see, I've sort o' banked on them twins fer a long while. I reckon thar'll be a good turn out at the gallus, Bill."

"You wouldn't slip away, would you, Jack?" whispered Bill, with a strange light in his eyes.

Jack reached for his revolver.

"I don't want to shoot you, Bill," he said fiercely, "but I'll do it, sure, if ye repeat that insult. Thought ye knew me better than that. I'm ashamed of ye."

"But you don't understand me!" exclaimed Bill excitedly. "Listen! The Jedge sentenced ye to be hanged the 10th of July, but he forgot to name the year! The 10th of July ten years from now will do, or longer. He only said the 10th of July!"

"But he meant to-day," said Jack, trembling in every limb.

"But he didn't say it. You may suit your own convenience about the year, Jack. For yer own sake, and for the sake of the twins, skip."

There was much disappointment that afternoon among the citizens of Scratch Gravel when it was discovered that Jack was gone. A search was made of his cabin, but there were no signs of Sally, Jack, or the twins. They were all gone for good.

And now comes the strangest part of this story. The 10th of July five years later a grey old man, bent nearly double, thrust his shadowy form into the presence of the chief magistrate of Scratch Gravel, and demanded a hearing.

"I am Jack Langworthy," he said, "and I have come back according to promise to be hanged. You see, the twins are dead—both dead, and Sally, she's gone too—ran away with another man, and now I've come back to meet the requirements of the law. There has been some delay, I'll admit, but I was bound to come back some time, and here I am."

The laws and customs of Scratch Gravel had changed somewhat since Jack departed from the place five years before, and as the affair in which he was interested was no longer a sensation of the day, he was simply told to leave the town as soon as possible. He went at once, and the last seen of him alive he was tramping slowly out of town with his face towards the setting sun.

A little later in the year, when the chapparel bushes began to shed their leaves and the vines that tumbled over the grey rocks were touched with frost, the fleshless frame of a man was found suspended from a rock over a deep ravine.

It was Jack Langworthy.

The author looked up with a smile of triumph.

"You see," he said, "Sainter may turn up one day——"

But the room was empty.

KEY TO JUMBLED STORY No. 7.]

THE AUTHOR OF "DREAMS."

I HAVE always taken a particular interest in the toilers of the street.

I watch them as they stand on the pavement and shiver in their rags; as the fierce rain pours down on their ill-clad bodies. Some of them have their stories.

I once knew one of these miserables who had an Eton and Christ Church education, and who had won by his brain almost every honour it had been possible to obtain.

And what is more this man was the author of "Dreams," that is to say he was the writer of one of the finest works that ever mortal penned.

For twenty years I had known him to be selling matches at his position in Fleet Street without missing a day.

During that time I had become so acquainted with him that occasionally I persuaded him to take me to his rooms in a back slum off the Strand.

I would bring him a bottle of port, or some of my old whisky, and we would light a fire and chat together.

It was a sultry day in July when I noticed that for the first time the old man was absent from his post; a friendly policeman, whom I cultivated, informed me that the old match-seller had been taken ill on the previous day.

I made a few purchases, and went round to his room.

As I was going up the rickety staircase, a strange thing happened.

A tall, well-dressed man was coming down, wearing a long black coat.

He had a mass of dark wavy hair hanging on his shoulders, a white face, with high, intellectual-looking forehead.

It was the reputed author of "Dreams!"

I pulled my hat over my eyes, and waited until he had passed. Then I ran up to my friend's room.

"Did you see him," he cried, almost before I had entered. "That man who went down? He was my brother."

The old man fell back on the pillows, and seemed exhausted.

My friend noticed the incredulous expression on my face.

Presently he told me his story.

"When Geoffrey and I were young men we worked together in a firm in the City. That was long ago.

"I was ever a dreamer, and, although I plodded away at my work, I was not brilliant. With my brother it was different, and he was soon to be made a partner. I was thinking all day and all night; thinking and dreaming; occasionally I wrote down my thoughts. These were afterwards published in a book. It was called 'Dreams.'

"One day a cheque was missing from our office. It is the old story. I was suspected, although I was not accused; I felt that all eyes were upon me as I went about my duties. I did not mind, for I was thinking about the last chapters of my book.

"I was working in my room one evening, preparing the manuscript for the publishers, when the door opened, and my brother stood before me. I see him now, as he stood there in the open door, and pointed an accusing finger towards me.

"'Thief,' he hissed between his clenched teeth. 'You—a thief. You, a Montgomery, a low down thief!'

"'Geoff,' I cried, 'believe me——"

"He interrupted me with a gesture.

"'It is no good,' he said, 'for you to deny it. I know everything. I have collected proofs. Answer me this: What were you doing at the hour when the cheque was stolen?'

"It was impossible for me to say. I was tongue-tied. Oh, the agony of it! But a woman's honour hung on my silence. You know her, perhaps. The heroine of 'Dreams.'

"'Well,' the old man continued, 'that woman's honour depended on my silence. And so I could answer nothing. I was entirely in my brother's power. By speaking he could ruin me. My career, not yet begun, would be cut off. I fell at his feet.

"'I will give you everything that I possess,' I cried in an agony of fear. 'You may have anything that you ask for. I will sell you my soul——'

"'Pish!' he interrupted brutally. 'I would not rob the Devil. There is only one way by which you may be saved.'

"I looked up eagerly. Anything that would prevent inquiry, and preserve a woman's honour—you know her I think you said, she was the heroine of 'Dreams'—there could be no price too high to pay for that.

"'There is only one way by which you may be saved,' my brother repeated. 'There is only one thing that I will take from you. That is—your book.'

"The old man pressed his hand to his forehead.

"I went to a drawer in my table, and handed him the manuscript.

"He took it, and without a word left the room.

"My surprise may be imagined when the next morning I received my dismissal from my employers. They suspected me of stealing the cheque. My brother had forgotten to speak for me. But I did not care. Nothing had been found out, and I was shielding a woman's name.

"A few weeks later she passed me in the street. I was selling matches. She looked at me with pity, and then she threw me a copper. I have kept it, you see, in that little velvet case on the wall. It is all that I have to remind me of her.

"You saw the man who went out just now. He was my brother.

"He wanted to know whether I had ever written another book. He said that if I sold it to him he would let me have all the profits. He was very kind and generous. I wonder why?"

This is the match-seller's story, and it seemed to have exhausted him. There is yet the sequel to be told.

It will be remembered that Geoffery Montgomery had published nothing since his one great work. One day he wrote an ode to an actress.

She, poor girl, being in sore need of money, took it to the editor of a certain magazine. He paid her £100 for it, and then spent half his fortune in advertising it.

The magazine was an obscure little publication, but its circulation for the next week was as much as that of all the rest of its kind put together.

It was then found out that the poem was the merest twaddle.

The intensest excitement prevailed in literary circles; vague rumours were spread everywhere, The public demanded that the author of "Dreams" should produce something worthy of his reputation.

It was for this reason that he had applied to his brother. The public are still waiting.

PAUPER BLUE BLOOD.

CHAPTER XX.

At John Reginald's Door.

Sefton was staying with his mother and Eva, when he received an invitation from his uncle, Lord Macphairson, to shoot in Scotland. No mention was made in the letter of Georgina. Sefton was asked alone, just as in his bachelor days.

Had he cherished the slightest regard for his wife or her feelings, he would have resented the slur upon her, and accordingly refused. Instead, it rather pleased him than otherwise—he felt so thoroughly with his uncle for disapproving of the present Lady Ravenscroft.

Lord Macphairson was his mother's only brother, and heartily shared her dislike of the late governess. This raised him in Sefton's eyes, increasing his respect to admiration. There was no humbug in his uncle Oliver, and he accepted the invitation to Laurieston Hall, to the Dowager Lady Ravenscroft's great delight.

"I can't tell you how glad I am you are going," she said. "Of course you know as well as I do how plainly your uncle stated his disapproval of your marriage, but Oliver has always been a good brother to me. I like to think that he and my boy are friends."

Sefton always improved in health when away from Georgina. Her presence seemed to absorb his vitality and, vampire like, bereave him of strength. His brain, too, grew clearer in her absence, and his mother had no idea of the tricks it too frequently played him. As yet his self-control was strong, and he was clever enough to conceal the infirmity that occasionally turned him livid with fear. He could not get over having imagined, as he thought, that never-to-be-forgotten interview with Norah the week before her wedding, and believing it for days together, till facts proved stronger than fiction.

"Of course, it was an illusion of my unhinged intellect," Sefton still told himself persistently.

Norah in the green lane, whispering of love, was no more a creature of flesh and blood than the tall figure of Sir Reginald that had faced him more than once in the study at Ravenscroft Park.

"These little freaks of fancy," he would say in calmer moments, "will land me in a lunatic asylum, if I don't look out. Ghosts!—of course, there are no such things. If I had really seen the spirit of my father when my mind was clear and capable of understanding, I should have fallen dead at his feet. Men do not look on such sights and live!"

This argument was sound enough, and convinced Sefton he occasionally suffered from some malady, probably indigestion.

The day he was leaving for Scotland he received a letter from Georgina, asking him to tell her of his movements.

"If you are not with your mother, let me know," she said, "as it looks odd to my friends if I am ignorant of your whereabouts. We may as well play out the farce to its bitter end, and act the ordinary lukewarm husband and wife, without publishing the fact that now, more than ever, we are strangers. Remember it was not always so, you were only a man and human, and there is a tie between us which will live and grow, year by year, to show that you are mine, and I am yours, the crown of our existence—the child, John Reginald, I hear, is well and thriving. He is not old enough yet to miss his parents. When he comes to years of discretion, which of our two gifts, I wonder, will he value most? The baronetcy he must some day inherit, or the money, which, from his youth up, will bring him the good things of life. We shall see!"

As Sefton crushed the writing in his hand, he felt an ungovernable hatred rise in his heart for John Reginald, because he was not only his child, but Georgina's.

It was too late to answer the letter then, but the following day he wrote from Laurieston Hall.

When upon reading his reply it gradually dawned upon his wife's intelligence that Sefton was actually staying with Lord Macphairson, after the slighting manner in which he had treated her, Georgina's anger and annoyance knew no bounds.

Her outraged sensibilities found vent in a furious epistle penned to her husband at Laurieston Hall, and a fit of sulking, under the plea of a headache, that lasted two days.

It was the final straw—a challenge to Georgina. He had practically snapped his fingers in her face—cast her off—divorced her from her wifehood. She would show him that she could return blow for blow, insult for insult. She was now the stronger of the two, and was under no obligation to her husband.

Henceforth they should be worse than strangers—foes, enemies—each fighting for the upper hand. Georgina's blood boiled, and though she wished her husband dead, she still did not regret having married him.

"Cousin John would never have left me his fortune," she said, "if I had not been Lady Ravenscroft."

The long rigmarole of abuse, emphasised by dashes and ink blots, was opened by Sefton while dressing for dinner in a luxurious apartment at Laurieston Hall. Already the evenings were turning cold, and a cheerful fire blazed in his grate. It was pleasant to be valeted and waited on again hand and foot, to meet old friends and acquaintances who had never even seen Georgina, so did not remind him of her existence by asking after Lady Ravenscroft or her son. His wife was never mentioned in the Macphairson family, and most people believed the Ravenscrofts were separated, or that he kept his wife hidden away, because she was an impossible creature—quite unpresentable!

Before Sefton went down he commended Georgina's execrations to the flames, and banished all thoughts of her from his mind. He knew a party from Castle Dermott was coming to dinner that evening, but had not heard the names of the expected guests previously mentioned.

The drawing-room was full of people as he entered, but it was not till he had glanced round several times that a girlish figure, surrounded by a group of men, attracted his attention. They were hanging on her words, and the sparkling flow of conversation rippling from the beautiful lips seemed vaguely familiar in tone to Sefton's astonished ear.

Her face was turned away, but even as he looked she moved, and a striking profile, well-known, dimmed Sefton's vision. A sudden mist rose before his eyes, and then a voice said at his side:

"May I introduce you to the Duchess of Malvern?"

Norah glanced up and saw him. In a moment the scene flashed before her—of Sir Sefton riding by as she drove beneath the triumphal arch on her wedding afternoon. He, too, remembered the chilling stare he gave her in return for a shy bow and half-hesitating smile. The idea of cutting Norah! His conscience reproached him strongly for his ungentlemanly action.

A moment later he advanced with outstretched hand and greeted the young Duchess in the old friendly strain.

"Why, Sefton!" she cried. "I had no idea you were here," colouring to the very roots of her hair, and then paling as white as her gown.

What a traitor he must think her—what a truthless, weak, unstable flirt!

She moved across the room to a sofa, leaving her other friends and keeping her eyes fixed in openly expressed wonder on Sefton as he talked without constraint.

"How do you like married life, Norah?" he asked in an undertone.

A bright smile broke over her face, it was impossible not to see that she was happy.

"It is quite delightful! I've been having a splendid time. Victor is truly the ideal husband, as far as giving me my head goes. I do just the maddest things imaginable, and he never minds. He is such a nice boy! You see a husband replaces or does away with a chaperon. We are like a set children let loose at Malvern Court. All our friends are young, and we scorn conventionality. I never knew how beautiful it was to be alive until this last summer."

Then remembering how heartless her words must seem, she checked her effervescing spirits.

"You have forgiven me, Sefton," she said, gazing at him pleadingly. "I'm not worth being angry with, and nobody troubles about me, or takes me seriously."

"Forgiven!" he said, "why of course you are forgiven. It is so long ago since you wrote that letter, such a very old score, that it has worn out before now."

Norah was perplexed. What letter could he mean? she had never written since her faithlessness the day his child was born.

But before she could question him, the signal for dinner broke their conversation, a general move was made, and Lord Macphairson offered the Duchess his arm.

Later on, however, when an opportunity arose, Sefton lured Norah into the conservatory, on the pretext of admiring the flowers. His curiosity about himself made silence impossible, and he put the question to her straightly:

"Tell me, Norah, did you meet me about a week before your wedding, in the road outside the gates of Rosemont? Did you promise to break your engagement with the Duke of Malvern? Answer me honestly, yes or no?"

He expected a look of unutterable surprise, and in this he was not disappointed.

Norah gave a little gasp of abject amazement before replying wonderingly:

"How can you ask me? You must know!"

He shook his head. Then with a quick insight into the truth as she caught his puzzled look, and read the confused thoughts that were groping after light, Norah spoke:

"Yes. We met, and I vowed falsely, but as I live I meant to fulfil my promise at the time."

Sir Sefton shook from head to foot.

"Then why did you not?" he asked fiercely, every incident returning with vivid distinctness.

Norah's eyes fell—her lips trembled slightly.

"I heard your child was born—you had him—you had your wife. Was it not enough? A strange revulsion of feeling rushed over me. Why should you ruin my career? I argued. What right had you to come between me and the man to whom I had pledged my word? They talked of your son and heir that night at dinner—how pleased you would be—what joy he would bring in the Ravenscroft household. I was nothing in your life; by your marriage you had thrust me out beyond your reach. I had broken enough hearts. I stayed my hand at Victor's."

A look of love stole into Norah's eyes as she mentioned her husband's name.

The Duke had conquered the frivolous affections of his wife after marriage, and Sefton had lost them for ever. He stood now regarding the Duchess of Malvern gloomily, with jealousy and despair in his face.

Her words had made the recollection of his son bitter to him. So John Reginald came between them just at the crucial moment. John Reginald was to blame for Norah's sudden change. But for his interference she might still have been Norah Cannington, faithful to the memory of their past love, mourning for the heart she so ruthlessly destroyed. He laid his whole grievance at the door of that innocent babe!

The old pangs of misery returned tenfold as the fascination of the fair Duchess's presence wove its deadly web.

"What is he like?" she asked.

"Who?" answered Sefton vaguely.

"The child."

"Oh! I don't know. I have not seen him half-a-dozen times, except at a distance."

Norah experienced a wave of shocked astonishment and disgust.

"You cannot love him, then?"

"There is nothing worth looking at in a bundle of white clothes and a small, indescribable face. I am told he resembles my father, but I see no likeness save a very strong one to my wife."

Sefton laid his hand on Norah's arm as she turned to go.

"I wish to heaven I had not seen you to-night," he muttered. "You are making a devil of me."

"I don't understand," she answered, rearing her head.

"Yes, a devil, Norah, a man who loathes his child, and curses his wife."

She shrank back. His words appalled her. She was accustomed to the rose paths of life, and the prick of thorns was strange and hurtful.

She walked slowly towards the drawing-room, where Lord Macphairson's daughter was singing in a rich contralto. Yet through the passionate accents of her stirring voice, and the wail of a pianissimo accompaniment, the Duchess of Malvern only heard that cruel murmur—"a man who loathes his child—and curses his wife!"

Sefton slept little that night, his brain was too disturbed. He was trying to solve the mystery of his mistaken conclusion in regard to Norah and her broken promise.

"I thought I was mad then, but now I am certain of it," he said, "or I must have known! To confuse facts with fancies is worse than confounding fancies with facts. The latter is excusable if the fancies are vivid, the former merely insanity when the facts are plain."

Norah felt saddened by her interview with Sefton, but the effect soon wore off under the cheerful influence of her husband, and the other guests at Castle Dermott. She avoided visiting Laurieston Hall, after the dinner party, and really hoped that chance would not throw Sefton across her life again.

It was so harassing meeting these discarded lovers—especially when her own heart had suffered sorely at Sefton's hands.

Yet he was not the same as in the past; a very noticeable change had come over him. She could not exactly define it, but a dreadful presentiment whispered that the man she had thought so much of was gradually losing the hold and stay of reason, which would leave him disarmed and defenceless on the battlefield of life.

CHAPTER XXI.

Her Ruling Hand.

Sefton, having no desire to rejoin his wife, prolonged his visit in Scotland, and afterwards went to Ermyn Way.

Georgina ceased corresponding with him, only letting him know by wire six weeks later that she had returned to Ravenscroft Park.

The thought of his home grew daily more distasteful; but eventually a short pencilled note aroused him from these happy-go-lucky hours of leisure to the stern realities of life.

He read it twice before he could fully grasp its meaning.

"You must not return later than the 20th," she wrote, "as I have a large ball, to which all the county people are coming. You see, they are willing enough to take my hospitality now that I am rich, or perhaps they accepted out of sheer curiosity. I think I shall open their eyes.—Your wife, Georgina."

Lady Ravenscroft was correct in her surmise anent curiosity. No one approved of Sir Sefton's wife, but they could not resist her invitation.

"Won't it be nice meeting at Ravenscroft Park again?" they said. "Just like the old days! We could not hurt poor dear Sir Sefton's feelings by refusing. It's really quite a charity to go—his wife has been so cold-shouldered!"

Sefton knew Georgina's hospitality would be received with condescension, and the thought maddened him. At first he decided not to be present, but his pride overcame his momentary inclination. Why should he publish their estrangement to the world? The name of Ravenscroft must be guarded; the tongues of scandal should not be set wagging by his voluntary action. He had sacrificed himself for the family honour, and must bear his burden to the end. His father's last written command ran still in his head. He heard it repeated in the night watches. All the dead Ravenscrofts rose from the family vault to group themselves about his bed. Some of them spoke bitter truths. They whispered that the noble strain was tainted, reminding him that the blood of a Pluff ran in the veins of his heir. He would awake in a burning fever, crying aloud John Reginald's name.

Georgina's independence was a fresh anxiety. It staggered him to hear she had arranged this ball, and sent out the invitations without consulting him. Why, last time he was at Ravenscroft Park it was a funeral! now he must return to dancing, music and frivolity.

"I've got my marching orders," he said to Douglas Shirling, with a gloomy smile. "My wife is giving a ball next week, and this is the first I have heard of it."

He folded the letter, and lit a cigar, with an ill-acted air of unconcern.

"Really," replied Douglas, raising his eyebrows, but purposely speaking in a cheerful tone, "that's rather in your line; you used to be fond of dancing."

"My dear fellow, what I 'used to be' is quite a different matter. Fate has danced all energy out of me."

As Sefton spoke Dr. Merriman joined them and the subject dropped. He heard these last words, however, and when Sefton eventually went off to answer his wife's letter, he turned to Douglas with an abrupt question.

"What's the matter with that chap?"

"Oh, home worries and general depression all round! His wife is rather a trial."

"Ah!" said the sceptical young doctor, rubbing his clean-shaven chin. "These giddy young wives go a step too far occasionally without knowing exactly what they are doing. I should advise Lady Ravenscroft to look out, or her husband will go off his head."

"I say, Merriman, you don't mean that—you're only gassing!"

"Not at all. That's the very last subject I should joke about. I'm making a special study of the brain."

Douglas was silent. He did not like his friend's tone. It was too genuine for chaff.

"Poor beggar!" he said at last. "What an awful thought!"

"I say, Douglas!"

It was Sefton's voice calling him from the library door.

"Yes."

"You'll come back with me for this show?"

He joined Sefton, and closed the door.

"I'm awfully sorry; I wish I could."

"Why can't you?"

"I am booked for the Blandfords, and I can't throw them over."

"No, I suppose not," answered Sefton dolefully, knowing that in the face of such an engagement persuasions or arguments could not prevail, Douglas Shirling being head over ears in love with pretty Dolly Blandford.

"You see, Sef, old man," he continued confidentially; "I am going to try my luck this time."

Sefton grasped his friend's hand and wrung it sincerely.

"You will win her," he said in a perfectly confident tone; "and she'll make you a ripping little wife!"

Then he went back to the writing table, and finished his letter to Georgina.

It was with mixed feelings of excitement and resentment that Lady Ravenscroft awaited her husband's coming. Excitement because she had transformed Ravenscroft Park to her liking—resentment because she could not forgive his visit to Laurieston Hall.

She posed herself in a lazy, lounging attitude on a low divan in the drawing-room, which had been entirely redecorated. Superfluous gilt gleamed in brazen profusion everywhere, while the gaudy blue chairs from Queen's Gate House reared their obtrusive shoulders under the beflowered ceiling.

She could hear the carriage wheels on the drive, the loud clanging of the bell, but she did not rise or go downstairs to meet her husband. She was wondering how the footmen in their powder and silk stockings would impress him.

At last came footsteps up the stairs, the door was flung open by one of the new menservants, who announced to Sir Sefton: "Her ladyship is in the drawing-room."

Was it his old home, this flashy apartment he had always associated with the gentle presence of his mother and her household gods? He felt like a stranger in his own domain. The bright paperings on the walls of the hall and staircase gave the place a tawdry air, instead of its stately old-world appearance, which in the past appealed so forcibly to Sefton's romantic nature.

Georgina gave him her hand, and said: "How are you?"

stiffly, as if addressing a casual acquaintance who had dropped in for afternoon tea.

He waited till the door closed, then his eyes roved round at will.

"Pretty, isn't it?" said Georgina, hoping he was lost in admiration.

"I can't say I admire your taste," he replied. "You've ruined the room! I should hardly know the place, it is so altered, and the whole looks positively vulgar!"

"I thought you would say something pleasant," she sneered. "But I can't wonder at anything after the open insult you offered me in visiting your uncle, Lord Macphairson."

"Tell me, who is coming to the ball?" he asked.

"Everybody!" and an exultant light flashed in her eyes. "See, here is the list."

She handed him a sheet of foolscap. He ran his eye over the names in silent astonishment. So his wife spoke truly, and had forced herself on to Society by the aid of the golden calf.

"I can't remember if I told you it is to be a fancy-dress ball."

Sir Sefton started.

"I hope you don't expect me to dress myself up like a popinjay?"

"Of course you must be in costume. I have ordered a dozen different dresses from town for you to choose from, hired ones, but of the best."

"If I'd known, upon my word I would have left you to hold your revels alone. It is perfectly ridiculous, a set of grown-up people decking themselves out like children, and fooling about."

"Well, your friends quite appreciate the fun; I hear it has caused no end of talk and amusement. Not everybody is so staid and stupid as you! I think the house is immensely improved, and I want to give it a show. Besides, a fancy dress ball is more likely to be noticed by the papers. I have sent the names of the guests to some of the most fashionable periodicals."

Sefton said nothing. He felt abjectly, stonily miserable. His home disgusted him now as much as his wife. The objects familiar in his childhood had been crowded out by John Pluff's modern furniture, all things spoke of Georgina. Her ruling hand was visible at every turn.

When eventually the day of the dance arrived, Sefton felt like a guest in his own home, having been consulted in none of the arrangements. He did not even know what costume his wife would wear.

During the afternoon she asked him which dress he had selected.

"I sent them all back," he replied.

Georgina's brow darkened.

"You are surely not going to spoil the effect by your ordinary evening clothes?"

Sefton smiled a little oddly.

"Oh, no," he said.

She could get nothing more out of him.

The Humpherys had been invited to stay; but this also was not previously mentioned.

Sir Sefton received them courteously, but more than ever felt as if he were on a very boring visit with unpleasant people not congenial to him.

"My dress is divinely picturesque," Georgina confided to Mrs. Humphery. "I'm going to receive all these swell folks in rags, but most bewitching tatters, for all that. I may be an ordinary, commonplace woman, without any looks to boast of, but at least to-night I will be beautiful."

Georgina prophesied truly about herself. She had studied her face for hours before creating her make-up.

She brushed her hair as flatly down as possible, and donned an exquisitely curling black wig, flowing almost to her feet. She had sent it back three times before it suited her to perfection. Then with the addition of rouge, dark eyelashes and rose-leaf powder, Georgina felt she could hold her own amongst the youngest and prettiest girls.

"I feel I've got twice the cheek and the go in me," she told Mrs. Humphery, "when I am touched up. But wait a moment," as her friend went into raptures over the gown, "I am not a true gipsy yet."

She whispered something to her maid, and the girl left the room. A moment later she returned with John Reginald in a basket, his poor little face stained brown, yet wrapped in unconscious slumber. This she slung upon Lady Ravenscroft's back.

An exclamation of delight broke from Mrs. Humphery.

"What a lovely idea!" she cried, "and how sweet that infant looks! Are you going to receive with him across your shoulders?"

"Rather! Is it not a novelty? and such a chance to show off the heir."

"But dear, he will wake to a moral, and cry the house down."

"Oh! no; he won't," replied Georgina confidently, giving Mrs. Humphery a knowing wink. "The basket is all cushioned and comfortable, as good as if he were in his cot."

"Still the talking and the music must rouse him."

"No," drawing her friend aside and speaking in an undertone. "I had a little soothing, and quite harmless, mixture put in his bottle. He will sleep like a top, the darling, till mother has done with him."

Even Mrs. Humphery drew down her lips and looked shocked.

"Drugged!" she murmured, touching the unconscious child.

But John Reginald seemed to smile in his sleep, and his breathing was peaceful and even.

"Was it not a good idea?" said Lady Ravenscroft, as she sailed downstairs.

She met her husband in the hall. For a moment she stared at him in silent horror, then the words broke from her parched lips in deadly terror: "Sefton, is that you?"

He stood so still she could hardly believe he was alive. On the wall hung a painting of Sir Reginald in fancy dress (the costume of a courtier), beneath it his son in the very same garments and wig which long ago had been laid away in sacred remembrance of the dead. That he should have unearthed the clothes and appeared in them to-night horrified Georgina. Tears started to her eyes, for in this pale-faced apparition she saw again her lover of the past.

He watched her emotion with a smile on his hard lips. It pleased him to think he had pained her, as she drew back, and gazed reproachfully upon the faded lace. He glanced from his wife to his child, and thought of Norah. John Reginald's birth had dispelled the love that was still his, and made the wavering girl the wife of another man.

"Have you no feeling," said Georgina slowly, "that you can make sport of your father's memory?"

"None. John Reginald killed my heart," he answered enigmatically.

"John Reginald? What do you mean?"

She asked the question fiercely. Her eyes, with their darkened lashes, looked splendid in the heat of passion. She raised her hand as if she could have struck that rigid figure masquerading as dead Sir Reginald.

"Better not ask," retorted her husband.

He turned away, leaving Georgina gazing at the life-like portrait beneath which he had planted himself at the foot of the stairs.

NERVES AND FIDDLE STRINGS.

I USED to hear a man say that when he got excited his nerves were stretched tight as fiddle strings. No doubt he felt so, but as a matter of fact the nerves are as little like fiddle strings as you can imagine. Still, there is a resemblance in the point of general results: Unless the strings are tight and in tune you get no music from the fiddle, and unless your nerves are in good order we get but small comfort in living.

Hence, when Mrs. Ward says: "My nerves became quite unstrung," we shall agree that it is a good comparison. Yet what malignant power was it that unstrung those white cords wherein depend all our feelings and movements? Possibly we may gather the answer from Mrs. Ward's letter:

"A short time before Christmas, 1889," she goes on to say, "my health began to give way. It was not easy at first to say just what ailed me. In answer to questions of my friends I could only say that I felt tired, fagged, and weary. All my energy and ambition were gone out of me. I did a little work from necessity and habit, but took no interest in it. My appetite had usually been good, but now it failed, until I not only had no desire for food—I loathed the very sight and smell of it. The few mouthfuls I did eat at any particular time gave me intense pain at the chest and around the sides. After even the simplest meal I felt puffed and blown out.

"I got no proper sleep, and in the morning was more tired and exhausted than when I went to bed. I soon got so weak I could scarcely walk, and if I went only a few yards I felt fit to drop down. My nerves became quite unstrung, and sounds which ordinarily I would pay no attention to now worried, startled, and upset me. My mind would conjure up all sorts of absurd notions, having no sense or reason in them, yet I suffered much misery from them. I seemed somehow to have lost the protection which healthy people have against small annoyances; and this I knew was on account of my nerves.

"I will merely say that none of the various kinds of medicines that I took had any effect. Eating little or nothing I got thinner and weaker all the time, and month after month it was just the same. To be sure I could get about in a feeble way, which made the contrast between my condition and that of others appear all the more striking and sad to me. At this time we were living at Ash, in Kent.

"Well, one day in April (1890) I called at Mr. Hill's, the grocer, and fell to talking with his wife about my illness, and how discouraged and miserable I was. She listened to my tale, and then said: 'Mrs. Ward, if I were in your place I'd give up everything else and just take Mother Seigel's Syrup.' Then she told me more of what it had done in complaints that acted like mine.

"On this I got a bottle of Mother Seigel's Syrup, and began taking it. In three days I felt so much better I made sure it would finally cure me. My appetite commenced to pick up, and I could eat without having any pain or distress to follow. Every day I was stronger, and I slept better and better at nights. I was coming to be like my old self; my nerves were all right, and the noises and fancies vexed me no more. After taking three bottles of Mother Seigel's Syrup I was well as ever. You are welcome to publish my letter. (Signed) (Mrs.) J. Ward, Maison Dieu House, Dover, July 9th, 1895."

We see now what unstrung this woman's nerves. It was a trouble of the stomach—the disease invariably known as dyspepsia, in which the poisons from the fermenting food in the stomach are carried to every part of the body, the nerves suffering with the rest. The nerves were half starved, too, and no hungry nerves can be sound, strong nerves.

Hence, if we would have healthy nerves we must have a good digestion; and it is by giving us healthy digestion that Mother Seigel's Syrup has come to be so famous as a remedy in nervous complaints.

THE SINGING FISHERS.

"A FINE sight, is it not, monsieur? but not without sadness."

It was the Curé who spoke, tall and lean, with a thin, ascetic face, and a crop of silvery hair brushed back under his broad-brimmed hat. He was always to be seen in his well-worn soutane moving about among the fisherfolk, exhorting, and commending, nor disdaining to crack his little joke with some burly patron or wizened old sea-dog.

The boats were putting to sea, and now especially was he sought after for final hand-shake and benediction.

I was vainly trying to sketch the scene of life and colour and movement, trying to fix on my canvas the masses of boats, with their tanned sails and painted masts.

"Yes, mon père," I made answer, "and it is quite beyond my feeble efforts." As I spoke I had to move my easel to make way for a string of burly Jacques and Simons, staggering along with a heavy warp which was the last to hold some stout trawler to the old quay.

A fresh west breeze was blowing across the old grey roofs of Tréport, the tide was high, and the heavy-built smacks were grinding and bumping against the quay as they got under weigh. The great sails flapped, patrons shouted frantically to their crews on board and on the quay, and ropes ran creaking through the blocks as each vessel set her canvas, and cast off her warps.

All was hurry and giant effort. The sun streamed down on painted mast and hull; green, scarlet, and bright blue rails and blocks; on scrambling crews in guernseys and tanned overalls, while above the great sails swung to and fro, or bellied out with a crash as they caught the pouring wind, and forced each vessel through the smooth green water, out between the wooden piers, to where the white horses were tumbling in the wind-swept channel.

Along the quay the women in their short kirtles and quaint caps were helping their menfolk, pulling and hauling with no mean strength, and even assuming the direction of operations. Here an old crone hobbles in her clattering sabots with Jacques' great sea-boots under one arm, his vin ordinaire under the other; here a good wife pushes back the crowd with an officious "s'il vous plaît, messieurs," and proceeds to demonstrate her importance by issuing commands to a string of buxom mothers and laughing lasses who are helping to put a huge trawl-beam on board her good man's vessel.

As the old priest and I watch the scene together, a big curly-haired lad swings himself into the rigging of the vessel nearest the quay, and as he drops to the deck, turns his laughing, sunburnt face in our direction and waves his béret with a farewell gesture. Beside us stands a girl in her quaint Picardy cap and short kirtle, her eyes following intently his every movement.

"Ah, Jeannot," she says, so low that he cannot possibly hear, "be careful, mon ami." Then to my companion: "Mon père, they are so rash, and now they fear nothing; it is we who stay behind that suffer; we who have to await their return with every anxiety. But he is a good lad, my Jeannot, is he not, mon père?"

The old priest shook his head kindly. "Aye, aye, Marie," he said, "as good as most of them—here to-day and gone to-morrow, gay and careless, thinking only of the moment. They tell me at least they are not dull on the St. Firmin with your Jeannot—a gay rascal—always joking and singing. They have all followed his example, and sometimes they sing hymns, but that I am afraid is not often; and thou hast had a hand in this, little one, for I hear thou hast put on Jeannot a promise that he will sing the Fisher's Hymn when things go badly with them—hein!—is that so, little zealot?"

"True, father! but le bon Dieu knows if he will keep his promise at all. Aye, even when the sea is angry and they catch nothing."

"Well, well! may they have good luck in their fishing, and I suppose I shall be marrying you up at the old church when he comes back from sea!"

With a blushing "Yes, my father, when he comes back!" Marie leaves us to hurry to the pier-head and wave a farewell to her beloved.

The St. Firmin is one of the last boats to make her way down the harbour. As she passes the little Calvary on the jetty, I notice the patron at the tiller, and the crew clustered round the mast, among them Jeannot, doff their caps and cross themselves, there is a last wave of the hand to the women gathered on the pier, and presently the St. Firmin is plunging her blunt nose into the breakers on the harbour bar. Long after the little vessel had become a mere leaning shadow on the plain of waters, I saw the girl Marie, the last to leave the old pier, watching the tossing shape, her eyes filled with a world of sadness.

Some few days after, at eventide, I was passing the old church overlooking the quay. The poor folk were flocking up the steps, old wives and young widows, with here and there a grey-haired veteran and a few children wandering aimlessly. I followed them through the lofty porch; the quaint interior was unlit, save for the sanctuary lamp and a few candles in front of a side altar.

The St. Firmin is plunging her blunt nose into the breakers.

One by one the little congregation clattered up the aisle, presently the organ boomed forth its mellow notes, and the salut proceeded. Those around me, praying with a moving piety, were one and all related to the fishermen now far out on the wild North Sea, and few among them but had learned to dread that sea as their worst enemy. They sang a quaint hymn in their patois French with a strange old-world melody, but I could only gather from the words that this was the fisher's song of which I had heard.

One woman's voice, sad and sweet, caught my ear. I turned, and in the dim light, I recognised the slight figure of Marie. She raised her head, her lips trembling with a passionate earnestness in prayer, as she half leaned, half knelt on the old high backed prie dieu. My thoughts went out to the sea, and, with the old chant ringing mournfully in my ears, I wondered if Jeannot remembered her last behest.

The music ceased, the lights went out one by one, and slowly the poor folk returned to the world and its cares.

As I passed down the steps to the quay, the oil-lamps flickered with the fitful gusts of the wind; the light was fast fading, but one gleam of the parting day threw up the horizon with an angry light, against which showed black the shapes of several fishing-vessels pitching wildly as they made for the little lighthouse which watched over the entrance to the port.

The old Curé passed me in the twilight. "Ah, monsieur!" he said, "a wild night, is it not? Aye! aye! I have seen that look in the sky too often not to know what it means: bad weather to-morrow, and a rough time of it for all our lads at sea. Le bon Dieu send them safe back." With a gentle "good-night!" he hastened on and left me.

As he had foretold, the next day broke grey and wet. A westerly gale was driving the white horses in tumbling masses up channel, to shatter themselves into sheets of spray against the shuddering black timbers of the old pier. The warning flag was flying from the little lighthouse which stood out stolidly and bravely amidst the mad waste of waters all around.

A few struggling smacks, under a shred of canvas soddened with wet, were making for port, and presently came surging in, swept from end to end as they crossed the bar, their crews in glistening oilskins holding on to the rigging for dear life.

I recognised Marie among the little group of women huddled together for company at the foot of the pier, and gazing anxiously seaward.

But I knew the St. Firmin was not among the lucky vessels which had been near enough to run for shelter when the gale broke. In the old town the air was salt with the driven spray, and many a tile from the peaked roofs came clattering down to the cobble-stones.

For three days the gale lasted, and on the fourth day the storm-driven fishers began to return slowly as if wearied, and there were few but showed some marks of their long struggle with the waters. Many did not come back for days, and then creeping along with the scant shred of canvas the winds had left, and in some cases with their little crews sadly diminished in number.

The fair days rolled by, and each afternoon the women, young and old, borne down with sorrow, and weary of waiting, climbed the hill of the Calvary behind the town.

Far out on the leagues of blue sea were the brown sails of the boats going their different ways, but the St. Firmin was not among them.

At length I finished my sketches and got together all my impedimenta to return to England, and one beautiful evening sailed out from the little port to take the mail-boat at Dieppe. As we passed between the wooden piers for the last time, I saw Marie and the aged parents of Jeannot, bound together with a common dread, gazing out across the calm sea, but among the few vessels we passed working slowly in with their sweeps, still I could not see the missing one. The bells were ringing for salut in the old church on the quay, and within its grey walls I knew that the hymn of the fishers would be sung with a new and keener sadness.

* * * *

The following autumn I was sketching on the Suffolk coast, working my way along from seaport to fishing village, setting up my easel wherever fancy led me.

At the close of a dull day I was walking along the sand-banks, at the edge of the flat land which borders the North Sea. The day had been stormy and changeable, and now the sun was setting behind the marshes and banks of reeds, and against it a few clumps of trees were breaking the level of the skyline. The wind had gone down, and though the banked-up clouds still seemed threatening, a strange calm had settled across land and sea, and nothing was heard save the low sigh of the retreating tide and the cry of a gull, floating with poised wings over the glistening sands.

I was nearing a little fishing hamlet, and stopped to light a pipe, and put down my sketching case. Close to me, lounging against a battered capstan, was a rugged old seaman who looked at me inquiringly.

"It's turned out a quiet evening after all," I remarked.

The old mariner gave a keen look over the sea, removed his pipe, and rubbed a horny hand across his lips, before he made reply.

"Ay, it's coom over calm, but I dunno as it'll last! you be goin' to village?"

I answered in the affirmative, and we set out together, my companion lurching along with a true seafarer's gait. I suppose the silence of the evening impressed us, for neither spoke, and my thoughts went back to that evening at Tréport when I last saw Marie and the old folk still waiting on the pier for Jeannot.

I wondered if he had returned and if perhaps even now the two re-united were singing the Fisher's Hymn in the old grey church. The notes of the melody came back to me, but I could not remember the last few bars, and racked my memory for some little time in puzzled silence. We reached the village churchyard on the edge of the shore, just a quaint scattering of white stones, rounded by rain and spray, and patched with lichen. A little Saxon church stood in the corner, unaltered through the centuries, as if mounting guard between the dead and the sea. Our way lay through the churchyard, and as we went down the path, between the mounds of rolling turf, again the Fisher's Hymn recurred to me with startling vividness; it was even as if some voice in the air, near, and yet distant, had sung it. I slackened my pace, and my old companion noticed my hesitation.

"Seems like as if ye were listening to summat," he said inquiringly, giving me a keen glance from under his eyebrows.

"No! no! it was nothing," I said, and walked on, puzzling at my fancy; but he was not to be put off. "Like someone a-singin'?" Again I stopped, but the melody seemed to go on, rising and falling with its weird cadence on the still air, waxing stronger and dying away as the wind seemed to carry it to our ears. It reached the part I had forgotten, and I wondered vaguely whether it would stop, but no! rising louder and louder I heard the voices of men singing, I even fancied I could catch some words of the patois French which I had never remembered before. "What is it?" I cried. "Do you hear nothing?" The old sailor shook his head gravely.

"Folk do say that there's some as sings over yonder, but thee hears it?" eagerly.

"Yes," I said, "where does it come from?"

He led me a short way across the turf, the hymn ever growing stronger and clearer, and with an imploring note in it, such as I had never heard, till at last it reached the end, and with a long-drawn wailing "Amen," it ceased, and again all was still. In front of us at the head of a grave was a quaintly wrought iron cross, such as may be seen in any country churchyard in Normandy and Picardy. Instinctively I uncovered, and stooping down, read the following painted on the cross in rough characters: "Priez pour le répos des âmes du capitaine Jean-François Plouhon et de l'équipage du bâteau pêcheur 'St. Firmin' du Tréport qui a fait naufrage le 28 Septembre 18——"

"Cut the trawlerman nigh in halves."

Marie and the old folk had waited in vain.

The sailor and I stood for some minutes by the grave and then moved away in silence; but I still seemed to hear that far-away hymn, like an echo, trembling on the air.

"How did it happen?" said I. "How came these poor fellows to be buried here?"

The answer came slowly: "Five o' their bodies was washed up at Overstrand. Three died on board the steamer as run down the French trawlerman. Sex o' them still lies at the bottom o' the sea."

"So there was a collision?"

"Aye, sir, I was aboard the steamboat, the Kestrel, from Bremen for the Tyne. We wor two days out and near the trawlin' grounds. 'Twas my watch on deck, and I was on the look-out. It blew hard from the west for three days before, and the wind was on'y just lightenin'. We'd passed several trawlermen, some of 'em furriners, an' I was a-kapin' a sharp watch for 'em; a rain-squall blew over sudden an' yo' cudden't see anything twenty yards from the ship, it was that dark. Seemed to me like I wor' hearin' someone a-singin' out ahead, an' after a bit I asks another o' the watch if he could hear it. 'Ay,' ses he, 'plain, like as if they was singen' a psalm or such-like; some o' they furriners, I reckon.'

"We was just a-goin' to hail the bridge and tell 'em, when we sees the trawler wi' no lights burnin' not thirty yards ahead. We both see her together, and sings out, but 'twas too late! The old Kestrel was rippin' through it a good eleven knots, and cut the trawlerman nigh in halves. She sunk like a stone. We lowered a boat and picked up three poor fellows; but they wor' spent, and didn't live long, any o' them. We buried 'em here in the churchyard wi' those as was washed ashore, and their poor folk over in France sent over that iron cross as yo' seen. Nat Hensby as sailed wi' me in the Kestrel, he comes fro' these parts, and heard the singin' same as yo' did. He says 'tis the same as the poor Frenchmen wor' singin' when they wor' run down. Parson says 'tis nowt but the wind soughin'."

The old sailor stood as if listening, but we heard nothing but the soft rise and fall of the sea, and the rustle of the wind through the long grass of the little garden of sleep.

"Nay, sor," he mumbled, "stranger nor that, stranger nor that. Seems like there's things as folk'll nivor understand this side o' the grave."

He looked at me as if seeking my opinion, but I answered nothing, and presently with a genial "good-night, sor!" still shaking his head doubtfully he left me.

The day was nearly done. One last glimmer of light lay just above the dark line of the North Sea, and my thoughts went out across the leagues of cruel water to the quaint Picardy town nestling between the cliffs.

The old folk were just coming out of church, with the hymn still ringing in their ears—as it was in mine. Marie had waited in vain for the return of her fisher, but I wished she knew, as I did, that in the cold grey dawn, when the crew of the St. Firmin went to their death, Jeannot had kept his promise.

THE PRETTY GIRL IN THE HANSOM CAB.

In London, not many hundred yards from the rows of tall houses and trim squares which contain all that is most respectable in Bayswater—and very awe-inspiring that respectability is—lie some very gloomy, very dirty, and very much neglected slums, which, if they do not contain as large a proportion of the criminal classes as do some of the courts and alleys of the East-end, contain a good many members of that class whose means of living are too precarious to leave their integrity absolutely above suspicion.

Charlie Farrington felt this as he picked his way through the puddles, and wished he had waited half-an-hour for his train at Latimer Road instead of making a short cut. He had been playing the banjo, with a view to relieving the monotony of the slum-dwellers' existence, at a penny reading—so called because nobody read and admission was free—organised by the energetic incumbent of St. Cuthbert's.

Short cuts, as everyone knows, are often the longest ways; and Charlie very soon found himself in a blind alley between two dark rows of squalid cottages, with a blank wall, four costermongers' barrows, and a heap of rubbish at the end, which last he could feel and smell only. He now began to wish that he had taken his wife to the penny reading, in which case they would have gone home together in a hansom; whereas now he was trying to return on the cheap, as a dutiful young husband should. There were some very nasty-looking customers slinking out of that cottage—should he ask them the way? Better not, perhaps. A banjo is not an effective weapon, and he was all alone, and had his gold watch and chain on, given to him by his friends at the bank when he married. If only he could get a cab now! And then, as if in answer to his wish, there came a hansom trotting into the blind alley till the horse nearly struck the wall at the end with its head, and the driver pulled it back on its haunches.

A pretty girl was in the cab. She saw Charlie by the light of the lamps, and called out in a frightened voice: "Can you tell me where I am, sir? I think the driver is taking me the wrong way."

The driver was turning his horse rapidly, and using the whip.

"Where do you want to go?" said Charlie Farrington going to the horse's head, and standing there.

"To Chester Square."

"Where from?"

"Vicarage Gate."

Charlie Farrington whistled to himself. He stood where the driver could get a full view of his stalwart frame by the light of the cab lamps. He was six feet two in his stockings, an ex-captain of a football club, and he said to the driver:

"Look here, my friend; this is not the way to Chester Square, and you know it."

The man grunted that he had lost his bearings.

"Then you had better find them again," said Charlie drily; "or you'll have a cup of tea with me. Will you allow me to come with you?" he continued, raising his hat to the girl in the cab, and as she said nothing, he got in and sat beside her.

She trembled and clung to his arm, which he rather liked. "Where was he taking me to?" she said.

"Due west instead of south," he replied.

"Should I have been robbed and murdered if you had not come?"

"I don't know. I always thought yarns about wicked cabmen and their victims were all nonsense till now. Certainly it looked rather queer."

"I've heard they sometimes stab you through the little trap," she said, clinging still more closely to him in her agitation and apparently going to faint.

"I never knew them to do anything worse than look down," he answered, thinking of his engaged days.

"Curious," he continued; "very curious. You say you came from Vicarage Gate, and I could have sworn I saw this grey horse and cab with yellow wheels standing outside the concert-hall I've been singing at."

She did not answer. Was she really going to faint? How awkward—he had better put his arm round her waist to steady her. A jolt made her lurch very near him, and he felt the little gloved hand fall upon his. He pressed it slightly for a few moments; then he thought of Mrs. Farrington sitting up waiting to give him his whisky-and-soda, and he repented it and dropped it. Still he rather enjoyed the drive; more perhaps, than his good little wife would have done, if she had seen him. The driver evidently was on his best behaviour, and was taking them straight to Chester Square. "I shall write down the man's number and inform the police of this," he said presently; "what is it, 00156?" the little plate was rather blurred and hard to read inside the cab. "I'll call a policeman now, I think, and take you on in a fresh cab."

"Please don't," she said quickly, though in a rather timid voice; "the truth of the matter is, my people think I have been in the country for the day; but I have really been to see a friend whom I, who—you know one has private pals. A good fellow like you will understand."

The slang rather jarred on Charlie Farrington, and the voice was not quite a refined one.

"You mean you would rather have no fuss made?"

"That's it," she answered: "I thought you'd understand. The cabby may have meant to murder me, but to give him into custody and have to give evidence of where I took him from, would be worse."

Charlie looked inquisitively at her. She had ceased clinging to his arm and was lying well back in the cab. Suddenly, she peered out of the window, lifting the little blind at the side to see the houses better.

"Here is the square," she said; "he has come along well: do you mind getting out? We must not drive up to the door together."

He got out.

"Thank you so much," she said, pressing his fingers rather hard. He reciprocated slightly, though he was a young married man, and a good husband, too. "You have saved my life, perhaps."

"Does the driver know your number?"

"Yes. I told him when I got in."

And off she drove.

"She must live right at the other end of the square," said Charlie, as he walked in the same direction, and saw the hansom steadily pursuing its way. "By Jove, they are passing the church! The villain can't be playing more tricks; he must know I should have his number. Phew! I must go home before I do anything. I wish I'd not got out."

And home he went to his little house, and his wife was very glad to see him back so early; but before he could tell her anything about his drive—and he meant to tell her something—she exclaimed: "Why, where is your watch?"

Sure enough, it was gone—presentation watch, chain, and all, and all his money, and his pearl studs, nipped clean off at the setting as if with a pair of shears.

Then he managed to tell his story—more of it perhaps, than he originally intended, for there was some reproach in his wife's eyes as she tried to console him, and they talked over what they should do.

But the constable on duty outside the concert-hall knows nothing of the man who drove a grey horse in a yellow-wheeled hansom, and who was waiting there when the people came out on the night of the penny reading.

And there is no cab licensed with the number 00156.

HARRY ROGERS.

AN ASTRAL EXPERIMENT.

"And may I ask," said Allen, still gazing out of the window into the wet, dreary twilight, while the other man turned about on the piano-stool and looked at his friend's back—"and may I ask how long you have been playing with this nonsense?"

"You may, certainly," returned Grant good-naturedly, clasping his hands about his knees and half closing his eyes; "two months or more."

"And may I ask," persisted Allen, raising his voice a trifle, but otherwise remaining as before, "how long you intend to keep it up?"

"You may," said Grant, smiling slightly and closing his eyes a bit tighter, "and I will answer, as long as I find amusement in it. Come, Allen," he added briskly, as he pulled his trousers up at the knees and leant forward earnestly, "you know quite well there is nothing impossible in this thing. Other people have proved the existence of astral bodies; why, then, do you deny me the possession of one?"

"Deny you?" repeated Allen, turning about slowly on his heel and gazing languidly at his friend, "my dear Grant, I do not deny you anything. Take your astral body by all means—two or three of them if you like—but don't, I beg of you, insist that I shall believe it can be made your messenger and body servant on this earth to fetch and carry material substances like a good dog. The next thing you'll be asking me to do will be to witness the astral portion of your being playing valet for the material part, or else rushing off to town to attend to business, while the worldly half indulges in some worldly pastime, like tennis or golf. Take all the spiritual twins you want, my dear boy: have one for every day in the week, and two on Sunday, if you must, but for Heaven's sake do not expect me to be always on the look-out that I do not step on them or run over them on the stair. And, above all, don't go round the town talking about your experiments like a drivelling idiot, if you want to keep any of your friends."

"As to the last, you need not be in the least alarmed," said Grant, quite unruffled by his guest's remarks, "for I've mentioned this subject to no one but yourself—and as a friend, you know, you never did count. As to the other, I haven't asked you to believe half as much as you say, and I certainly have not declared I could send my astral existence on material errands, for I cannot as yet. That I hope to be able to do so in the future I acknowledge is true; but you needn't be a witness to the performance if you do not care to be, Allen."

Allen shrugged his shoulders and laughed. "Thou wert ever a fool, Grant," said he, "and a faddist of the rankest type. What you haven't had a shy at in the way of odd things isn't worth mentioning. I acknowledge you have achieved some rather startling results with one or two of your weird amusements, but this——" And he shook his head, as if there were nothing further to be said on the subject, while he picked up his hat and umbrella.

"Going?" asked Grant calmly, ignoring what had just been said.

"Yes," returned Allen, "I must be wandering homeward. You'll be round to-morrow will you not? That's a good fellow. It's lonesome now with everyone out of town, and even you and your coterie of astralites are preferable to one's thoughts for company. By-the-way," he added with his hand on the door knob, "if you get that errand-running, material-handling existence of yours trained to do something worth while in a month or so, I speak to manage your tour, for, of course, you'll go on the stage. Au revoir!" and he was gone before Grant could answer. As he ran lightly down the stairs, and out into the wet dusk, the other man turned from the window, where he had stood for a moment, watching him go, and putting his thin hands behind him, he fell to staring at the cheery fire upon the hearth.

"In a month," he repeated thoughtfully, "yes, in a month, or less. For even now——" He paused, straightened himself suddenly, and concentrated his gaze upon the piano at the further end of the room. A moment passed, and then the ivory keys of the instrument were depressed as if by visible hands, and a wild minor chord floated out on the still air. This was followed by another and another, until the strange melody seemed to fill the room. Grant's pale face grew whiter as the seconds passed, and his hands shook nervously at his sides, while his thin lips moved and twitched now and again. Then, as the strains died away and finally ceased altogether, he sank into the chair near him with a hysterical laugh, and wiped the beads of perspiration from his forehead.

When Allen had said his friend was a faddist of the most pronounced type he was not exaggerating matters to any great extent, for certainly no one he knew had dabbled in the Unknown as much as Grant. Hypnotism, occultism and a hundred and one other inexact sciences had been investigated by him, and more than one of his friends had seen cause to remark: "Grant has a finger in every mysterious pie going, and one of these days he will be making a mysterious end of himself." As for Allen, he regularly lost his temper over him, and quite as regularly lectured him on the evil of his ways.

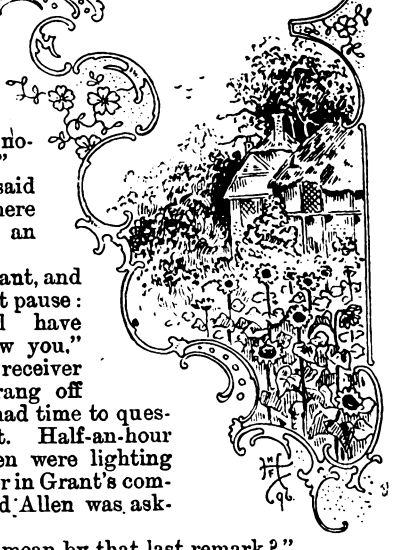
"It makes no difference how you go at it, religiously or otherwise," he would say, with unfeigned impatience, "it is tempting Providence to put an end to you, and that is all there is to it. You're juggling with things you have no business touching, and I tell you you'll get hurt one of these days, as sure as you persist in your foolishness. And because you're a passably good chap when you're in your right mind—which is not very frequent nowadays, Heaven knows!—I want you to cut it all and behave like a sensible animal."

At all of which Grant would smile indulgently, as he always did at Allen's harangues, and answer soothingly: "There, there, old man, don't worry about me; I'll take care of myself."

A month passed, during which the two men saw each other for a few moments each day only at the club. It was that time of the year when Allen was busiest, and he had quite forgotten his last talk with his peculiar friend, when, one evening, just as he was beginning to congratulate himself that the hardest work was over and he would have an evening off occasionally, the telephone rang, and answering it, he found Grant himself at the other end, inquiring if he had forgotten where he lived.

"Certainly not, youngster," returned the older man, "unless you have recently moved."

There is an excellent story by Mr. George Griffith just commenced in "Pearson's Weekly." It is entitled, "Briton or Boer?" and deals with the fight for supremacy in South Africa.



"Then come round and see a fellow, can't you? Come to-night, if you've nothing better to do."

"All right," said Allen; "I will be there in the course of an hour."

"Good," said Grant, and added, after a short pause: "By-the-way, I'll have something to show you," and, placing the receiver quickly up, he rang off before his friend had time to question him about it. Half-an-hour later the two men were lighting their pipes together in Grant's comfortable rooms, and Allen was asking:

"What did you mean by that last remark?"

The other laughed and answered: "Well, I've succeeded in my astral experiment, and I thought you might like to know about it."

"What are you talking about," demanded Allen, in mild astonishment; "do you mean to say you've kept up that idiocy I was lecturing you about a month or two ago?"

"Yes," replied Grant, "and if you want the managership of my tour, as you once hinted, now is the accepted time to apply for it. I've got that astral body of mine to work."

Allen said nothing, but sat looking at the other man as if he doubted his sanity.

"It handles material things," continued Grant quietly, without noticing Allen's disgust, "and does quite as well as a valet. Occasionally we have a difference of opinion, I must admit, but usually we work together in fine style. It acts independently of me at times, or almost so, while——"

"Never mind, old chap," interrupted Allen, placing one hand upon Grant's knee, and smoothing it, "that's all right. You'll feel better in the morning."

"Don't imagine I'm off my head," returned the other, "for I'm quite sane, I assure you. You don't believe it? Very well, I'm here to prove it—in fact, I asked you to come to-night that I might show you how my astral twin gets on. Are you willing to look?"

"Go ahead," said Allen shortly.

"Certainly. Sit perfectly still and watch that magazine upon the piano, for instance; we'll bring it to you," and he turned his gaze upon the book that lay face down twelve feet away. Suddenly Allen, keeping his own sceptical eyes upon it, saw the magazine lifted quietly from the piano and brought across the room, as if by invisible hands and laid on his lap. Grant had not stirred an inch or even ceased smoking. As the book dropped upon his friend's knee, the latter imagined he felt a movement in the air near him like a tiny draught, but in a second it was gone, and he was staring in turn at his host.

"What does—how in——" he began, and then stopped. "I verily believe you are the devil himself, Grant!" he exclaimed at last, picking up the book gingerly and dropping it on the table beside him.

"Not quite," replied Grant quickly, while his eyes seemed to brighten and his voice trembled a trifle with excitement, "but akin to him. Watch the rapiers there next," and turning his deep-set eyes upon the thin swords that hung crossed upon the wall opposite, he held out one hand towards them. For a minute there was a deep silence in the room, and Grant seemed to be having an internal controversy of some sort, for he frowned and shook his head once or twice; but in another moment his face cleared, and a second later the slender weapons of steel were jerked down from their resting place and floated across the space between it and Grant. As they came, he laid down his pipe quietly and held out both hands for them. Immediately the handle of one was thrust into his outstretched palm, but as he reached for the other it was abruptly pulled back, and quick as a flash a savage thrust made at his breast with the point.

Grant saw the blow coming, and sprang aside, and then, like another flash, his own weapon was in position and parrying the succession of murderous cuts and thrusts that were rained at him by the other sword as it leapt about before him.

"Good Heavens!" screamed Allen, springing to his feet, his blood running cold at the strange scene and realising that something was terribly wrong, "what is it, Grant? What are you doing?"

But there was no reply. With perspiration already dripping from every pore, Grant thrust and parried and parried and thrust like mad, while the other rapier, as if possessed of an evil spirit, swung about in mid-air, and strove to get beneath his guard and wound him. Up and down, above, below, it flashed and flashed again while the two slender blades clinked together, one upon the other, and the man, his face wet and eyes filled with a nameless horror, fought desperately for dear life.

Allen, after the first few lightning-like strokes, sank back into his chair and watched the fight with fascinated horror, hardly realising what it meant, yet gathering something of the reason for Grant's evident fear from what he had said before. For several minutes the fierce duel raged, and in the terrible excitement Allen noticed that Grant was wounded in several places. Then suddenly the swords were locked at the guards—an old trick of Grant's—and a second later the bewitched weapon rang upon the floor. As it did so, Grant lunged forward, twice in rapid succession, and the rug in front of him stirred as if moved by a falling body, and then all was still.

Without taking his eyes from the spot, Grant moved backwards until he stood beside the table again.

"The decanter, for pity's sake!" he whispered hoarsely, and, without a word, Allen pushed it across the table to him and a glass after it. Once—twice—thrice—the trembling man filled and emptied the glass down his throat; then he laid the rapier he still held across the table, and turning to Allen, looked at him with an expression that sent the shivers up and down his friend's spine.

"You saw," he said slowly, while his breath came fast and hard.

"Yes," replied Allen, passing his hand over his eyes uncertainly, "but—but——"

"It is hard to understand," finished the other man grimly. "It—we—had a quarrel before you came, and when it saw the chance it attacked me—and you saw the rest."

"But where is——" began Allen, shivering again as he spoke.

"There," answered Grant, pointing to the rug, "there, where it belongs! You cannot see, yet look!"

As he spoke he walked steadily across the room a few steps, and touched the invisible body with his foot. "Yes," he said, with a curious smile upon his deathly white face and lips, "it's safe enough now. Rather odd experience, was it not? A sort of psychological suicide!"

Allen staggered to his feet, and backed to the door. Grant remained motionless, staring straight before him.

"Yes," replied Allen hoarsely, "a kind of soul-death. But if the soul die, what becomes of the——" He paused a moment, and then shrieked: "For Heaven's sake, Grant, are you mad—or am I?"

There was no reply.

Without a sound from its set lips, the body of Grant, who had died upon his feet, fell heavily across the rug to the floor.

CHAPTER XVII.

A DEAD FAILURE.

"HUMPH!" ejaculated Emsworth. "Show her in. We will soon know, Murray," he continued, as the door was closed; "he plays the queen of trumps."

Murray turned cold as he started up, and the next moment, looking eager and bright, Lady Braetoun entered the room.

"Ah, papa dear," she cried——"and Dr. Murray! This is a surprise. I am so glad to see you."

She gave him both hands, which he took awkwardly, and quickly released.

"Can't get up, my dear," said Emsworth, as his child passed one hand round his neck, raising her veil with the other, and kissed him lovingly. "Very tender, my pet, and——"

"What's the matter?" cried Olive excitedly, as she looked from one to the other. "Oh, father, dear, don't say you're ill."

"No, no, can't be very ill, because I made a hearty breakfast. Nothing, my dear; Doctor here's going to set me right."

"But what—what is it?" she cried wildly, as, tearing off her veil, she dropped upon her knees by her father's chair, to clasp her arms about him, and nestle to his breast.

"See this, Doctor?" cried Emsworth, drawing his child closer; "title and fashion and society, and all the rest of it, but she hasn't forgotten her old dad. Gently, my darling, though. Oh!"

"And you don't tell me what is the matter," cried Olive piteously, as her hands began to play about the old man's breast, as if something were broken there.

"No, no, no, my pet," he cried fondly, as his eyes grew a little dim. "Nothing much, only one leg won't go. Been overwound, eh, Doctor?"

"Dr. Murray," cried Olive impatiently; "is that it? You're keeping something from me. Why don't you speak?"

"There is nothing to excite alarm," he said quietly, as he gazed upon the impassioned face before him, with every nerve quivering. "Mr. Emsworth, I will go into the library and write a prescription, and give it to the servant to have made up."

"No, no," cried Olive, springing to her feet and running to a side table, to return with ink-stand and blotting-pad; "write it here. There, there. I'll ring and have it sent to the chemist's at once. The brougham is waiting, and Barnes can go in that."

Murray took a chair at the table, and began writing, while Olive hurried to the bell and rang, before going back to her father, bending over him and kissing him tenderly again and again.

The butler entered, and she held up her hand to him to be silent, motioning to him not to stir, while Emsworth held her hand in his, feeling proud and pleased to be the object of so much solicitude.

There was silence in the room—a silence only broken by the scratching of the Doctor's quill pen.

"That is all," he said, turning to the butler. "Will you have——"

"Yes, yes," cried Olive, running to him and snatching the sheet of note-paper. "Take it at once, Barnes."

"Me, miss—my lady?"

"Yes, you; don't waste a moment. My carriage is waiting, get in, and wait till the medicine is made up, and bring it back yourself."

"Yes, my lady," said the butler smiling, the mention of the carriage in which he was to go having a mollifying influence, and he quite hurried out upon his mission.

"I will say good-morning now," said Murray. "It will not be necessary for me to see you this evening, but if you feel the pain increase, send to me and I will come."

"Oh, Doctor!" cried Olive, "surely you ought to come again. Pray, pray do!"

"I would if it were necessary, Lady Braetoun," he replied in measured tones; "and you must excuse me now. I have patients waiting."

He shook hands hastily and went out, leaving Olive looking piqued.

"If I did not know how good and clever Dr. Murray is," cried Olive petulantly, "I should think he was very careless about you, papa."

"Then you would think very wrong, my dear. He has been here ever so long, and knows exactly what he is about."

"Did you send for him, papa?" said Olive quickly.

"Yes, telegraphed this morning."

"Ah, then it is worse than you both make out, and you're keeping it back from me."

"No, no, my dear."

"But I'm sure you are; and you didn't send for me."

"There was nothing to send about. But you had heard something? No, of course not. What made you come so early? Why, Olive, what is the matter with your lip?"

"This?" she cried, colouring, as she clapped her hand to her mouth. "Oh, nothing: a little accident. Rod was bending over the table, and I went behind him—he raised his head sharply, and knocked against me—that's all."

"Then you did not come about that?"

She shook her head, and looked very conscious.

"There, out with it. What is it?"

"Are—are you well enough to be told, dear?"

"Oh yes, anything. Now then: he has been talking to you about our letters?"

She nodded quickly.

"I expected as much. Well?"

"You are not to be cross, papa dear, because it was my doing to come and see you. Rod is very ill from care and worry."

"Over betting and losing money at races, eh?"

"I don't know—I think not, papa dear," she said caressingly, "but, poor boy, he is dreadfully upset through some man pestering him for seven thousand pounds."

"Yes, and you have come over to ask me to lend it to him."

"No, dear, not to lend it to him, but to enable me to give it to him—my husband—out of the money you settled upon me when we were married."

"Indeed!"

"Yes, dear. You see it looks so foolish for me to have all that money, and yet not have it so that we can use it when we want some."

"That's his opinion, of course."

"No, dear, not only. I think so too."

"Poor, silly little darling! Now, being a man who knows a bit about money, let me see if I can't make you think differently."

"I never could think differently, papa dear, because it is such a peculiar position."

"Humph! and so fresh too, isn't it?"

"I don't know, papa, but it is fresh to me."

"Very well then, look here: I settled one hundred thousand pounds on you, my dear, when you married."

"Yes, papa dear, for both of us."

"The interest or dividends, my dear. We business people don't live on our capital."

"But Roderick is not a business man, papa dear, he is a nobleman."

"Yes, pet, and cuts up his estate and sells it bit by bit, till it is all gone, lives on the proceeds, and when the money is spent he becomes the worst kind of beggar—a gentleman beggar!"

"Papa, don't talk like that, please, of my husband. A beggar!"

"To be sure; he has been begging of me."

"Only for his rights, papa."

"His rights! Ah, those are what the laziest, talking working-men are always mouthing about, what they call their rights. Braetoun has all he is entitled to share with you—the dividends that well-invested money brings in—seven thousand pounds a year. Quite enough with what he ought to have to keep you both in affluence. The capital is yours."

"Yes, papa, I suppose so, but I want to help him by giving some of it entirely to him now that he is in trouble."

"I see. And next month a little more—five or ten thousand—and then a little more, till it is all gone, and the interest with it. And what then?"

"I had not thought about that, papa dear?"

"Well, fortunately, I had, my child. Money is valuable and very hard to get. I made that with which I endowed you by sheer hard work. It is yours, for your benefit, to insure you a comfortable income when I am gone."

"But it would be so much more useful now, dear."

"According to Braetoun's ideas. These are not the same as mine. When I was his age my income was a hundred a year and I saved money. He has a wife with seven thousand a year in her own right; he gets in debt and sends his wife begging."

"He does not, papa," cried Olive indignantly. "It was my own idea, as I told you, to come and ask you to help us."

"If Braetoun had been unfortunate, my dear, I would have helped you."

"But he has been very unfortunate indeed," she cried earnestly.

"No, not in the least. I don't call a man unfortunate who loses his money in gambling. He takes his chance, and loses or wins. One wins: a thousand lose. No, my dear, your settlements are very just and right. The money is carefully tied up, and——"

"But you will untie it just a little for me, dear," she said, kissing him.

"No, not a knot," he said, smiling.

"Papa?"

"You are very fond of your husband, I suppose?"

"Of course," she cried proudly.

"Though he does strike you and bruise your lips."

"What nonsense, dear!" she cried, blushing. "It was indeed an accident."

"And he is very fond of you?"

"He loves me very dearly."

"Well then, tell him from me to show his love for you by remembering that you are his wife."

"How absurd! As if he did not know, papa," she said smiling.

"That's right, my dear; let him keep to that."

"Now you're beginning to be cross, papa dear. You don't know what trouble he is in, or you would not hesitate for a moment."

"But I did know what trouble he was in, before you came, Nolly."

"Oh yes, of course, he wrote and told you."

"But I knew long before that."

"You knew? How? I did not know till this morning, when he was so upset about your letter."

"Perhaps it was as well that you should not, but I did, and you may tell him from me that I know all his affairs better than he knows them himself."

"Oh, papa, this sounds terribly cruel. You don't know how ill and worried poor Rod is through wanting the money."

"I am ill and worried too, as you see, my dear, through knowing that he wants this, and why he wants it."

Olive looked at him in a bewildered way, then she brightened up.

"Papa, dear, let me help you by telling you how to make it all come right."

"Tell me, then," he said, looking at her sadly.

"Untie some of this money that you say is mine; I would gladly give it to make you both happy."

"If I did as you ask it would make me far worse, little woman, and do your husband harm."

"Papa!"

"It is quite true, my dear, and some day you will know it. There, I am a decisive man, and I do not say things lightly. What I say I mean. I am sorry to hurt your feelings and make you unhappy, but not one shilling of my hard-earned money shall go to pay your husband's gambling debts."

Olive looked at him with her eyes full of indignation and reproach, till he made a quick movement, and then uttered a low groan, his face turning sallow, and the drops forming upon his forehead. Then everything else was forgotten in horror and dread, and she caught his hand in hers.

"I'll send for Dr. Murray again," she cried.

"No, no, little one," he said, wiping his forehead; "I'm better now. It was speaking like that brought it on. Go home now."

"But you can't be left like this."

"Oh, yes, I can, my dear. The servants could help me if I was bad."

"The servants! And I not here."

"Yes, and you not here, my dear. You're a married woman now, and belong to someone else. There, kiss your cruel old father and go. You must try and make a better man of your husband."

"Better, papa! He is all that is good and true."

"Very glad of it, my dear; the easier for you to bring him to reason, and make him see that seven thousand a year from his wife is as much as he ought to expect."

"But, papa, dear," she pleaded; and she sank once more on her knees by him, to lay her head upon his breast, "must I go home and tell him how hard and cruel towards him you have been?"

Digitized by Google

"No; go and tell him that my hard earnings are not to be given to betting-men. I am perfectly just, and if he is harsh and cruel with you, come back home here, where I wish you were still. Now, good-bye; I can't bear any more."

"Must I go?" she said faintly.

"Yes. You have an unpleasant scene to go through with your husband: make haste and get it done."

She kissed him, and hurried out for fear that she should burst into a passion of sobbing, forgetful that she had sent her carriage with the butler, and was thus constrained to take the first four-wheeled cab she saw. Then she pulled up the glasses and drew her veil in folds, so as to hide her tears.

"I just tell Master Braetoun this," growled Emsworth when he was alone, "that for two pins I'd fetch her home, and he might go to law and do what he could, but he shouldn't have her again."

"What shall I say?—what shall I say?" moaned Olive, as she rode back, and made the servants stare as they saw the shabby old cab in which she had returned.

Olive felt as if her emotion would suffocate her as she entered the breakfast-room, to find her husband sleeping uneasily, and she sat down to wait.

It was not long before Bractoun awoke and stared vacantly about for a few moments before his eyes lit upon his wife, and a sensation of confusion passed away.

"Olive!" he cried. "Ah! back again. Well, will he let me have the money?"

She shook her head mournfully.

"What! A part of it then?"

"No, Rod; he is ill, and he refuses absolutely. Oh, my darling, I did everything I could, but he was as stern as could be. Rod, Rod, dear, I am so, so sorry."

"Curse your sorrow!" he cried repulsing her. "A mean, grasping old hound!"

"Rod! husband! he is my father."

"Yes, and you are his daughter. A nice mess I've made of it. Here! Have the goodness to tell me why I married you?"

CHAPTER XVIII.

"THE DOG RETURNS."

"No!"

"It's true, Auntie, as you sit there. Poor boy! He has been in sad trouble—nearly ruined—he told me all about it—his father-in-law wouldn't help him; his wife turned against him, and just then if that dear mare didn't win him a lot of money."

"Think of that, now!"

"Yes, Aunt; and he says that his getting married was all a mistake, and if I'd look over the past he would never behave bad to me again."

"Ah, just like 'em!" muttered Aunt Duncan.

"What did you say, Auntie?"

"That it ain't true."

"But I tell you it is."

"There, take off your cloak, and sit down and have a few oysters and some stout. They're only just in, and the bottle's fresh opened."

"Oh, Auntie, I can't eat oysters to-night, nor drink stout. We've been to Dillitanti's and had supper, him and me, and little Mr. Daines."

"Where did you see him?"

"At the Thespis. Mr. Daines came in and asked me to go while you were out."

"Well, of all! I couldn't have believed it, Baby. Then he's quite off with her?"

"I don't know. I suppose so. Don't talk about her, please."

"But, tell me, what did he say?" cried Mrs. Duncan, pushing back her plate and drawing her chair aside, so as to face her niece, who, charmingly dressed, had thrown off her mantle and sat flushed and happy.

"He said he'd never known a happy moment since he behaved so badly to me, that he had been ill nearly ever since, that I was the only one he had ever really cared for, and that if I would forgive him and come back to the old house we'd never part again."

"And you believe him?" cried Mrs. Duncan, breathing hard and looking hot and flushed.

"I don't think I believed him, Auntie," said the girl dreamily, "but, oh, it did sound so sweet—so sweet for him to tell me he loved me once again!"

"Oh!" said Mrs. Duncan, tightening her lips, "and what about Mr. Cyrus Daines?"

"Poor little man!" she said sadly.

"Are you going to behave as bad to him as that fine my lord did to you?"

"Mr. Daines never told me he loved me," said the girl quietly; "he respects me too much."

"Yes, and why shouldn't you respect him? He isn't rich, and he isn't a man who'd keep carriages for you, and be always pouring out champagne. But even if he has got such a sharp, saucy tongue of his own, he about worships you, miss, and he'd marry you any day, as sure as I stand here."

"Yes, Auntie," said Lucy softly. "I believe he would."

"Then it's 'orridly wicked of you, Baby, that it is, and I'm ashamed of you; there, that I am."

"Auntie, dear Auntie, you don't know; you don't know."

"Yes, I do. I know that my lord's got no more 'art in him than a threepenny bit; and after the way he's served you, I'm ashamed of you. You make me mad to see you so ready to listen to his soft soap and stuff as soon as he sees you again."

"You don't know, Auntie; you don't know."

"I do know, miss, and I won't have it. Why, if I was Mr. Daines, I'd—I'd shoot him, that I would!"

"Mr. Daines is nothing to me, only a friend who has always been very kind ever since the trouble."

"But what did he say to-night? Was he at supper with you?"

"Yes, Auntie; I wouldn't go without him."

"My lord didn't want you to, I suppose?"

"Yes, he did, Auntie."

"And what then—what did he say?"

"Nothing at all, Auntie."

"Nothing, and him as clever with his tongue as he is! I wouldn't have thought it of him. Said nothing?"

"No, Auntie; only sat there and looked bad."

"I should think so, indeed."

"I was very sorry for him, but I seem to belong to Rod."

"Then let me tell you that you don't. Let him go to his wife. Pray, what about her?"

"I don't know," cried the girl, and her soft, dreamy look gave place to one of angry animation. "What is she to me? Why should I think of her? See how she has made me suffer. He's mine—mine once more. Let her try to get him away again if she dares."

"And I suppose my lord came home with you to the door?"

"No," said the girl, calming down again and speaking softly, with the dreamy love-light coming back into her eyes, "I wouldn't let him."

"And lucky you didn't. Then you came home alone?"

"No, Auntie, with Mr. Cyrus Daines."

"Ho! Then why didn't he come in?"

"He wouldn't, Auntie."

"What did he say?"

"Nothing, Auntie, nothing; he looked at me for a few moments under the gas lamp, after I'd rung, and then he walked slowly away."

"Ho!" exclaimed Mrs. Duncan, tightening her features more, and letting the newly-opened oysters dry, and the stout grow frothless and flat, "so that's how it stands is it? Very well, my dear, then you listen to me. I've loved you, Baby, ever since you were the bit of a wild girl who come to me all those years ago, and I've petted and spoiled you, and when you come back after Lord Braetoun had pitched you over I welcomed you with loving arms, and there isn't anything I wouldn't do for you; but if you haven't got no pride and self-respect in you, I shall have to give you some of mine. I won't have such goings-on as that."

"Oh, Auntie, Auntie, you don't know, you don't know."

"I know that you've got on a silly fit, and want someone to bring you to your senses."

"Auntie, darling," said the girl, rising, to go behind her chair and place her soft little arms about her, "don't be cruel and cross to me now I'm going to be happy once again."

"Happy, in going and breaking the heart of someone else!"

"What is it to me, Auntie? What is it to me? He don't love her, and he does love me. My poor little heart's been nearly broken ever so long, and I've often felt that I should like to die. I should have died that night when he was so very bad. Yes, you may shake your head. You don't know, Auntie, but if he had died I should have gone off the bridge, and you'd never have seen me more."

"Oh, Baby, Baby!" sobbed her aunt, as her arms gradually tightened round the soft, svelte figure, "if all women were as weak as you, what would the world come to then? It's weary, it's wicked, and something will come like a judgment on us all."

"Yes, Aunt, perhaps," said the girl softly; "but that is all behind a cloud, and it's so light here, just where it has been so cold and black. He loves me once again, and I'd go to him, Auntie, when he calls me—yes, if it was to die."

CHAPTER XIX.

How to Spend a Happy Day.

"WELL, Baby, I dare say it's very conf'table and it's very nicely furnished, but you get the papers and deeds and let me put 'em in my lawyer's 'ands along o' mine, as 'll all be yours some day, my dear; and whatever happens my lord won't never get it again then, and so I tell him."

"Whatever happens!" cried Baby, as she stood there in her own little drawing-room, as charming as diaphanous drapery could make her, and wearing an indescribable bonnet fresh from Paris for the special day. "Whatever happens! Oh, Auntie, you'd better have stopped at home."

"Well," said the old lady tartly, "didn't I want to stop at home? Do you think I wanted to go gallivanting down to Bunsbury races outside a nasty, dangerous four-in-hand? I hope it won't break down."

"Not so heavy as that, Auntie."

"Ah, it's of no use to try and hide it, Baby, I do get terrible stout, and my breath's that short it seems as if there isn't room for it."

"Who minds you being a bit stout, Auntie!" said Lucy, stroking her face.

"You may just as well leave off, my precious, for you can't rub out them wrinkles, they've got in too deep. But don't you think I'd better stop, and have a nice cup of tea ready for you when you come back?"

"No, I don't, Auntie. You're always sticking over your work, and never have a change."

"What! Didn't I go to 'Ampton Court last year?"

"Hampton Court!" said Lucy scornfully; "what's Hampton Court?"

"A ve—ry nice place, my dear, and as pretty and old-fashioned as can be. Don't you despise old friends."

"I don't, Auntie, but when Rod said he was going to drive down in the country where it's lovely, I thought it would do my dear old darling Auntie good, and I told him I should take you, and that if you didn't go I wouldn't, and that settled it."

"Well, it was very good and nice of you, Baby—bless you! I say, I wish you wouldn't wear a veil when I want to kiss you. I always seem to taste the arryphane, and it puts me in mind of cutting up gauze for ballet dresses."

"But I can't take it off now, Auntie."

"No, of course you can't. But, I say, Baby, you do look lovely this morning. Reg'lar Covent Garden bouquet, out o' the Central Evenue."

"Silly old Auntie."

"Well, it was very nice of you to think of me, and I've put on my best manners. Do I look all right?"

"Lovely, Auntie."

"That's right. I was afraid you might think me a bit too red."

"Oh no, Auntie, you'll do capitally."

"That's a comfort, my dear, but I wish you'd go in for a bit more colour. You are so fond of those washed-out blues."

"Rod likes to see me in pale blue, Auntie."

"Oh well, my dear, that settles it. Well, your 'ouse looks very nice, but you must spend a lot in flowers, pussy."

"Well, I do, Auntie; they are so sweet. Rod sent me this bouquet this morning ready. Isn't it lovely?"

"M'yes, my dear, but there's no colour in it. You couldn't see one like that across the footlights."

"Well, I'm not going behind them, Auntie," said the girl, inhaling the perfume. "Oh, I love 'em. When I die I should like to be buried in white lilies."

"Baby! Oh, my dear child! You've given me a cold chill all down the back. You shouldn't, my dear," said the old lady, who kept on peeping about the place. "That's a nice 'andle and sunshade. My lord give it to you?"

"Yes, Auntie. Isn't it a beauty?"

"Cost a lot I know. But, I say, my dear, you've made this place look very nice, but I don't think much of Brompton Square."

"Oh, I love the little place."

"Well, it is dramatic, as you may say, and seems to smell Keeley and Albert Smithy, and puts you in mind o' lots of 'em as have gone; but it is squeezy. Well, ain't it time for us to start?"

"Very nearly. He's going to pick us up here, of course."

"But, Baby, are you sure he can drive proper?"

"Why, Auntie, doesn't he go regularly to the coaching club, and doesn't he drive me round the Park often?"

"Oh, well, if he gets coached like that he ought to be able to, but it always seems hard enough to drive two horses, without sticking two more, as you don't want, out in front. It's all very well to call it four-in-'and, but those front ones never look to me in 'and at all."

"Oh, you'll be all right, dear. You're going to sit on the box seat, between me and Rod."

"What! Box seat? Not me."

"Why, Auntie?"

"Do you think at my time of life I'm going to climber clamber up a set o' iron door-scraper things, to sit in a dangerous place like that, with the 'orses 'eels half their time in your lap? No, my dear, I'm going out for a day's pleasure, and I'm going to sit inside."

"But, Auntie, there's no danger, and you'll have a step-ladder to go up."

"Scaling ladders won't tempt me, my dear."

"But you can't, Auntie. Nobody goes inside a four-in-hand."

"Then what's the inside for? I'll show my lord I can."

"Now don't be a dear, obstinate old darling," cried Lucy, "I'll take care of you. You must come on the box; and Auntie, darling, I've got a surprise for you."

"'Ave you, my dear? What is it?"

"Well, I wanted you to be very comfortable, so there'll be an air cushion."

"What! Well, you are a pet. Now, I do call that nice of you, Baby. I—I—Well!"

"There, there, you mustn't cry about it."

"It's only just a show'ry drop or two, my dear. It does seem so nice of you. But I must look at that there cushion first."

"Why, Auntie?"

"Why? Oh, I know 'em by 'eart, my dear. Why, if they're blowed out too full it's like sitting on a Hashley's

'orse in a circus. But I think you'd better let me go inside."

"You can't, Auntie. Fancy you sitting inside along with the luncheon hampers."

"Luncheon? Oh, then there'll be a bit of a snack."

"Of course. Hampers from Forthum and Mason's, and champagne."

"Champagne! H'm, I don't think much of that. Poor watery stuff, not 'alf so warming and good as a drop of real old-fashioned ginger beer out of a stone bottle."

"There'll be ices too, Auntie," said the girl with a mischievous look in her eyes.

"Pah—h—h!—Ugh—h—h!" shuddered the old lady. "Not for me, my dear. Not going to make myself a bear on a North Pole, eating snow-balls, thank you."

"But there'll be something else, Auntie."

"I dessay, my dear, but I've lived long enough to know what's good for me and what ain't."

"So have I, Auntie, dear, and I ordered what you'd like."

"Not——"

"Yes, Auntie, oysters—a whole barrel."

"Lucy!"

"And fresh bread-and-butter and stout."

"Well!"

"Then you are pleased?"

"Pleased, my precious? All those preparations for your poor old Auntie! I know as we must be going to have a 'appy day."

Just then there was a sharp tootling on a post-horn, the trampling of horses, and Braetoun pulled up close to the kerb, a couple of smart grooms running to the horses' heads, and a little knot of passers-by pausing to see the gay party who filled the seats make their start.

"What ho! within there!" shouted Braetoun, who was carefully got up as an imitation of the old stage coach driver, including the white beaver broad-brimmed hat.

"Quite ready," cried Lucy. "Come, Auntie."

"Oh, my dear, I feel that nervous as ever was."

"How are you, old lady?" cried Braetoun merrily; and several cheery salutes from artistes to whom her face was familiar, came to her as a man out of livery drew a step ladder from beneath the brake, fixed it securely in front, and Mrs. Duncan was helped up to her seat by the driver, to plump herself hurriedly down in her appointed place.

Lucy followed nimbly, a light dust protector was thrown across them and secured, and the steps stowed away.

"All right?" cried Braetoun.

"Yes," came in chorus.

"Give 'em their heads."

The two grooms stepped back, the horses—a handsome team—started at once, the men caught the handles on either side and mounted to their places, one of them drawing a post-horn of the longest growth from its leathern bucket and sounding a long blast. Away they went, turned out into the main road, and trotted steadily on as fast as the general traffic would allow.

"You'll excuse me, Lord Braetoun, won't you?" said Mrs. Duncan breathlessly from excitement.

"Of course, old lady. What is it? Not comfortable?" and he looked sidewise and down at her with good-humoured contempt before giving Lucy a merry wink.

"Not quite yet, my lord; but it wasn't that. I only wanted to ast you not to drive too fast. I'm a bit short of breath. Don't make 'em gallop, please."

"Never fear," he cried laughingly. "You'll be all right. Steady, Beau! Ah, Slasher! Quiet!"

Phizz, whizz, went the whip, the off leader received a flick which made it shake its head and give a plunge, but it steadied down directly and away they went pleasantly along.

"Tell him not to whip 'em, please, my darling," whispered the old lady, who was panting heavily.

"You leave it to Rod, Auntie," said Lucy, "he knows exactly what to do."

"Thank ye, my darling, I know he does. He drives lovely, and I—I'm enjoying it as never was," she continued, with her face wearing a pitiful look of despair, as she held tightly on to the rail of the driver's seat on one side, to her niece's arm on the other.

"Why, Auntie dear, what is it?" whispered Lucy, who saw plainly that something was wrong.

"Hush, my darling. Be quiet. Don't let 'em hear. Have you got a pin anywhere's 'andy?"

"I'm afraid not, Auntie. What is the matter? Are you coming undone?"

"No, my darling, it isn't that—it's the air cushion. I knowed how it would be—they've blowed it out too full."

"Oh, Auntie, hush! Try and manage with it for the present."

"But I'm afraid it will bob me off on to the horses, my dear. I don't feel safe."

"How are you getting on, old lady?" said Braetoun just then. "Why, you're not sitting comfortably. Sit more as I do, with your feet well forward on the board. That's the way. How is it now?"

"That's better," panted the sufferer—"yes, much better. Yes, I'm more comfortable now."

Away they went, with the park looking bright and green. Kensington Gardens with its old elms giving vista-like glimpses; then through Kensington and transforming Hammersmith, and onward for the pleasant west with its promise of genuine country, garden, field, and hedge.

But the best laid plans are often defeated, as we know. The horses were going with the regularity of a machine, the wheels spinning round in a glittering haze, and the varnish of the coach shone in the bright sunshine, when one of those surly kill-joys of the suburbs came in sight in a narrow portion of the road—narrow by comparison, but with ample room for three vehicles to run abreast—and, according to those drivers' custom, the whole road was taken up by one.

Granted that the man was tired and drowsy from his journey to Covent Garden, from which he was returning with his team and waggon piled up high with empty baskets, British obstinacy came in, for on hearing the rattle of wheels behind, and the warning "toot" of the horn, he slowly turned his head and tried to look round from his perch in front, but took no further notice, keeping steadily along after the custom of his kind, right in the middle of the road.

"Confound him! Hi!" shouted Braetoun, and his voice was half drowned by a furious blast from the horn, but the man paid no heed, and, flushing with annoyance, the driver gathered up his reins a little to prepare to pass the great swaying load.

"Mind the varnish of his carriage," cried one of the party, and there was a merry laugh. "Don't take off any of his bark."

"I just will if I can get a cut at him," said Braetoun meaningly, as he gave the lash of his whip a whish through the air.

There was just room for a clever driver, and, with his horses well in hand, Braetoun would have passed easily, but as fate had it, unseen by the driver of the brake, a cart was drawn up to the kerb on the near side quite hidden by the pile of baskets on the waggon, and just at the critical moment a lash from the waggon-driver's whip turned his team partly in the front of the brake.

To avoid collision Braetoun bore to the right. As he drew rein the off fore wheel ran partly up the blunt, rounded stone which protected a lamp-post, there was a wild shriek as the top-heavy brake hung in the balance and then came over with a crash, and the next instant the waggon was leaving behind a horrible confusion of broken glass, woodwork, twisted iron, and shrieking women, amidst whom frightened horses entangled in their harness were kicking and plunging. The happy day was spent.

THE STORY OF A PICNIC.

Frank Mahew woke with a headache. This he ascribed to the heat of the Braginton ballroom the night before, and the lobster mayonnaise which he had eaten at supper. His familiar friend, Jack Welman, who shared his quarters, remarked that the lobster was splendidly served, of a very good brand, and would not hurt a baby unless consumed in excess. "Talking of which," he added, "shall you run to fizz at your picnic?"

"Picnic!" said Mr. Mahew, in a careless voice; "what picnic? I remember something about a beanfeast to which someone has asked me to go next Saturday. I fancy I accepted; but my headache makes me forget. Where is it?"

Jack Welman, who always presides at breakfast, poured him out a third cup of tea and shook his head.

"My dear fellow, were you as bad as that? Really, don't you know that you are giving a picnic, and have invited twenty people at least—seven girls to my knowledge—on Saturday next, and have got to provide boats and lunch?"

"Jack!" said Mr. Mahew, in a confidential, if rather nervous, tone, "I believe you are right; it's coming back to me now," and he laughed uncomfortably; "I'm not quite sure it will suit me. All the same——"

"Can't you get out of it?"

"I really must if I can; I am awfully short. It will be a matter of ready money, too, for most of it. What am I to do? Tell me a good excuse. You've not got a headache."

"Write and say you can't find a chaperon. You have only asked girls and a lot of young fellows; you must have someone to give an air of respectability, though you did issue your invitation in rather an informal way. How many boatfuls will there be? You might say you must have a dowager in each."

Mr. Mahew went to the writing-table and wrote a little pile of notes, drank some Apollinaris, and went to his office for the day.

The next morning Mr. Welman pointed with an air of friendly concern to a little pile of envelopes, directed in ladies' handwriting, which lay beside his friend's plate.

"Tender regrets," said Frank Mahew airily.

"Offers of chaperonage, you mean," replied Welman; and Frank Mahew read the first aloud with a lengthening face which would not have flattered the writer.

"Dear Mr. Mahew,—It will be all right about the picnic, as I can easily find a chaperon. Hoping it will be fine.—Yours very sincerely, Blanche Smythe.

"It may not be fine," he muttered; "but what is the next?

"My dear Mr. Mahew,—We are looking forward to your picnic on Saturday, and shall come, whatever the weather. My cousin, Mrs. Thomson, will be my chaperon. Are there many coming? I thought you only wanted me.—Yours very sincerely, Rose Jones.

"Confound Mrs. Thomson! Here's another of them.

"My dear Mr. Mahew (Wonder why she underlined the dear. What can I have said?),—You have forgotten you asked mamma to chaperon us at your picnic, and she has ordered a new hat on purpose.—Yours in haste, May Robinson.

"Old Mrs. Robinson in a new shady hat—my prophetic soul! Look here, Jack, don't grin—it's no joke. I've over-drawn already, and the quarter's only half through."

"There's another," said Welman grimly, "in a pink envelope."

"One of the Currey girls," said Mahew with his teeth set; "I fancy I asked both.

"Dear Frank (Frank, forsooth!),—Don't you forget you promised Ethel you would have plenty of boats and let Captain Maudslay scull her. I think I'll go in your boat, as you want me to so much. Get one of your young married friends to chaperon the party, and give her someone to entertain her in a separate boat.—Yours in frantic haste, Dora Currey.

"Nice style of girl that," said Mr. Welman; "you seem to have made the running all round. Mrs. Robinson will be particularly glad to chaperon the Curreys! I heard her saying to Mrs. Jones she wondered how Mrs. Braginton could invite such girls to her ball."

"My dear Jack," said Mr. Mahew, with a still longer face, "I don't want to offend Mrs. Robinson, and I don't want to go in a boat with Miss Currey. What am I to do?"

"Can't say. Drown yourself, or have some lobster before starting—to keep up your spirits. Any more letters?"

"Only one from the governor."

"Is the old man friendly!"

"Severe rather—paternal reminder of the shortness of life, as instanced by the death of an elderly relative at the age of ninety-seven."

"Who was your dead relative?"

"General George Mahew; retired, cracked, distant cousin; lots of money, cuts with his family. Shall I write to the Curreys and say I won't take them?"

"When is the funeral?"

"Saturday next. Dash it all, old man! don't call it that; we'll make it lively somehow."

"The funeral, my gentle ass! I mean the funeral—your deceased cousin's?"

"I'm not going to it; I never saw the old fool; besides, it is Saturday."

"The very thing, my dear fellow! If you really want to cut this picnic, write your regrets all round. 'Sudden mourning,' and 'duty to your family.' He must have been rather a swell in his way once, and your name as a mourner at his funeral will be in the papers to show it was a genuine business."

"It's some distance in the country."

"All the better. If it's anywhere near my people, run over and have half-a-day's fishing."

"Are your people all at home?"

"If you mean Maggie by all my people, she's there; and if you don't take care, she'll hear of your picnic and the Currey girl. She knows Blanche Smythe."

Later on that day Mr. Mahew duly regretted that the sudden death of his relative, General Mahew, and the necessity, etc., caused the inevitable postponement of his proposed picnic. He had it engraved on black-edged cards, and the printers sent in a hundred and fifty—he uses them for book-markers still.

It was a very fine morning on Saturday when Mr. Mahew started by a very early train, and the river looked so lovely he almost regretted his picnic. A carriage was at the station to meet him, as he had written to say he was coming, and as no one else turned up, he found himself figuring as chief mourner. His cousin's elderly attorney came to him in the garden as he was smoking a cigar, after the funeral.

"I have found an envelope," he said, "labelled 'Will,' and I think, as you are going away, I had better open it in your presence."

"I suppose you had," said Frank Mahew carelessly; "it's a pity no other relatives are present. Where are they all?"

"Well, you see," said the attorney, "they never came near the General of late years, except when an uncle of yours came down to make investigations whether the General had married his housekeeper, a Mrs. Jenkins, by name. She died a few years ago, and latterly they seemed to have made some advances towards him. He would have nothing to say to them; but had some circulars printed of a more or less abusive character, insinuating that they had designs on his fortune, and sent them to everyone whom he could discover who was in any way related to him. I wonder you did not get one."

"Not worth it, I guess—if he ever heard of me," said Frank Mahew; "open that envelope, though, I want to get away."

The attorney opened it and read the contents of half a sheet of note-paper.

"I must congratulate you, Mr. Mahew!" he exclaimed; "I must congratulate you! This is, indeed, the fitting reward of your affectionate reverence for the deceased testator."

"What's that?" said Frank. He had been blowing cigar-smoke at a bumble-bee and had not quite heard. "Is that the will? Short and sweet, is it not? Who drew it?"

"I did not, certainly," said the attorney, with a rueful eye.

"So I should imagine," said Frank to himself, holding it at arm's length; "it's his own writing by the signature, witnessed by the cook and the gardener."

"But read it, my dear sir!" said the attorney, "read it!"

"It's so very badly written, I don't think I can."

"My dear sir, allow me," and the gentleman took the paper.

"The last will of Mr. George Mahew. I leave everything I have to leave to be divided between those of my relations who have the decency to attend my funeral.—Signed, etc.

"That means about sixty thousand pounds for you, Mr. Mahew, besides this house."

Welman always said that his friend had no sense of decency, and he would have thought his opinion confirmed if he had seen him then seize the grey-haired old solicitor round the waist and waltz him across the lawn-tennis court, with a whoop like a red Indian's. The undertaker was just starting to drive back with the hearse and equipment; he had seen grief manifest itself in many forms, and was quite touched—it took him back to his Irish home and his father's wake.

The attorney looked rather ruffled, but, being a prudent man, he consoled himself with the prospect of managing the estate, though he did not for the moment see how he could include dancing with the residuary devisee in his bill of costs. No doubt Frank paid for it eventually.

"Good old Jack," he said, as he told the history of the funeral to Welman on Monday evening over an excellent dinner: "never forget to be dutiful to the aged, and show respect to your relations, even at the expense of a day's pleasure with the young and lovely."

"I think," said Mr. Welman, "you had better let me finish that magnum."

JUMBLED STORY NO. 11.

THE MOUO CLUB.

"Another madman," exclaimed the native genius.
"By St. Gudula, this is too much!" exclaimed my audacious ignorance."
"Nonsense!" exclaimed the critic, as he snatched the handle of a brush, he sketched, in masterly but with a foreign accent. "I will give a hundred "one hundred guineas for the sketch just as it is.
Meissonier laughed heartily; and, taking his daughter as a marriage portion, because he spends liberty to sell it to anyone I please."
Early on a fine summer morning, an old man said, in that tone of forced calmness which an insulted artist, crossing his maul stick over his portion. I leave it to our English friend's but, if I were to make a trial, I wouldn't put in too pains this time to conceal his anger; "I should like a sign suitable to its name, "The Rising Sun."
The old man commenced walking backwards down on his knees before the great French painter. Namus.
The whole party were quiet enough now, for they could endure it no longer, and exclaimed severely: "Hang me, but all these foreigners are mad!"
"No such thing; my Susette is betrothed to an honest, poor man, who can scarcely make both ends blue!"
"What roguery!" exclaimed the innkeeper.
"I tell you what, old gentleman," cried the keeper, uncommonly interested.
"I don't pretend to much skill in sky-painting; but the picture is my lawful property, and I am at their hands, drinking to the rising sun, which was walking on the road between Brussels and of the 'Flemish Ass!'" In his indignation he frantically clasped his hands together, and fell once.
"Forgive me!" he exclaimed, "forgive me for "he is an old miser. I am the father of a family; I will gladly give two hundred for it if the painter made his way through the crowd.
"What do you mean, monsieur?" said the inn-ladder, when a gentleman, riding an English horse, of a greyish morning sky. One of the faces for that painting," answered the young Englishman, who, mounted on a ladder placed against the front wall of my house, how can it belong to anybody getting off his horse.
The Englishman replied:
"Meissonier."
The old man was about to descend from the supplanted sign-painter.
"That picture is not to be sold," said the sign-artist; "that quite alters the case. I am content she is, will marry her next September."
"Don't believe him, brother," cried the painter; "I am certain you would not wish to deprive an spendthrift, who has no money left to give his generosity to fix the sum."
"No," quoth mine host, "for it is already sold, and, being a painter, you ought to help a brother to see how you would paint skies without blue."
"Oh, my dear monsieur!" said the innkeeper, you should not be let out—alone."
"Not at all, not at all," rejoined the Flemish honest young French cabinet-maker, who, poor as myself has the smallest right to it."
"What I say—I will give one hundred guineas to have your portrait painted, to serve for the sign of Gerald Douw's great grandson's third cousin.
"Oh, yes, I see very well you are trying to paint admiration.
"But suppose that I don't choose to have it a sky."
"Monsieur does not perceive that I am painting himself by watching the operations of a painter, artist, and give me the preference. Besides, I am sold?" said its real author.
Then, using merely the point of his finger and brightest blue, which appeared to aggravate the old outline, three Flemish boors, with beer-glasses in hand, shook it with fraternal cordiality.
The painter looked down from his perch, and presented a strong and laughable caricature of the shoulder, and looking very fierce, "I dare say you were struck dumb with astonishment. The sign-artist here gave me a little help out of friendship; gentleman very much.
"Bravo!" and even Gerard Douw's cousin nine guineas for it!"
"That painting is mine!" he exclaimed in French, and even partly paid for in advance. However, if with the palm of his hand, effaced the chef d'œuvre of a wayside inn, was busily employed in depicting it, it is with me that he must treat."
"A daughter to portion!" exclaimed the stranger painter, with an air of as much pride as if it had appeared above the horizon, dispersing the gloom and forwards before the inn, the painter, meantimes removed felt his fury calming down into the palette from the painter's hand. "You deserve me to lay in a good stock of wine and beer."
"I have already offered," replied the best bidder, that the picture should be sold for a marriage time, continuing to lay on fresh coats of the angry man sometimes assumes:
At length, when the sign-painter took another ready to share the money with you."
The owner of the inn was the first to cry much blue."
"Too much blue!"
"What word?" exclaimed all the disputants at meet, of this windfall. Why, it would just enable the painter, coming down from his ladder, at no word."
"He!" said Master Martzen. "Why, he's an old painter of signs, "it belongs to me. My fellow-painter held his breath, glared with his eyes, been his own work.
Having a good deal of time to spare, he amused "'Rising Sun' is my property. Fastened on the else? Isn't it painted on my boards? No one but monsieur wishes to come to an arrangement about a sky; but I tell you again there is too much brush full of blue paint to plaster on, the spectator are a very worthy fellow when you are at home; but will consent to sign it in the corner with one mounted the ladder with the activity of a boy, and, all he gets on himself."

HONI SOIT QUI MALY PENSE.

BY GERALDINE BONNER.

MR. BERTRAM LAMAR sat on the arm of a chair in the hall of the hotel, and idly swung his foot. Mr. Lamar was bored. An extended acquaintance with this young man forces me to confess that he was not often afflicted in that way. We know that no man can aspire to be of the highest fashion without constantly experiencing the pangs of this distinguished ailment, and yet Mr. Lamar was unquestionably of the highest fashion. The most cursory glance would tell you this. Anyone could see that he belonged to the best people, that he was used to the best people, that only the best people would be bearable to him. It was therefore with humiliation that he confessed to himself how seldom—how singularly seldom, considering all his advantages—he felt the inspiring throes of boredom.

But now he was genuinely bored, and he felt joyously that anyone could see he was. Ladies passed—old ones, who swept up the dust with their trains, and who creaked as they moved as if they wanted oiling; young ones, in light frocks and wide, flowered hats, which cast a shadow over the clearest eyes. They kept banging open the glass doors and going out into the blaze of sun beyond, with a bursting into bloom of lace parasols, or coming into the cool of the hall, with the rustling, silken sheathing of the parasols suddenly furled, and the tapping of little heels on the hard floor.

He never glanced at them. But they did at him—swiftly, obliquely—from under the hatbrim out of the shadow. He looked away, with raised chin and indolently drooped eyelids; but about his heart he began to feel a little creeping, warm titillation of interest, a premonition that he was not going to keep bored very much longer.

There was one girl—she kept on going to and fro—and, as he looked on the ground he could see the hem of her dress and her feet They were pretty feet in yellow shoes, small and pointed. Mr. Lamar found himself ruminating: "Suppose the head is as pretty as the feet. But it never is. There's a law of compensation which prevents that. The head which belongs to those feet is thirty-five——" And he looked up.

The head matched the feet to perfection. Mr. Lamar felt that he did not look bored any longer. Rather, however, than sacrifice this dearly-bought and enviable condition of being, he turned his back on that enchanting head, and sauntered into an adjoining room. There would be no one to look at here to destroy the aristocratic vacuity of his mind.

The room was empty, cool, and dim. As he entered he saw something on the floor near the table. He picked it up. It was a band about an inch and a half wide, covered with a puckered yellow ribbon, and with one end through a clasp of dull silver, showing a monogram in small diamonds. There was a bunch of narrower yellow ribbon beside the clasp, each end finished with a little tongueless silver bell. It appeared to Lamar, from some hanging filaments of thread, that the two ends of this band had once been stitched together. He looked curiously at his find.

"What can it be?" he mused, staring at it. We have said that he was young, and came of the best people, and with the best people there is always a doubt as to whether they wear such vulgar things as stockings or possess such unmentionable things as legs. "Wings, not legs and feet, shall move them," as the poet gracefully expresses it.

Lamar first thought he would take it to the office. But curiosity impelled him to study it. It might be worn round the neck; but no, it was not long enough. He drew the severed ends together, and held it off from him, eyeing it dubiously, and reflectively pulling his small moustache. Oh, yes, of course. Now he saw. How dense he had been! A bracelet. Holding it together, he pushed his hand through it, and it swung on his wrist.

"What can it be?"

"I don't think I ever saw a bracelet just like that before," he thought, moving it round and looking at it with his head on one side.

And then, as he looked at it, a sudden flash of waken-ing light, and for a moment he stood staring at it in stupefied horror as it hung over his wrist. With the return of consciousness, he crumpled it up and crushed it into his pocket. What should he do with it? If he took it to the office its owner would never dare to claim it. If he found out who she was, he would never dare to offer it.

He could imagine the scene: A lovely and youthful lady is discovered walking in the corridors. To her appears Mr. Bertram Lamar in full evening dress, with a white pink in his buttonhole. Making towards her, he executes one of those majestic yet easy bows for which the Lamar family have been famous. Then, drawing a package from his pocket, Mr. Lamar presents it to her, murmuring: "Yours, I believe," and vanishes through a trap-door. He might give it to her, and then pretend to be prostrated by the heat, and fall on the floor with his eyes shut, to avoid embarrassing her by witnessing her inevitable confusion. The Lamars were also famous for their chivalrous attitude towards the sex. But can a man be prostrated by the heat on a day when the thermometer in its most ambitiously soaring moments can only struggle up to seventy-five degrees? What should he do to spare her feelings and his own? And he turned the cause of his perturbation over in his pocket.

Just then he heard a step outside—a feminine frou-frou. With a guilty start he retreated from the table, fell into a chair, and seized the morning paper, in which he buried his head. Anyone noting this fact would of course imagine that he slumbered, and feel themselves safe from espionage.

"It is she," thought Bertram, seized with guilty tremours; "she has come to hunt for it," and he remained motionless.

So did she. There was not the smallest vibrating rustle from her silent figure. Bertram rattled the paper, stabbed little hole through it with his finger, and peeped at her. She was standing in the doorway, peering about the room, and she was the young lady with the yellow shoes. She was charmingly pretty, in a light dress of striped flannel and a loose shirt of thin silk made like a boy's. As to her head—that lovely head with strong brown hair curling crisply under her sailor hat, delicately rounded cheeks, and gravely pouting lips—it was an image of soft, delicious beauty. At her side was a little pug dog on its haunches, gasping and rolling its eyes.

She cast a hurried glance at the gentleman reading the paper and walked into the room, looking intently about the floor.

Threw one last reluctant look about the room.

"What would she say," thought Bertram, as she passed nim in her search, "if I were to innocently ask her what she is looking for, and gallantly offer to help her to find it? But I'll spare her that, even though I do appear a clown," and the hero peeped again.

She was certainly hunting thoroughly. She moved several of the chairs, drew up the lace curtains and looked under them, peered into all the corners and under the tables and round the desks.

"What on earth could she have been doing?" thought the young man; "she must have been playing puss-in-the-corner or forfeits: I'll burst with curiosity soon and hit her with one of the pieces:"

When she had searched everywhere, she straightened herself with a sigh, threw one last reluctant look about the room, and calling to the pug: "Come along, dearest; it isn't there," departed.

Bertam laid down the paper, and looked after her. She appeared to him to have a singular amount of sang-froid, also a very graceful back. How well she walked! How proudly she carried her small, dark head!

Mr. Lamar was not bored that afternoon. He was consumed with perplexity. How could he return the lost treasure to its owner without causing her embarrassment, without making her his enemy for life? If it had been anything else how delightfully he could have broken the ice with it. But to break the ice with that—impossible! It would have exactly the opposite effect, and cause the ice to form as beneath a breath from the Arctic.

"I must give it to her this evening," he thought. "I'll wrap it up in paper and tie one of the ribbons round it that are on that case Milly gave me. Then, if she asks me — as of course she will—what it is, I'll say carelessly:

"'Oh, nothing; just a little trifle I think belongs to you. Don't hurry to open it. Have you noticed what a beautiful night it is?' And so I'll engage her in absorbing conversation. But if the conversation is not sufficiently absorbing and she begins to open it, I must flee from the wrath to come. And when next I meet her, dying to speak or even bow to her, there will be a wall of ice raised between us. She will turn her profile towards me and become engrossed in the beauties of the landscape. Such is the irony of fate."

The languorous afternoon burnt itself away in loitering stages of deepening light and colour to a smouldering crimson sunset. Dinner loomed in the near distance, and was awaited with fond expectancy. At seven o'clock, Mr. Lamar came slowly down the broad stairs, looking as handsome as the young Dionysius in his dress-suit, his shining shirt-front, and a white pink in his buttonhole.

The hall was full of moving figures and a blaze of light and colour. Gay running laughter and broken ends of sentences detached themselves from the hum of voices. Splendidly dressed ladies passed and repassed in couples, in threes, in long lines, or stood in groups, with the gaslight breaking in myriad little splinters on their tumbled trains of soft silk, and sliding with glossy radiance along their half-bared arms. There was a fluttering and sweeping of fans, a rustling of rich crushed fabrics.

Mr. Lamar was too perturbed in mind to care to mingle with the gay, loud-voiced, laughing crowd. He wished for solitude, and directed his steps towards the little writing-room. He had not wrapped the treasure in paper, nor tied it up with a ribbon from his mouchoir case. He had not done anything with it. He did not dare. The sight of its owner might inspire him to the desperate pitch of boldly offering it to her or suggest to him some succinct way of returning it without betraying the identity of the finder. With these ideas in his mind he carried it still in his pocket, in company with his keys, jingling on the end of a chain.

The gas in the writing-room was not lit. Red gleams shot in from between the great holes of the cedar trees, and touched the sea-green walls. Mr. Lamar liked the softened light and the pensively faint prospect, and went to the open window. Just outside it, on the balcony, in a rocking-chair, was the young lady who had worn the yellow shoes. She was reading and rocking her pug in her lap; and if she was pretty in her flannel morning-dress, words cannot describe her in a mist of the black gauze, cut square round her neck, and showing her arms to the elbow. Her skin was as white and flawless as a blanched almond.. There was a gleam of a gold pin from the shadow of her dark hair, and a jewel, hung round her neck, rose and fell with her quick breath. As she read, she absently pulled the pug's ears, which drowsed with its eyes half-open and his head against her arm.

Lamar looked. She turned the page. The pug, disturbed, rose to its forepaws, gazed at her with an expression of idiotic fondness, and tried to lick her chin. She avoided this demonstration of affection by moving her chin from side to side, keeping her eyes still on the book. The pug continuing, she struck it gently, observing:

"Don't, you bad little abominable dog!"

"I beg your pardon," said Lamar suddenly from the window.

The lady looked up, with the raised eyebrows of polite inquiry.

"I have something of yours," said the young man desperately, and in a low tone.

"Yes? What is that?"

"I—I—don't quite know. Or, rather—well—but—um! I didn't like to leave it at the office. I thought—yes—I thought——" he leant out of the window, with his closed hand extended. "Here it is."

She held out her hand, and he dropped it in. She looked, and gave an exclamation of joy that caused the pug to jump to the ground.

"Oh, how glad I am. Thanks so much. Thanks awfully! I was so afraid it was lost. Isn't that lucky?" And she looked affectionately at the returned treasure, with her head on one side.

There was light enough to see her face distinctly. She did not exhibit a sign of embarrassment, not the ghost of a blush Lamar felt a sudden chill of disappointment and disapprobation.

"You found it in there?" she said, indicating the writing-room, and looking up at him with frank, candid eyes; "yes; that's where it was lost."

"I—I supposed so," said Lamar, with a wan smile.

"I looked for it myself all this morning," she continued; "under everything; but it was gone."

"Yes?" said the young man, with a fatuously inquiring air. ("If she knew I was behind that paper, she'd ask me why I didn't give it to her then and there; and what on earth would I say? I couldn't tell her that I was afraid she would be embarrassed, for such an idea has apparently never entered her head. I must dissemble," thought he.)

"I value this very much," she went on, turning it over in her hand.

"I should imagine so."

"You see there is only one like it. There is not a single duplicate anywhere."

She looked smilingly into his face. Lamar stared at her in stupefied horror.

"Only one—did you say?" he managed to articulate in a faint voice.

"Only one," she repeated, nodding her head; "it was made to order."

There was a moment of silence. Lamar made no comment, but continued to stare vacantly at her. He was thinking: "It must have been an accident. She can't be a veteran liar. Yet I might have known it—the law of compensation again. Such a lovely face as that must have some counterbalancing defect."

"When you have only one—and that such a pet," she continued, not noticing his silence, "you like to have everything as pretty as possible."

"Yes, yes. Of course, of course," ejaculated Lamar, laughing idiotically. "If you have only one, I expect it must be somewhat of a treasure," he thought. Then he added boldly, but with the air of confiding a piece of news: "I have two."

"Two?" said the young lady, with vivacious interest; "what kind?"

Lamar looked askance at her, in alarmed silence. Was she doubly afflicted? She was stroking the pug with the tips of her fingers, and there was nothing in her placid expression to suggest mania of any form.

"The same as everybody else's," he answered with some hauteur; "are the people in this part of the country in the habit of managing with one?"

"As a rule they have only one; it's so much less bother. Though, to be sure, I have a friend who has—let me see—yes, eleven."

"She must be a centipede," thought Lamar; "I seem to be encountering remarkable freaks of nature. There is a fortune waiting here for anyone who wants to start a penny gaff." Then he remarked aloud, regarding her with his head on one side, a tolerant, fond smile on his lips: "That must be quite an embarras de richesse, especially when you're walking."

"They do get rather in the way," admitted the young lady; "but most of them are very well trained."

"Very clever of them, I am sure," murmured Lamar, leaning against the window-frame, and feeling that he was about to swoon.

There was another short silence during which the girl continued to examine her restored treasure. Presently she said, musingly: "I see the threads are broken. She has broken them once before, though I don't see how she can possibly do it."

Lamar only stared. She held his glance with a horrible, eerie fascination.

"You know she loves to run about so," she prattled on; "she ran away from me this morning, and when she came back it was gone. She must have crept under the table, and not come out until she had got it off."

The lady looked up.

"Who is she?" asked Lamar, in a voice from the tombs.

"She? Why, Bobo—my pug. Isn't she a beauty? Come up here, Bobo"—patting her knee—"I want to put your collar on, and show this gentleman, who was kind enough to return it, how pretty you look when you're dressed up." She held the band round the dog's neck, and, turning to Lamar, said with laughing archness:

"Isn't it becoming?"

Lamar sat down on the window-sill. He was not bored, but he took up the morning paper, which lay on an adjacent desk, and began to fan himself with it, though the evening had grown cool.

THE COMMANDANT'S STORY.

"AND you wish me to tell you," said the old Commandant B——, a shade of sorrow crossing his worn visage, "you wish me to tell you of my entrée at Saint Cyr in 1812? Ah, well, I will do it, though it is a story and a memory so painful that it clings to me even yet."

Now, judge for yourselves, my dear readers, the emotion with which I heard it that stormy evening, seated beneath the arbour of the pretty garden that surrounded the dwelling of the old veteran at Choisy-le-Roy.

* * * * *

"I was but sixteen years of age when I departed from Charlemagne. As you have heard before the story of those brilliant days, it is only necessary to recall to mind the state of feeling between the scholars of the Prytaneum, all sons and grandsons of officers, and the scholars of the Lyceum, all sons and grandsons of the bourgeois. Add to this that the moment of my arrival was immediately following a decree of the Emperor's which had called to the Grand Army, as candidates for sous-lieutenancies, every scholar who had completed a six-months' course at the school, and that all the Charlemagnes of the previous promotion had already been dispatched towards Moscow. I was, therefore, alone, without a single comrade able to protect me against the Prytaneums or to serve as a guide for me across the unknown breakers of a new life.

"As in all the training schools of that epoch, where it was necessary to turn out soldiers as fast as possible, the days were entirely consumed in studying and putting into practice the tactics that we were there to learn. And truly it would be hard to depict to you the determination, the ambition to excel, if possible, those captains of twenty, returned from Bohemia or Spain, whom daily we elbowed in the streets of Paris, with crutches under their shoulders and the star of gallantry upon the breast.

"A portion of the evening, however, was given us as our own, and spent, as a rule, in the depths of the Café Turc, that is to say, the special nook most frequented by the school cadets, its malodorous atmosphere operating as a check upon the interference or appearance of l'Ecole surveillants. Lounging there as usual one evening, among the rest of them, I suddenly remembered that I had entirely forgotten a commission that I had promised myself to attend to, and that, close upon the hour at which we must be in quarters, there was but little time in which to do it. Necessity driving me, I forgot to be prudent, and failed to see, as I scurried through the doorway, that I had knocked against a corporal of the Prytaneum at that moment coming into the café, and that his pipe had fallen to the ground.

"'What do you mean, blockhead?' with a formidable oath, 'what do you mean,' he cried, 'upsetting me in that way?'

"But I hurried on; in fact I scarcely heard him in the haste I was in to finish my errand.

"'Didn't you hear me?' he shouted, 'you miserable little poltroon; you, who pretend to be a Parisian; stop, I say, stop!' and he darted after me, calling at the top of his lungs.

"How I found myself before him, how he parried the blow that I gave him full in the face, is more than I can tell you. I foamed with rage, and recall nothing save that they ran from the café at the noise, and that ten vigorous arms held me at a respectful distance from the corporal.

"'So, my little one,' he said to me, when he could speak again, 'so that is your humour, is it? But you are not at the Lyceum now; at l'Ecole it is not with blows of the fist that one regulates these little affairs. Go, you others, seek instruments; the "blue" since he wishes it, shall have a lesson to remember.'

"Two of the seniors ran at his bidding, while a third, almost as much of a child as myself, approached and questioned me in a low voice.

"'You are here without friends,' said he; 'and fencing—do you understand it?'

"'Fencing? Of course—I was three years at the iron.'

"'So much the better,' he replied, addressing the corporal, 'then I will be his second!'

"At this moment the seniors returned, bringing with them a couple of bayonets, upon the ends of each was tied with stout wrappings of cord an open compass. It was a weapon hard to handle, but supple, light and dangerous.

"'And now, my brave one,' said the corporal, throwing himself into position, 'look to your skull, if you know what is good for you, look to it well, or you will have it broken.'

"Everything that had occurred had passed so rapidly that it seemed to me as if I were the victim of a dream, a nightmare from which I must soon awaken; but it was no time to hesitate now—nay, my adversary was waiting, the seconds, in order to give us all space that was possible, drawn close against the wall—from which the caricatures done in charcoal and the ribald inscriptions scratched upon its surface seemed to leer at and mock us.

"'Begin,' cried the friends of the corporal, 'begin; it is late, and the hour for quarters!' We obeyed, and the duel began.

"And the corporal, I see him now—the yellow rays of the single lamp falling full upon his mocking face, his sneering lips, his clear blue eyes. He was posed swaggeringly, according to the fashion of the day, the left hand behind his back, and well opened, the knee bent, the point of the compass at the proper height. This adventure amused him—he was going to belabour an Imperial Conscript, and this conscript who had resisted him, a corporal of the Prytaneum, he was going to send him to the infirmary for a week at least, but not until he had taught him a lesson. He had done it before, during the last season, and they had not expected him, the little bourgeois whom he had belaboured as he was going to belabour this one, they had not expected him to live!

"'One—two—three!' counted the seconds, and our weapons crossed—he attacking me.

"'Well done, conscript, well done, and parried—you have been in the hall before! But, behold, a stroke you have never heard of; heed it well—I recommend it!' I parried it as easily as the others.

"'So!' cried my adversary, a little astonished; 'so—but I'll give you a fourth—you are a novice, by no means—now, parry this, my garçon, parry it if you can!' and he came at me again. I obeyed, and following up my momentary advantage, responded quickly with a hasty feint and a forward thrust.

"'Ah! but you have touched me,' he cried, 'you have wounded me—you have——' and all at once, without another word, the corporal threw up his arms, his weapon fell from his hand, a red foam frothed from his mouth, and he dropped upon the floor, dead! The compass had buried itself in his breast to the tying!

"Describe to you that moment! No! I cannot. I remember it only as one remembers the horrors of a dream—there was noise—there was confusion—a heated wrangle between the seconds—a wrangle that would have ended in another struggle but for the rest of the witnesses and the necessity for hurrying to quarters. After that, no more! The blood had mounted to my brain—my head whirled—and I swooned away!

* * * * *

"When I returned to myself I was alone in the Café Turc. Alone? No! for extended beside the door, bolted from the outside, the corporal slept his last sleep! Ah, that handsome and martial figure, that an hour ago had laughed at death, the death that had taken him at twenty years of age, and for the sake of a foolish schoolboy's quarrel.

"I was afraid—his wide open eyes made me shiver—and I got upon my knees beside him, striving, with quivering fingers, to keep them closed. My childhood's prayers came back to me, and I recited them, some vague and wild idea of atonement revolving in my brain, while the De profundis clamavi ad te, Domine rolled from my lips like a dirge. Above us—and how often, in moments supreme, as this, similar trifles catch and fix the attention—I noticed that the blood had spattered upon the wall beside the body, tattooing from head to foot the figure of a grotesque Kaiserlich that a grenadier of the Old Guard was in the act of piercing with his bayonet; also that more red drops were falling from a wounded heart pinned to the corner of the frame, across which ran the motto: 'I love Josephine!' And on my knees beside the dead I continued my lugubrious prayer: De profundis clamavi ad te, Domine. A quarter of an hour more of it and I would have been mad.

"Happily at this juncture the door opened. It was the sergeant in command, an ampute from Egypt, followed by a file of cadets under arms; behind them a litter.

"'Carry it,' said the officer, motioning to the body beside which I still knelt—'carry it to the infirmary. As for you, conscript, come with me at once to the Governor;' and, turning upon his heel, the officer went out again, evidently expecting me to follow him.

"'Keep up thy heart, conscript,' my second murmured as I passed him—he had returned with the others—'keep up thy heart! Sacré bleu! but thou hast no reason to reproach thyself.'

"No reason to reproach myself, when even then I was walking in the wake of that funereal litter, that ghastly burden, through the darkness of the night, the courts white with snow, and to the cabinet of the man who was to judge me for my deed! No, truly, I had naught with which to reproach myself!

"The Governor to whom they were conducting me was the General of the division, a certain Baron Bellavene, a grognard, as they already designated the conquerors who had planted the flag of revolution at the four corners of the Europe Coalisée, and who had left a leg at Radstadt. He was seated as we entered the hall in the immediate circle of the lamp light, late as it was—the clocks of the city had just sounded three—engaged in writing, and sorting over a mountain of reports and papers piled upon the table before him.

"'The conscript, M. le Général,' said the sergeant briefly, 'he is here by order!'

"'Very well,' replied the General, 'wait in the other room; and you,' he continued, suddenly turning the shade of the argand till the rays fell directly upon my face—'you regard me!'

"In the meantime, the walk through the biting atmosphere of the night had in a measure brought me to my senses; the bloody apparition of the Café Turc was effaced from my thoughts. I was unfortunate, but not criminal, and I saw myself in the fulness of my right before the judge who was to pronounce upon my deed. I raised my eyes to the General as he had commanded.

"'Tell me the truth,' said he; 'you insulted the corporal?'

"'No.'

"'You struck him?'

"'No. I was not able.'

"'But you threatened him?'

"'Yes, he called me a poltroon.'

"'And you killed him—with a compass?'

"'Yes—but he also had a compass; we were fighting honourably.'

"'But you fenced better than he?'

"'Yes, but it was not my fault.'

"'How old are you?'

"'Sixteen years.'

"'Have you parents?'

"'A mother only.'

"'Your father?'

"'Killed at Austerlitz—he was to have been a captain!'

"'Do you know what awaits you?'

"'Perhaps——'

"'And repent?'

"'No, my General!'

"'What!' cried the General, 'not repent in the face of the court martial, the platoon of execution!'

"'So much the better for me—no one will call me a poltroon again!'

"'Ah,' said the General, 'I see——' and for a moment, a moment that appeared to me a century, seemed to be lost in reflection.

"'Sergeant!' he called at last; 'sergeant, conduct him,' pointing to me, 'conduct him to the side of the corporal whom he has killed. At daybreak justice shall be done! Once for all we will finish with this mania of the compass!'

* * * * *

"Twenty minutes later I was in the infirmary looking upon the face of the man whose life I had taken. The corporal rested upon his funeral bed between four lighted tapers. On a table at the head of it was a crucifix; a saucer with a sprig of boxwood steeping in the holy water; at the foot of it a Sister of St. Vincent de Paul kneeling in prayer. I dropped beside her, my face in my hands, my body, in spite of all that I had said to the General, racked with sobs. Ah, the anguish of that funeral watch!

"Day came at last, and a pale wintry sun lighted the scene of mourning, more and more lugubrious as it freed itself from the shadows. The smile of the dead, however, no longer seemed to be a menacing grimace, and behind the half-closed lids I saw the eyes, blue, clear and charged with light. How willingly would I have changed the rôles, and placed, burning with remorse, shivering with fever, upon the prie-dieu where I leant in agony! How willingly have taken his place, as cold, as rigid, beneath the winding sheet, upon which my tears ran silently!

"A hand suddenly laid upon my shoulder made me tremble. It was the good sister, a bowl of broth in her hand.

"'Take it, my child,' said she, 'and a little of this Bordeaux with it—it will give you courage!' But I pushed the glass aside—it seemed to me like blood!

"'You must,' she persisted; 'you must! You have prayed, you have expiated—God is merciful—He will pardon! Drink, my little one, drink as I bid you!' I protested no longer, but drank as she told me; and was still on my feet when the door opened and the sergeant reappeared.

"'It is the hour, conscript,' said he; 'come, the picket awaits you.'

"The hour! The hour for what?

"Drawn up before the door of the Infirmary, in the centre of the Grand Alley, under the trees white with frost, the picket did await us—a dozen of my own classmates, armed from head to foot, in full uniform, their guns upon their shoulders, their bayonets shining in the morning light, I had guessed aright—it was the platoon of execution.

"At the sight of it, explain it as you will, a reaction took place in me, a salutary reaction; my agony left me, my vision cleared, my speech returned to me.

"'So much the better,' I said, aloud; 'so much the better; this torment will soon be ended!' and loosening my vest and the collar about my neck, so as not to impede the bullets, I sought the tree against which they wished to place me. At this moment, a tall and well-known figure detached itself from a group of officers behind the pickets and stepped in front of me. It was General Bellavene wrapped in his military mantle, his hat pulled close about the eyes that had more than once made the enemy tremble.

"'Have you nothing you wish to say to us, conscript, nothing to demand of us before the execution?'

"'No, my General, nothing—unless, as I was the officer of the exercises this morning, will you allow me to command the platoon now—I wish to die like a soldier!'

"'To die like a soldier! Well, so be it! Receive your orders,' turning brusquely to the motionless picket, 'receive your orders from the officer of the day!' and he returned to the rear again.

"What did I think of as I faced the muzzles of those guns? What did I expect, hope, or pray for? Nothing—absolutely nothing, save that I was a soldier and must die as one—that I must wedge myself firmly in the snow at my feet in order to remain upright upon the slippery earth—that I must give my orders, even to the last, in a voice clear and strong.

"But the moment had come—the General and the platoon waited—I hesitated no longer!

"'Attention!' drawing myself to my full height. 'Attention—load!'

"'No!' cried the General, stepping to the front, 'the command is useless—the guns are charged already!' And he darted upon me an angry eye. His anger, however, or the technicalities of the manual mattered little to me now. Carried away by the exaltation of my atonement, I was insensible to terrestrial impressions—wandering already in unknown realms—I, too, like the corporal, smiled at the death that called to me!

"'Ready!' I cried again. 'Ready!' and the clicking of the locks resounded through the stillness.

"'Aim!' my heart throbbed to bursting, my eyes turned to the heavens above me—but my voice was still unshaken, my pose erect, as with a thought to mother, a hasty sign of the cross, I gave the last command—'Fire!'

* * * *

"A heavy detonation followed—a blinding smoke from the powder, then—nothing! I was still upright against the tree, without a wound or scratch; in front of me were the lowered guns, the smoke curling lazily from the barrels, behind them the waiting officers and the General himself.

"'You have tricked me!' I cried, almost weeping in my rage; 'you have tricked me—load and fire again at once—I order it!'

"'And I, the contrary,' said the General loudly, placing himself before me. 'Ah, thou wicked conscript,' his voice softening into tenderness, 'come, embrace me, for thou art a gamin of sound sense!' and, stooping quickly before I knew what he was about, he had lifted me in his arms and kissed me upon both cheeks.

"'But, my General,' I urged, with honest bitterness, 'didn't you see—don't you know—that they had put no balls in the guns?'

"'Of course not. Parbleu! but thou art hard to comprehend! Dost thou take me for an ogre of the fairy tales? But fret no more, my boy; thou art truly a soldier who remains at school no longer. This evening thou goest to the Grand Army. I shall send thee to the care of a friend who will see that thou art placed above the lower grades. Return with epaulettes upon thy shoulders—I wish it—but no more duels—they are criminal and take away the gallant men of whom the Emperor has need. And now I must go; they await me for the evidence—later on they will bring thee to me—till then, my child, adieu!'"

"Behold," said the Commandant, as he finished his story, "why I made the campaign of Russia at sixteen years of age, why I was wounded at Beresina, and why, at last, I was sous-lieutenant six months before my comrades by promotion. Come with me," he added, rising to his feet, "I wish to show you the portrait of the man who saved me, and who addressed to me his last regard before dying for the good of his country. It hangs beside the crucifix above my bed!"

THE MORTAL COIL.

These two, Allan and David, were brothers; and, what is often more than brothers do, they loved one another.

While they were mere boys they had been left orphans, friendless, alone with the world and with necessity. They were industrious and frugal, their purse was common, and working thus together they managed to keep off starvation and debt.

They were now in the period of early manhood. Allan, the elder, was twenty-three years of age, and David twenty. They occupied two pleasant rooms in a respectable lodging-house, lived well, and had some money saved in the bank.

"At first I used to be afraid that we could not make it," Allan would say to his brother, when they talked in the evening of their life and their affairs; "it was such a hard struggle. But there is no longer any doubt that we are going to succeed in the world."

To this prophecy, which Allan rejoiced to speak, David would always assent, with an enthusiasm that came not from any confidence in his own powers, but solely from his belief in his elder brother. The difference between the brothers was more than that of years, as each of them well understood. Allan was strong, keen, and determined. David was gentle and sympathetic, but a little dull. They were alike, however, in their intense devotion to one another.

It happened in the midst of this which they regarded as prosperity that Allan was suddenly beset by a grievous illness. It had been written down in the pitiless law-book of Nature that he should pay for the sins of some ancestor, of whose very existence he was ignorant. The disease ran its slow course through many weeks, and there were now and again critical times when the heart of the younger brother, watching by night, stood still.

At last it came to an end. The sentence of Nature was fulfilled. The life of the young man was spared, but the disease left him blind and a cripple.

As Allan began to recover his strength, and the dumb consciousness of suffering gave way to active thought, he demanded to know how soon the bandages were to be taken from his eyes. To this and to other questions of a similar nature, the doctor who attended him returned evasive answers. Thereupon, Allan, half-guessing the truth, became silent. In the meantime, David, also silent, clung desperately to a fragment of hope.
